The President's unilateral, unconstitutional, and internationally illegal ukase of last June, ordering Chiang Kai-shek to cease attacks against the Chinese mainland would have been considered an act of war by any other legal government on earth. The Nationalist Government of China is still recognized by both the United States and the United Nations as the only legal government of all of China. But the United States, in the name of the American people, has forbidden that Government to fight for its own life—and is now ready to discuss peace terms with the Asiatic Communists in conferences at which the Chinese Nationalists will be impotent and silenced or ignored. We are ready to make deals with aggressors about lands and areas belonging to recognized governments, but forbidding them to have a voice in the deals.

The most recent policy statement by the President was implicit in his directive of March 20 to MacArthur. This stated: "With the main forces of the enemy in Korea cleared out of South Korea, the United Nations are now prepared to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea."

Last June 27, when the President ordered General MacArthur to send American air power in support of Syngman Rhee's government—a decision then labeled "the most glorious hour in American history"—it was the declared purpose of the United States, later supported by the United Nations, to clear all of Korea of the aggressors. The primary aim of this "police action" was to prove to the world—and to Soviet Russia—that naked aggression cannot be made to pay.

Most of Acheson's statements of policy and the most recent peace aims declarations of the President evidence willingness to dicker with both the Chinese and Korean Communists on the basis of "let's stop the fighting" somewhere near the thirty-eighth parallel. To suggest that such a peace may be made on the basis of withdrawal of all foreign troops can mean only that the U. N. forces and the Chinese forces might withdraw—but the Korean Communists be left in Korea, since they are not foreign.

The aims now do not appear to be the same as the aims of last June.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

But 60,000 Americans have died, been wounded, or captured in the magnificent effort by General MacArthur to free all of Korea, as he was ordered to do last June.

MAC ARTHUR CRITICS NOW PARROT HIS WARNING

As for those who now decry what they allege is General MacArthur's intention to commit American forces on the mainland of Asia in all-out war with China—they are in the strange position today of parroting the warning of Gen. Douglas MacArthur enunciated just 1 year ago?

"Anyone thinking in terms of engaging the hordes of Asia on the Asiatic mainland ought to have his head examined."

It was not General MacArthur who engaged the masses of Asia on the Asiatic mainland in Korea. He was ordered to do so—despite his advice to the contrary—by the President of the United States.

In the light of such overwhelming evidence that what Mr. Truman calls the United States Government has consistently surrendered to the demands of the Soviet Union and to the Communist international during the past 5½ years, and the frightening signs that this same government is now willing once more to talk a new peace after previous failures to achieve peace with self-proclaimed enemies—what would you have done in the shoes of General MacArthur?

When Mr. Truman now declares that there will be no appeasement of our enemies, he utterly ignores the established record of his own appeasement of those same enemies in both Europe and Asia throughout the past disastrous 5 years.

The President is himself authority for the fact that Soviet Russia has broken every one of more than 40 international agreements signed with the United States during this time of creeping disaster—and has kept not one. It is a matter of record that during the 30 months between Potsdam, in July 1945, and December 1947, 49 official United States protests were made to the Soviet Government over violations of agreements—and at no time was Uncle Sam powerful enough diplomatically or militarily to even slap the wrist of "Good old Joe in the Kremlin."

What good now to write another treaty with enemies—until such time as they can have kept one or more of the forty-odd already written—and violated?

SUMMATION OF TRUMAN AND MAC ARTHUR AIMS

The aims of the President and of the State Department appear to be clarified unmistakably by the record of their own declarations:

"Our foreign policy is to meet the open or subversive force of the Russians and the international Communists with humility and endless patience, attested by the humility of having our flyers shot out of free Baltic skies, and the patience of 60,000 casualties in Korea. The United States will not use its power to settle disputes; the United Nations is the only means by which the United States can conduct its foreign relations."

One searches the Constitution of the United States in vain to find a paragraph, a line, or a word authorizing the President or the State Department to fulfill in such manner their oaths to preserve and protect that noblest of all documents of freemen, beginning, "We the people of the United States * * * for ourselves and our posterity."

The aims of Gen. Douglas MacArthur have repeatedly been expressed by his view that ruthless, godless force can be met effectively, in Korea, or anywhere else on earth, only with superior, Christian force.

It was the repetition of this view in his letter to Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, dated Tokyo, Japan, March 20, 1951, that culminated in the ousting of General MacArthur by the generalissimo. General MacArthur wrote:

"Generally these (my) views are well known and clearly understood, as they follow the conventional pattern of meeting force with maximum counterforce as we have never failed to do in the past * * * as you point out, we must win. There is no substitute for victory."

Perhaps knowledge of this evidence and fact, which is but a fraction of the enormous amounts available in the official—and very often suppressed or censored files of our own Government—enables you to understand why a great American has remained true to the American people above all else in his life.

Because Gen. Douglas MacArthur swore, "To support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic—so help him God."

MacArthur's View on Our Government as a Congressional Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky:

THE CORE IS THE CONGRESS

An orderly mind cannot recognize anarchy as within the realm of possibility. General MacArthur once got into a controversy with Kirby Page, editor of The World Tomorrow, in 1931, about some clergymen refusing to serve in war, resulting in a strong letter in which much of his philosophy of life is stated. I take this letter from Frank Waldrop's MacArthur on War, a most interesting study of a truly philosophic mind. MacArthur wrote Page:

"The question of war and peace is one that rests, under our form of government, in Congress. In exercising this authority, Congress voices the will of the majority, whose right to rule is the cornerstone upon which our governmental edifice is built. Under the Constitution, its pronouncement on such a question is final, and is obligatory upon every citizen of the United States. That men who wear the cloth of the church should openly defend repudiation of the laws of the land, with the necessary implications arising from such a general attitude toward our statutes, seems almost unbelievable. It will certainly hearten every potential or actual criminal and malefactor who either has or contemplates breaking some other law. Anomalous as it seems, it apparently stamps the clergyman as a leading exponent of law violation at individual pleasure."

Of course, there is nothing new in this doctrine; it is clearly stated in the Constitution of the United States and in a number of decisions of the Supreme Court. Ours is a congressional government. That is, a representative Republic.

During the last 20 years much has been done to shift the center of authority from the Congress to the President, from the legislative to the Executive. But the will of the people expresses itself best in the Congress, in the debates, the disagreements, the compromises, the acts of the Congress. A willful Executive can work in secrecy and therefore unrelate himself to the will of the people.

Congress can do no business in secrecy and, therefore, cannot betray the will of the people without the knowledge of the people. If the people are careless in their vigilance of Congress, that is the fault of the people who neglect their responsibilities and obligations. But the core of our Government is the Congress and when that core rots, our Nation will fall.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, in his magnificent address in 1935 to the Rainbow Division, which he commanded in World War I, said:

"Where are the empires of old? Where is Egypt, once a state on a high plane of civilization where a form of socialism prevailed and where the distribution of wealth was regulated? Where are the empires of the East, and the empires of the West which once were the shrines of wealth, wisdom, and culture? Where are Babylon, Persia, Carthage, Rome, Byzantium? They all fell, never to rise again, annihilated at the hands of a more warlike and aggressive people. Their cultures, memories; their cities, ruins. * * *

"And saddest of all, the downfall of Christian Byzantium. When Constantinople fell, that center of learning, pleasure, and wealth, and all the weakness and corruption that goes with it, a pall fell over Asia and southeastern Europe which has never been lifted. * * *

"Two thousand years of existence of the Byzantine Empire, its size, its religion, the wealth of its capital city were but added incentives and inducements to an impecunious conqueror. For wealth is no protection against aggression. It is no more an augury of military and defensive strength in a nation than it is an indication of health in an individual. Success in war depends upon men, not money. No nation has ever been subdued for lack of it. Indeed, nothing is more insolent or provocative or more apt to lead to a breach of the peace than undefended riches among armed men."

It is when the hard core of a people's tradition rots away and nothing remains but individual excesses and competitions for place that a nation perishes. It is in this same speech that MacArthur said in 1935 what is so absolutely true in 1951:

"We all dream of the day when human conduct will be governed by the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount. But as yet it is only a dream. No one desires peace as much as the soldier, for he must pay the greatest penalty in war. Our Army is maintained solely for the preservation of peace, or for the restoration of peace after it has been lost by statesmen or by others."

Staggering of Loan Maturity Dates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter, dated March 26, 1951, which contains a resolution adopted by the Farmers Grain Dealers Association of North Dakota at its annual convention, held in Fargo, N. Dak., on February 14, 1951, dealing with the matter of staggering of loan maturity dates. It is a very important matter, as applying to the farmers of my State. I ask that that portion of the letter setting out the resolution be printed in the Appendix. I hope every Member of the Senate will read it.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1951.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. MILTON R. YOUNG,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. USHER L. BURDICK,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. FRED G. AANDAHL,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As of possible interest, the following is resolution adopted by the Farmers Grain Dealers Association of North Dakota at its annual convention held in Fargo, N. Dak., on February 14, 1951, recommending the staggering of loan maturity dates:

"Whereas due to the loans on grain granted to farmers through the Production and Marketing Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture maturing at approximately the same date resulting in the rails being burdened with the transportation of the old grain at the same time the new crops mature and must be moved: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Farmers Grain Dealers Association of North Dakota recommend to the Department of Agriculture that the PMA stagger the maturity dates on small grain loans to conform to the harvesting date, thus, giving producers in all sections of the Grain Belt the same length of time on loans but at the same time enabling the rails to move the old crop ahead of the new harvest, and relieving the extraordinary demand for grain cars and required to move both old and new crops at the same time from all producing areas."

It is my understanding that the United States Department of Agriculture has decided against such a program on the 1950 crop, except that the loan dates may be advanced or loans called to meet any unforseeable emergency condition which may arise. In view of the interest manifested by the grain people in all the large grain producing States it would seem the USDA should revise its program to conform to the wishes of the producers and operators of country elevators.

Very truly yours,

R. E. CLARK.

American Legion and Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion is not primarily interested in whether the American maritime industry makes 5, 10, or no percentage of profit. However, its members who have been forced to travel across submarine-infested waters cramped in the holds of dirty, hastily converted rust buckets, who have had to eat and sleep in relays for lack of proper accommodations, cannot be blamed for looking upon the transportation which gets him to the wars and—God willing—gets him home again with coldly realistic eyes.

On April 19, before the Washington Propeller Club, Mr. Bruce P. Henderson, chairman of the national security commission of the American Legion, stated the position of the organization he was representing in very accurately chosen words. His remarks seem to me to be of interest to each of us who is charged with a part of the responsibility for the readiness of a well-balanced Defense Establishment. The remarks which Mr. Henderson made are as follows:

No one among you tonight, officials and executives from the shipping and shipbuilding industries, from the Coast Guard, Navy, Army, Maritime Administration, and other segments of Government and industry interested in or concerned with the American merchant marine, ask why you are here.

You realize that your stake in a strong, healthy, and successful merchant marine is both an economic and a social one. Your jobs, your income, yes, even your way of living depends upon such an industry.

But you may be asking why I am here, as chairman of the national security commission of the American Legion—an organization of the veterans of two global wars who have associated themselves together for God and country—to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States and to safeguard and to transmit to our posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy—an organization, with its auxiliary, of more than 4,000,000 Americans who are dedicated to the protection of their less fortunate comrades-in-arms and the preservation of those things for which we all have fought—an organization which, over the years, has built up such a reputation that many more millions of Americans look to it for sound leadership in matters pertaining to our national security.

In speaking to you of the merchant marine, I think it is essential that, first of all, you, who represent so many various segments of the merchant marine, and I, who am speaking for this greatest of all veterans' organizations, understand our respective positions with the utmost clarity.

Lest there be misunderstanding, may I point out that our posts are located in every State and Territory of our country and even in foreign countries where American veterans are found—they are in large metropolitan cities and in almost every crossroads hamlet—in the great shipping centers of our coasts and in the great plains of our Midwest.

Our membership comes from every walk of life and is found in every economic level of our population. It is a cross-section of America. The great majority probably never smelled salt water—nor saw a ship—until after they were in the Armed Forces. We are no more interested in shipping as a business than we are in the automobile business, or farming or mining or merchandizing.

As a great national organization, pledged to "inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation, we are devoted—not to the furtherance of any private enterprise—but to the fulfilling of that obligation by working in the public interest for the promotion of all those things which have created—and will increase—the strength of our Nation, its Government, its economy, and what we call our "American way of life."

Aggressive in our efforts to "foster and perpetuate a 100-percent Americanism," we are intolerant of those who would undermine America in any way. Just as we oppose vigorously those subversives who seek to infiltrate into our Government and industry, do we oppose those who seek undue private advantage at the expense of our Nation and to the possible jeopardy of those who will be called upon to risk their lives in its defense.

To be brutally frank, I believe that, in this hour of national peril, when our system of Government is facing a supreme test, private interest must be subservient to the Nation's need for the conservation and efficient use of all of its resources. We are confident that the American people—generally—are taking this attitude and that our Congress is beginning to view adversely those who approach our Government to seek favors for "special interests."

And so we are not interested primarily in whether the American maritime industry makes, 5, 10, 15, or no percent of profit. Fundamentally, we are concerned with how you are solving your share of the problems that face our Nation in these troubled times. Our outlook upon the merchant marine must, of necessity, be cold-blooded, realistic and, on behalf of those whose lives may depend upon you, selfish.

Hard words? Perhaps.

But to men who have fought in muddy foxholes—or have seen their friends plunge to earth in a mass of burning metal or sink quietly beneath the waves—who know what our men in Korea are going through (and those boys become men awfully fast), war is a cold-blooded and realistic thing, and that instinct of self-preservation which is developed so rapidly demands that we examine our merchant marine as critically as a combat soldier examines any other of his weapons.

Our members, who have been forced to travel across submarine-infested waters cramped in the holds of dirty, hastily converted rust buckets, who have been forced to wait in line to get on a jerry-built toilet seat, who have had to eat and sleep in relays for lack of proper accommodations, who have been on a merchant ship that has received so many Coast Guard waivers it's about as acceptable in wartime as an old toothless shark is to his hungry companions, can't be blamed for looking upon the transportation which gets him to the wars, and—God willing—gets him home again, with coldly realistic eyes.

No, gentlemen, to be perfectly honest with you, and to lay all the cards face up on the table, you must understand that basically we cannot be interested in profits, in salaries, in good or bad jobs or in adequate dividends on shipping and shipbuilding stocks.

But don't get me wrong. Sure, these things are important. They are the foundation of free enterprise which has made our Nation what it is today. We know that a successful and healthy maritime industry must have a fair and reasonable profit. We know that these things are tremendously important to you gentlemen here tonight, to any and all of you who depend upon the American merchant marine for his job, his pay check, his dividend payment, to you who have bet your blue chips on this great industry. We have no quarrel with that. I'm just trying to emphasize that we are fighting for the public welfare and not for any "special interest."

I don't want you to forget that the boys who must fight our wars overseas are also interested in your merchant marine, although perhaps in none of these things you hold so dear. They're interested in their lives, in their chances of getting to where they must fight; and in their safe, and comfortable if they can get comfort, return to the land they love so well.

Does all this sound like the beating of emotional drums? I assure you it is not meant to be so. It is only that there are so many Americans who are so concerned with their economic stake in their own particular industry that their thoughts are confined largely to that one small sphere. They don't see the over-all picture. They tend to forget that historically our wars are fought on foreign soils instead of our own, and that, to carry the war to the enemy, millions of American boys must be carried, preponderantly by our own American merchant marine, to such shores and home again.

You might surmise from these remarks that the American Legion and its millions of members have never been cognizant of these facts before.

The American merchant marine is no newfound love of the American Legion. The history of our organization reveals some very interesting episodes. For example, at our national convention in Kansas City in 1921, just 30 years ago, the American Legion advocated the building, operation, and maintenance of a privately owned and operated United States merchant marine adequate to meet the needs of the Armed Forces in time of war or national emergency, and to serve the commercial requirements of our Nation in time of peace.

Subsequently, for more than a quarter of a century at 30 national conventions, in New Orleans, in Paris, France, in Cleveland, Detroit, Boston, St. Louis, New York, Los Angeles, Miami, and elsewhere, the thousands of delegates at these conventions have mandated our organization to take all practical steps to build up the American merchant marine to a size commensurate with the importance of the United States in world affairs; to provide subsidies if and when necessary to overcome the disparity between American operating and building costs and those of foreign competitors; to ask that at least 50 percent of the trade of the United States be carried in American ships flying the "stars and stripes" and manned by loyal American officers and men; to urge our own members to use American merchant ships for trade and travel.

Tonight you gentlemen here hail the 1936 Merchant Marine Act as your Magna Carta, as a sort of Bible expressing the policy for justification of a strong and healthy American merchant marine. And yet, without assuming undue credit, it is significant that the American Legion was urging, asking, insisting upon the very policies contained in that act at least 12 years prior to its introduction and passage.

In comparatively recent years old-timers in the Legion have listened benignly to expressions from those in your industry which have called the American merchant marine "our fourth arm of national defense," the sine qua non to the successful utilization of our Army, Navy, and Air Force. And yet, again referring to the history of the Legion, 19 years ago at New Orleans, our national convention expressed this same philosophy. In recent years we have been even more insistent "that the development and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine as the fourth dimension of our national defense should be carried out consistently as the national policy declaration of existing law."

It may not be modest to boast about the American Legion and its policies, yet it is only human nature to point with pride to the fact that every Legion mandate about the merchant marine has been amazingly consistent with the verdict of history. The reason is a simple one. Millions of us, in two major World Wars, have had our lives depend upon fast, efficient, and safe troop transports, and the tankers and cargo ships that delivered our supplies.

The foot soldier, in his trench or fox hole was deeply concerned with his supply of food, clothing, and ammunition. The tank or bomber crew soon realized the terrific problem in logistics of supplying it with sufficient fuel, ammunition, and bombs. Even the pilot of the Air Transport Command plane, carrying whole blood across the Atlantic from New York City to the wounded in the Bulge in 24 hours, and returning those wounded to their own country, knew that his mission depended upon the merchant ships that carried the 2,700 gallons of gasoline he took on at the Azores and the food that fed the essential ground personnel there.

Is it any wonder, then, that Legionnaires are fully exercising their rights, as citizens and veterans, in demanding and expecting that the United States shall maintain the kind of an American merchant marine so specifically described in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936? This declaration of policy relates, far better than I, exactly what kind of an adequate and well-balanced shipping fleet this country must have.

With these things in mind, we are determined that Americans shall not learn, from their own bitter experience, the historic fact that nations which have allowed their merchant shipping to fall into decay and decline have also found that their military, political, and economic leadership had disappeared. The stakes are simply too great today to permit anything less than the world's finest merchant marine for the United States of America.

But now we must consider a grievous error which so many national and even local organizations make. Perhaps your Propeller Club has made the same mistake as that made by the Legion up to 1946.

For nearly a quarter of a century, annually and frequently more often, at national executive committee meetings during the year, the American Legion adopted the strongest and most forthright resolutions concerning the American merchant marine. As good and as stimulating as was all of this activity, it became apparent by 1946 that such resolutions were not in themselves sufficient to convince Americans why we must have a strong and adequate merchant marine.

By 1946 we began to witness the diminishing strength of our merchant fleet and shipbuilding activity; our war-built vessels were being sold to foreign interests to compete with our own fleet; the drums began to beat for rebuilding even the fleets of our former enemies; we were failing to build fast, efficient, new ships to replace those lost, damaged, or worn out in World War II; foreign countries, in an effort to build up their own merchant fleets, began to practice unfair discriminations against our shipping while receiving the same treatment in American seaports as that enjoyed by our own ships; our domestic merchant fleet appeared to be slowly strangling to death, and, even worse, a new philosophy began to gain ground that we should, in event of future wars, rely upon the merchant fleets of foreign countries rather than upon a strong one of our own.

It became clear to us in the American Legion by mid-1946 that resolutions and conferences, however stimulating they may be, are simply not enough when a major arm of our national security is imperiled by ideologists, global do-gooders, and economic theorists, often flaunting their unsound but lollypop-tasting philosophies in the very face of that greatest of all American institutions, the Congress of the United States.

Moreover, another and perhaps more timely lesson became so clear as to be startling in its implications. The development of new weapons during and since World War II, and the amazing speed of war itself made us recognize that to have an adequate, strong American merchant marine in times of war or national emergency, we no longer can wait until we are suddenly plunged into war to begin to build such a fleet. We must have a strong merchant marine in times of peace.

I am well aware that such an apparent lesson may be an old story to you gentlemen who deal daily with maritime problems. But I am convinced that this lesson still has not been generally learned by all Americans.

Thus it was in 1946, at our annual national convention in San Francisco, that our national security commission recommended and the convention mandated our millions of members to begin a continuous information and education program in the interests of our fourth arm of national security—the American merchant marine. It became then, and has been ever since, our avowed and patriotic policy to acquaint our membership and the American people, with the necessity for and requirements of the American merchant marine.

Since that time, in cooperation with the maritime industry, the Government and the Congress, tens of thousands of our members have devoted their time, attention, and often energy to this objective of providing more information and education about our fourth arm of security.

It is a tremendous task to inform and educate the membership of an organization as large as ours, and even more laborious to have that membership carry the facts to the public in general. We feel, however, that we have made significant progress during these last 5 years.

During this period, we have printed and distributed well over a half-million pieces of literature—booklets, brochures, pamphlets, folders, personal letters, and bulletins devoted to the facts about the merchant marine. Talks about the American merchant marine have been made in thousands of our 30,000 posts and auxiliary units, located in nearly every city and town in the Nation. In addition, Legionnaires, well acquainted with the facts, have appeared before other civic, business or professional groups, carrying such information to the public and enlisting their support for this cause which is to their own ultimate interest and benefit.

It may surprise you to learn that the American Legion, through its national security commission, has had at least a half-dozen national radio shows, each carried on more than a thousand radio stations, telling and retelling the facts about our fourth arm of security in a dramatic and compelling way.

Through the cooperation of the industry we have been distributing, for nearly the past 4 years, an exceptionally fine motion picture about the merchant marine, which has been seen by well over 2,000,000 Legionnaires, their families, and friends.

More than 25,000 Legionnaires have completed our extension institute which gives them the background, history, programs, activities, and services of our organization. An entire chapter in this course is devoted to the merchant marine.

About a year and a half ago, with the whole-hearted cooperation of your National Federation of American Shipping, the national security commission began publication of a monthly, 4-page Merchant Marine Bulletin, designed to keep about 2,000 of our officers and members engaged in merchant marine or security committee work abreast of developments in our fourth arm of security. Circulation started growing with the first issue, and now the Legion's Merchant Marine Bulletin is mailed each month to more than 17,000 posts in every State, as well as to the other Legionnaires, for a total circulation of about 21,000. Members are urged to pass the bulletin along to their comrades, and total readership may well surpass the 100,000 mark.

All this and more has been done, is being done now, and will be continued in the future by the American Legion. We receive daily proof that this information and education program is outstandingly successful. Such results continually assure us that our original beliefs and convictions are sound, are right, are in the best interests of our Nation. Moreover, such a program convinces us that the American people want, and should receive, the facts about our American merchant marine.

If there is any comment I can make to you gentlemen here tonight, who are so familiar with the merchant marine, it is our conviction of the need for still more and better information about your industry.

Right now we, of the American Legion, feel there is a desperate shortage of high speed, large, passenger-carrying vessels, quickly convertible to troop vessels if warranted by events which seem extremely close today. From what we have read and heard, there also appears to be a serious shortage of large and fast tanker ships, and particularly a necessity for a ship-replacement program worthy of a nation as productive as ours, of sufficient size to meet our growing international responsibilities. Many of us also hold the sincere conviction of the justification for a reemphasis by the Congress of the United States of the increasingly important role played by the American merchant marine in both peace and war.

These basic facts may sound as shopworn to you as a politician's speech at the end of his campaign. But we are convinced that millions of Americans are still not sufficiently aware of them.

A great American once said, "Give the people the facts, then rely upon their decisions."

We believe that when more Americans possess all the facts about the American merchant marine, they will demand that Old Glory fly at the mastheads of the world's finest, most efficient, and safest fleet of merchant ships; that they will realize that nothing short of an American merchant marine strong enough to meet all the needs of our commerce and travel in peacetime and immediately available to meet the needs of emergency of war, is safe or sensible and that they will insist upon the strengthening of this fourth arm of our national security.

Hope for the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Sioux City Sunday Journal of April 15, 1951:

HOPE FOR THE FUTURE

The hope for the future for the American people is bound up in two things: One, that the forces of aggression will not start a third world war this year or next, and two, that the electorate will take advantage of its opportunity in 1952 to change party control in Washington. If a conflict at arms does not develop, involving the democracies with the Red aggressors, including Soviet Russia, and if the American people vote in a commonsense way in the interest of national welfare and security, the situation may be saved in spite of the harm that is being done today by an officialdom that is inept and untrustworthy.

In recent months the public has had its eyes opened to a shocking state of affairs in Washington. It has been apprised of official transgressions in many directions, of abuses of power by a multitude of officials for which the administration directly is responsible but for whom it makes no apology, of questionable relationships between highly placed officials and the scum of the underworld, of errors in judgment at the very seat of power that are shocking, almost unbelievable. Now at last the people have ample opportunity to realize what a serious mistake was made in the Presidential election of 1948.

Harry S. Truman never has been considered a big, broad-gage, understanding man. Indeed, he has his limitations. Before he went to the United States Senate at a nod from Tom Pendergast, of Kansas City, racketeer and party machine boss, he was known as an average man. He never had done anything worthy of notice by his neighbors. Yet this man became President of the United States, and today, according to trusted observers in Washington, is incompetent and inefficient. Not only that, but he does not even have sufficiently good judgment to select the biggest men available to help him in his difficult job. And how that man needs help.

Mr. Truman has the better part of 2 years yet to serve as Chief Executive of the country. The election will be held a year from next November, when a new Congress is to be chosen, and also, let it be hoped, a new President of the United States. The next administration will begin in January 1953. If Russia only will hold off until then, and if in November of 1952 the people vote in the best interests of themselves, their country, and posterity, there may be some daylight for us in the future.

Not in our entire history has there been such a great need as a new regime in Washington when the present Truman term expires. It will be our great good fortune if a third world war does not come while Harry Truman is in office. Constitutionally, as both Mr. Truman and Franklin D. Roosevelt were so fond of reminding their fellow citizens, he is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. He can, if he wishes, tell the foremost military men in the service what to do. He can decide matters of strategy. He has power almost without limit over men of great experience, training, and ability. It is a strange thing that fate permitted a man of his type to guide the destinies of a nation and people such as this is when he had so little with which to do it.

MacArthur Speech Should Clarify Objectives in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial by John S. Knight, esteemed American publisher, which appeared in the Detroit Free Press editions of Sunday, April 22, 1951:

MACARTHUR SPEECH SHOULD CLARIFY OUR OBJECTIVES IN KOREA

Gen. Douglas MacArthur's moving and dramatic speech to Members of Congress and the American people should serve one all-important purpose:

The clarification and determination of our objectives in Korea.

I have repeatedly said in these columns that, as a nation, we would never be content with fighting a limited war that had as its purpose the indefinite containment of the enemy with no decisive victory in sight.

To do so would simply not be in the American tradition.

President Truman, Gen. Omar Bradley, and Secretary of State Dean Acheson have all adopted the view that we can carry on our efforts to stop aggression in Korea without appeasement and without precipitating a cataclysm of arms.

To this, General MacArthur replied: "There is no substitute for victory."

All thinking Americans must agree with MacArthur, and with the architects of our foreign policy, that a land invasion of Red China is unthinkable.

But there is a great division of opinion in this country between the MacArthur recommendation that we bomb China's strongholds and the administration's position that we should do nothing to risk an all-out war with Russia.

This is the basic conflict that led to MacArthur's dismissal by the President. It is being debated in every home, office, and factory throughout the land.

Without recounting all of the pros and cons of this second great debate, it is sufficient to say that in his address General MacArthur fully exposed the vital weaknesses of the Truman administration.

MacArthur was not consulted prior to the President's decision to intervene in Korea.

MacArthur was furnished no clear directives following entrance of the Chinese Reds into the Korean war.

MacArthur's request for reinforcements was denied.

As the United Nations sought to appease Red China, MacArthur believed that we should strike at the heart of their military and industrial strength and thus bring the war to a speedy and victorious conclusion.

To a man of General MacArthur's background, fighting a war without using all of the weapons at his command was beyond comprehension.

When his soldiers asked why military advantages were being surrendered to the enemy, as MacArthur told the Congress Thursday: "I could not answer."

For his vigorously expressed opinion concerning the conduct of the Korean war, General MacArthur was relieved by a petulant President who brooks no opposition from political or military subordinates.

A bigger man than Harry Truman might have found some way to work with General MacArthur and utilize his great prestige in the Far East.

As things were, however, the break was inevitable.

Tragic as we may consider General MacArthur's dismissal to be, once the Nation's highly pitched emotions have calmed down and the parades are over, public opinion will demand that our future policy in Korea be sharply defined.

The people will not long be fooled into accepting Secretary Acheson's assurances that we are pursuing a "steadfast course" in Korea with "unflinching determination."

Nothing could be farther from the truth.

Actually, we are conducting a "diplomat's war"; draining away the blood and resources of our country without decisive results.

This situation, I predict, will not be tolerated indefinitely. Either we must push on, or pull out.

General MacArthur's speech has given the people of this country an understanding of our plight and the courage to demand an accounting from our leadership.

If, from his words, and out of the discussions to follow, can be evolved a sane, realistic course of action, General MacArthur's personal tragedy may become the Nation's gain.

In some 30 years of newspaper work, I have never listened to a more touching and superbly presented address than General MacArthur's.

On either side sat ordinarily unsentimental newspaper editors with streams of tears coursing down their cheeks.

Here, indeed, was visible evidence of the tremendous spiritual influence which MacArthur exerts upon those who come into contact with him.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The quiet dignity of the statesman; the pride of a soldier; the reasoned tones of the advocate; the spirit of a patriot.

Yes; this was MacArthur, concealing his emotions in the vastness of his great soul.

As he stood there in the Chamber of the Capitol, strong and erect, the commanding magnetism of his personality was immediately felt by everyone present.

Here was no mere soldier-politician seeking vindication or warming rounds of applause; but a giant among men.

He spoke without rancor or bitterness, yet his references were pointedly direct.

No other speech in our times, with the possible exception of Winston Churchill's famous blood, sweat, and tears exhortation to the British people in the darkest hour of their history, has made such a profound impression upon human minds.

A great American patriot has come to the end of his glorious career. His life, his work, and his character remain as the Nation's heritage.

"Old soldiers never die; they just fade away." so the ballad goes.

But in the minds and hearts of his countrymen, the example of MacArthur, the magnificent, will ever hearten the timid and inspire the strong.

Living or dead, the footprints of such men as Douglas MacArthur are stamped indelibly upon the sands of time.

JOHN S. KNIGHT.

Aid to Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month a bill was introduced in both Houses of Congress to extend to the State of Israel a grant-in-aid amounting to $150,000,000. This bill has wide bipartisan sponsorship. In the Senate, it is sponsored by Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT and 34 of their colleagues. In the House, our distinguished majority leader, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK, and the distinguished minority leader, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., are sponsoring a similar bill. We can truly say that, in this case, Israel serves as an inspiration to the leadership of both political parties for a notable demonstration of congressional unity.

In extending this grant-in-aid to Israel, we shall be helping her in solving one of the tragic refugee problems of our time—the problem of the homeless Jewish refugees. This is a great humanitarian undertaking which deserves our support.

Israel's success as a democratic state will depend in large measure on the development and stabilization of its economy. A sound economy and a democratic society go hand in hand and should prove to be a determining factor in making Israel impervious to Communist propaganda. The people of Israel are a freedom-loving nation. After a 2,000-year struggle to gain their freedom and independence, they can be relied upon to resist with all the power at their disposal any attempt by a foreign power to destroy their independence and enslave the people.

For the past three decades the United States has supported Jewish aspirations in Palestine, so that today we have the most cordial relations between this country and Israel. As early as June 20, 1922, the Congress of the United States unanimously went on record in support of the "aspirations of the Jewish people to rebuild their ancient homeland." Since then we have voiced our support in word and deeds on numerous occasions, thereby maintaining and continually extending the traditional relationship between the American people and the people of Israel.

Just as American financial aid was helpful to other countries in the achievement of their economic stability and strengthening of their political freedom, so in the case of Israel financial assistance from the United States will surely inspire the achievement of economic equilibrium in Israel.

I urge all my colleagues to support the Israel aid bill when it comes before the House.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article by Murray Frank, which is published in the April 1951 issue of the New Palestine:

GRANT IN CONGRESS URGED AS SAFEGUARD FOR ISRAEL

(By Murray Frank)

WASHINGTON.—A great stride forward has been made here to secure a grant-in-aid for Israel from the United States in the amount of $150,000,000. A group of 36 Senators, headed by Senators PAUL H. DOUGLAS (Democrat, Illinois) and ROBERT A. TAFT (Republican, Ohio), introduced a bill in the Senate on April 2 urging the extension of financial aid to Israel for the above sum. An identical bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Democratic Majority Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK and Republican Minority Leader JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

Originally scheduled for introduction on March 22, the bills had to be postponed until after the Easter recess of Congress. Protocol requires that a formal request for financial aid must first be submitted through the proper Government channels by the country seeking such aid. The Ambassador of Israel, Abba Eban, was prepared to submit the formal request to Secretary of State Dean Acheson but in view of the latter's absence from Washington during a good part of March, the meeting between the two did not occur until March 22. Coincidentally, Congress took its recess that day resulting in the postponement.

The bipartisan bill—sponsored by 19 Democrats and 17 Republicans in the Senate—is known as the Israel Aid Act of 1951, but already it is being referred to as the Douglas-Taft bill in the Senate or the McCormack-Martin bill in the House. It contains these highlights:

Financial aid in the form of grants is to be extended to Israel to assist it in developing its natural resources, expand its agricultural and industrial economy, increase its productive capacity and strengthen the friendship between the people of Israel and the American people; a sum of $150,000,000 is to be appropriated during the period ending June 30, 1952, but until the appropriation is made, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be authorized to advance $50,000,000 to Israel without interest and this sum is to be repaid when the funds become available following enactment of the bill.

NEEDS OUTLINED

In the memorandum submited by Ambassador Eban to Secretary Acheson, who promised to give full consideration to Israel's request, the economic needs and problems of the Jewish State are outlined:

The shortage of foreign exchange makes it impossible for Israel to attain economic stability, while the lack of raw materials and capital goods impedes its agricultural and industrial development; large-scale Jewish immigration must continue and the immigrants must be absorbed, over a half-million have been admitted in the last 2½ years and another 500,000 are expected in the next 3 to 4 years. The memorandum indicated that the money is to be used for the following purposes; $30,000,000 toward the cost of 70,000 housing units; $105,000,000 for supplies, including wheat; $25,000,000, petroleum; $25,000,000, fodders; $15,000,000 and $40,000,000 for oilseeds, fertilizers, cotton, and textiles, leather, chemicals, etc.; the remainder of $15,000,000 will be used to cover the costs of shipping and insurance in connection with the importation of these supplies.

Senator DOUGLAS and TAFT issued a joint statement indicating the reasons why the United States should grant economic assistance to Israel at this time. Israel, the statement says, has emerged from a bitter struggle for independence "with courage, honor, and success," it has created "a democratic political structure and participated as a respected member in the councils of the United Nations." Next to Turkey, Israel "probably has the strongest army in the Near East," the country has achieved notable gains in agriculture and industry but because of the tremendous growth in population, its standard of living was reduced and it is now threatened with inflation. Other factors mentioned are Israel's strategic location, its importance as a force for democracy, etc. The Senators end their statement with this observation:

"This can be a timely and effective contribution to the protection of the free world and a welcome continuation of American assistance to a people whose initiative, enterprise, and dedication to the building of a genuinely democratic state in the Near East are an inspiration to all."

COSPONSORS LISTED

House leaders MCCORMACK and MARTIN issued somewhat similar, through briefer, statements at the time they introduced the bill in the House of Representatives. For the sake of the record, the Senators who are cosponsors of the Douglas-Taft bill are: Democrats—CLINTON P. ANDERSON, New Mexico; WILLIAM BENTON and BRIEN MCMAHON, Connecticut; GUY GILLETTE, Iowa; THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Missouri; LISTER HILL and JOHN SPARKMAN, Alabama; HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Minnesota; LESTER C. HUNT, Wyoming; EDWIN JOHNSON, Colorado; ESTES KEFAUVER, Tennessee; HARLEY M. KILGORE and MATTHEW W. NEELY, West Virginia; HERBERT H. LEHMAN, New York; WARREN G. MAGNUSON, Washington; JAMES MURRAY, Montana; HERBERT R. O'CONOR, Maryland; and JOHN O. PASTORE, Rhode Island; Republicans—OWEN BREWSTER and Mrs. MARGARET C. SMITH, Maine; HUGH BUTLER, Nebraska; HARRY P. CAIN, Washington; JAMES DUFF and EDWARD MARTIN, Pennsylvania; HOMER FERGUSON, Michigan; ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON and H. ALEXANDER SMITH, New Jersey; EDWARD J. THYE, Minnesota; IRVING M. IVES, New York; HENRY C. LODGE and LEVERETT M. SALTONSTALL, Massachusetts; WAYNE L. MORSE, Oregon; CHARLES TOBEY, New Hampshire; and MILTON YOUNG, North Dakota.

It may be asked: What are the prospects for early and favorable action on the Israel aid bill? Despite its bipartisan character and the fact that more than a third of the Members of the Senate as sponsors, prompt and speedy action is not assured. There is considerable degree of sympathetic interest in the matter but it will be an uphill struggle and a long journey. If the State Department should give its approval, passage of the bill will be assured—but this is by no means certain. Undoubtedly, certain conditions of a military and strategic nature may be put forth and other obstacles may arise.

SILVER GIFT HONORS TAFT

An event of considerable interest took place here a few days before the bill was introduced in Congress. At a luncheon given by Ohio Zionists, Dr. Abba Hillel Silver presented a set of 500 volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in honor of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT to the Israel Knesset. The volumes, covering a period of 43 years, were accepted by Ambassador Eban, who praised the graceful initiative of Dr. Silver and others for making possible the presentation of the books.

Dr. Silver spoke of Senator TAFT's aid to the cause of Zionism in the years preceding the establishment of the Jewish State and listed many instances where TAFT was helpful in recent years, including his support and sponsorship of the bill to extend to Israel a grant-in-aid of $15,000,000. The Zionists of Ohio, he said, express their affection for Senator TAFT who did so much to help establish Israel by presenting these books, each of which will bear the imprint that it was given in his honor for his devotion to the Jewish cause.

Senator TAFT was very moved by this gift in his name. He, too, reminisced about his early efforts on behalf of a Jewish Palestine, he spoke in glowing terms of Israel as a truly democratic state and voiced the opinion that Israel is entitled to every assistance from the American Government. TAFT maintained that Israel actually rendered the United States an economic service by receiving hundred of thousands of refugees.

Seated at the head table with Dr. Silver, Senator TAFT and Ambassador Eban were also Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman, Librarian of Congress Dr. Luther Evans, Benjamin V. Cohen, former counselor of the State Department, members of the United States delegation to the U. N., and others.

Ambassador Myron M. Cowen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Ambassador Myron M. Cowen at the commencement exercises at Silliman University, Dumaguete City, Negros Oriental, on Tuesday, April 3, 1951:

When I accepted the invitation to speak to you today I thought of the many things that could be said—and that usually are said—to young people reaching this stage of their lives. I thought of the day when those words of counsel and encouragement were spoken to me, and of the many times I have heard them since. It struck me that the ideas and values and sentiments had changed little during those years, and that the truths and virtues and objectives they touched upon were no less valid today, but it seemed that somehow there was something wrong with the pace.

There is an urgency and immediacy in life today that gives us less time to ponder its problems, less time to translate our decisions into action. And, as our world has shrunk in terms of time, so have its problems assumed a greater intimacy with our individual lives.

It is because of this intimacy that I decided not to speak to you, but, instead, to speak directly to Pablo.

None of you, perhaps, knows Pablo personally. He graduated with the class of 1950—not from this institution, but from one very much like it, one of Manila's better schools. There was little to distinguish him from his classmates except a certain moodiness that sometimes made him seem almost sullen. There was no more than that to explain why, one day soon after graduation, he joined the dissidents and disappeared into the hills. We can only wonder and ask, as I am asking today.

Why, Pablo, did you feel that your place was outside the free society cherished and upheld by most of your countrymen? You had just received a liberal education in a school where, on one side of you had sat a son of a great landowner, on the other the son of a small farmer in Pampanga. During your years at school you came to know all of the great minds that have contributed to man's progress. You were probably stirred by those revolutionary leaders who led their people to freedom and independence. But why, Pablo, did you choose to join a revolution that is trying to turn the clock back?

Your people have fought for centuries to secure freedom and independence. They have had it for only a few years. Why do you now want to turn them back to a system where man's thought and speech and life itself are rigidly controlled by a small group who hold power only through ruthless force and oppression? Why do you want to turn your country over to a colonialism which has been reaching out for control of Asia since the time of the czars?

When you wave the red flag and shout slogans fresh from the Moscow propaganda mills, when you name your secret propaganda schools "Stalin universities," do you mean that you want for your nation the kind of independence enjoyed by Poland, which, after centuries of struggle against Russian imperialism is today ruled by a Russian general who scarcely can speak Polish? Or like Czechoslovakia, whose greatest heroes and liberators have been liquidated or driven to suicide?

I assume, Pablo, that as a student, you were genuinely moved by the poverty of all too many of your countrymen; that in joining the Communists you really hoped to aid the poor. Have you looked about you in recent months at the fertile farmlands that lie idle because your bloody raids have killed or terrified the farmers who once tilled them? Have you seen the hordes of refugees huddled in the larger towns and cities in improvised temporary shelters, eating what little can be distributed by relief agencies? They are there because you have made life on their own lands and in their own barrios intolerable for them. They could be producing food for themselves and the rest of your people were it not for fear of you. Yes, Pablo, fear of you and the others who claim to be their friends—friends who burn their homes, violate their womenfolk, and loot their few miserable belongings.

Maybe you did not understand that you were working to place your nation under the direct and despotic rule of a master from Moscow or Peiping. But just what do you think you have done to help your country, Pablo? Perhaps you are proud of having murdered some unarmed Americans recently. But aside from destroying a promising new enterprise and throwing a number of your people out of work, what did you and your Communist leaders hope to accomplish by that cowardly crime? Disgrace your nation? The world knows that murder can occur anywhere and is no more or less contemptible wherever it occurs, but that it is only the murderers who are despised. Or did you hope to frighten all Americans away, leaving this country to face aggression alone? You should know better than that, Pablo, if only from the thousands of Americans who have but recently given their lives in defense of the independence of Korea.

There was a time when the peaceful beauty of your countryside could be enjoyed in safety at any hour of the day or night. Today, near your haunts, sudden death or robbery lurks behind the beauty of every bamboo grove. Gaiety, charm, hospitality, and devoted fellowship have long been traditions of your race. Today, in many places, Communist doctrine has substituted hatred, suspicion, and naked fear. It may be necessary for you to destroy the spirit of your people before they can become willing slaves of Red tyranny, but do you think your nation can ever honor you for it?

To those who have never read a book or a newspaper or listened to a radio, the lies and distortions and shameless deceptions of your "Stalin universities" may be persuasive. But what of the others who know the difference, who can hear and read the big lie of the Reds, and, at the same time are living the freedoms of democracy? I am told that just recently many here in the Philippines heard Red China's radio telling the Chinese people of the "hundreds of thousands of Chinese being brutally tortured and mistreated in the Philippines." Apparently a base was being laid for a program of brutal retaliation here if the opportunity ever came. But the derisive laugh that went up from the Chinese living peacefully in these islands could almost be heard in Peiping.

Today in Manila there are a number of people on trial, charged with being parties to a Communist conspiracy against the state, as well as complicity in a number of vicious criminal acts. Their trial has been going on for many weeks. They are defended by some of the best legal minds in the land. Evidence is being weighed with the greatest care, and their every right under the constitution of this Republic is being jealously guarded by the judiciary, by the press, and by various civic organizations—all of which communism is pledged to destroy. Contrast that, Pablo, with your system of marching people down to a river bank and shooting them in the back. Or with justice in Soviet states, where people are arrested and simply disappear, or appear at farcical trials where—dull-eyed and haggard—they mechanically repeat ridiculous confessions.

Just recently some university students felt they had a grievance and demanded that they be heard. The President of the Philippine Republic left his work in Baguio and flew down to Manila to discuss the matter with them. Can you picture Mr. Stalin doing that, Pablo? That is just a small sample of the democratic way of life you and your cohorts want to destroy.

You and they must know the value of those democratic freedoms, Pablo, because you protest frantically whenever it seems that they are being denied to you in your efforts to tear down the very system under which they exist. But most of your fellow countrymen know their value, too. They want to continue to be able to speak their minds freely and openly. They want schools and a press that can bring them the truth about all the world, not a carefully strained bit of intellectual pap padded out with lies and inventions. They want their priests and ministers to guide them in the religion of their choice without the constant threat of prison and humiliation that hangs over the clergy in Soviet satellite states. They want the freedom to move about or stay where they please, to work at tasks to their liking, to enjoy the privacy of their homes and the loyalty of their families. Each one of these freedoms is taken from them under Soviet rule, Pablo. Why do you want to do that to your fellow men?

You see, Pablo, I am still giving you the benefit of the doubt. I am assuming that perhaps you are not like the hardened Communist agitator simply greedy for power. Do you honestly believe that Communist rule would give your people a better living? And do you think it worth sacrificing those freedoms I have mentioned? Remember, now, that even your poorest peasant enjoys those rights and freedoms today.

As for the better living, it is very easy for you to get the facts. If you carefully analyze statistics that trickle out from under the iron curtain you can readily see that even in Soviet Russia itself it still takes many more man-hours of labor to earn a loaf of bread or suit of clothes than in democratic lands—this despite the fact that Soviet satellite countries are drained of everything they can spare above barest subsistence. But let us look at it from another angle. If you are really sincere in your desire to improve this country's standard of living, have you considered every means possible without making slaves of your people?

Of course, most obvious is what could be done by restoring peace and order, by putting people and fertile lands back to work producing more food and other products for your own consumption and for sale abroad. By making traffic on your roads free and safe, so that food from your farms could come to your cities and the products from your industries and imports returned to the farmer—all at lower cost because there would be no need to offset losses by looting. And think of the millions in taxes that would be saved if it were not for the unproductive but grim necessity of hunting you down and stopping you from committing more murders.

For an educated man, Pablo, there is the challenge of old and wasteful methods in agriculture. Have you thought how quickly you could relieve the peasant's grinding toil by showing him how to double and treble his crop by modern means and less labor? And how you could lead him into the rich, untouched lands your government offers pioneers—lands that would become his own? And what have you done about malaria which, aside from the suffering it causes, costs your people many days of useful work?

There is a need to process and find new uses for your raw materials, to explore and develop some of the untapped riches of your land. There is a need for competent professional people, for teachers and engineers, for administrators and organizers, for public servants and legislators. Where, incidentally, were your so-called champions of the worker, Pablo, when your Congress was working hard to hammer out a minimum-wage law that ultimately will increase the earnings of almost 90 percent of this country's workers.

At any rate, Pablo, these are some of the things that need doing for the good of your land. And, whether you and your fellow outlaws like it or not, America is going to help your country do them. We are going to help because the great majority of your countrymen have invited us to help; because they regard us as friends and good neighbors and we feel the same about them. Ours is one relationship that your poison pen pals at Pravda will never break up. True, because of their efforts, the requirements of the free world on our resources for defense and development are heavy. But the American people have shouldered the burden without complaint, firm in the conviction that the survival of freedom is worth any sacrifice.

In your country, as elsewhere in Asia, we are willing to help to the limit of our resources in the real revolution of our time, the constructive revolution that has as its objectives the overthrow of human misery and want and the elevation to power of such forms of free society as best fit the needs, the tastes, and the cultural aspirations of the people who comprise them. All that we seek to gain from the success of such revolution is the assurance that we, as well as all others, may live and work out our destiny in a world community ruled by reason, morality, and a decent respect for the rights of others. There is a place for you in that world, Pablo, but you will have to wash the blood off your hands and leave your gun outside.

Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner Address by Hon. J. Allen Frear, Jr., of Delaware

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] to the Jefferson-Jackson Day audience at York, Pa., on April 21, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a distinct honor and pleasure for me to be here this evening and to join with you in paying tribute to the memory of those two great Americans, who have given our country and our party the lofty political principles by which this Nation has achieved its present greatness.

Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson need not be recalled to your minds on this occasion with eloquent words or phrases. It will suffice to say that their epoch-making achievements have left to succeeding generations of Americans a rich and indelible heritage upon which we have patterned this way of life.

I am particularly glad to be here in Pennsylvania, for next to the people of my own State there is no group toward whom I feel closer than the citizens of this great Commonwealth. Pennsylvania has always been a friendly and helpful neighbor to us in Delaware, and in the course of this Nation's proud history our two States have separately and together played important and vital roles.

This fine city of York, which, I understand, was known as the "Bread basket of America" during colonial days, has certainly contributed more than its share to the successful growth and development of the Keystone State. Indeed, there are many of us who gaze longingly at the fertile land and the high productiveness of the farm acreage in this section of Pennsylvania. As a farmer I can say with authority that I wish we had some of your good earth in Delaware.

It is very pleasant also this evening to have the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with your able Congressman, JIM LIND, who is doing such a superb job in Washington. He and the members of the dinner committee have already made us feel very much at home.

There was a time, I suppose, when the membership of political parties could gather on occasions such as this in a spirit of real revelry and relaxation. Most everyone enjoys a little political shop talk now and then, and I can well remember dinners of this type in Delaware and elsewhere, in years past, at which we could afford to indulge in these pleasantries.

Unfortunately, my friends, the present hour of history leaves little time or opportunity for gaiety and lightheartedness. The present tense atmosphere, both in this country and particularly abroad, demands instead serious and unending attention to many grim and unfinished tasks, which yet remain before us.

We, in these United States, have lived and suffered through many great crises in the past decade, and our nature is becoming accustomed to unusual, sudden, dramatic, and highly significant incidents in world affairs. Indeed, it is doubtful if any era in modern times has been more filled with literally earth-shaking and tragic events than have these last recent years.

Today is no exception. For we are confronted with the possibility of additional and potentially more dangerous trials than ever before. I regret to say that this appears true, not only because of the threat to our way of life from without, but because of confusion and destructive criticism which is being incited consciously or unconsciously by some people within our own borders.

I need not publicly observe that a serious controversy is threatening our national unity. But, I trust that the clear but difficult duty of the Democratic Party in this matter is understood by all of us.

Ours is the thankless but vitally necessary responsibility of trying to steer a course toward world peace. The way is made more difficult because we must travel through a tense and dangerous maze of political and military obstacles. More than ever before we need strength and character to meet these new and heavy responsibilities. Unfortunately, we are not being helped by some members of the opposition, who, either unknowingly or for selfish political gains, are constantly seeking to complicate our efforts to fabricate a stable and peaceful world where men may live with dignity and justice.

For weeks the Halls of Congress have echoed with oratory in the so-called great debate on foreign affairs. These discussions, for the most part, were devoted to but one phase of our military and diplomatic policy—that affecting Western Europe.

Now, another storm has broken with dramatic suddenness over the horizon—this one has affected our policy in the teeming, unsettled, and war-torn continent of Asia.

This debate which has already opened and will undoubtedly continue for weeks to come is in itself a desirable and healthy thing. In this country, free discussion is our way of bringing problems out into the open, so that the American people can reach their own logical conclusions upon the presentation of all sides. Tragically, however, the issues at stake are so grave and so far reaching that unless our words are carefully chosen and our feelings tempered, the reaction in other lands may be interpreted in a manner which will be neither beneficial to us nor to our allies, who read and hear them.

How sad and ironic it is that one of the great architects of our bipartisan foreign policy has been lost to the country at a time when he is most sorely needed. Without question, the Members of Congress and the people of this Nation have been deprived of an inspiring and devoted public servant in the death this week of Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg. Would that his calm and steady hand were still helping to guide us in the Senate Chamber now.

I do not propose a lengthy discussion on international problems at this time. However, a few brief observations on what this country is trying to achieve do seem in order if only to clarify the public record. This requires first of all that we approach the problem realistically. We cannot do so by following the whimsical reflections of certain highly respected policy leaders of the Republican Party, who, when all is said and done, have somehow reached the illogical conclusion that the only thing to do is isolate this country from one-half of the world, and, at the same time, launch an all-out war against the other half. Such thinking only creates false impressions among our people who are looking to their representatives in Congress for guidance.

Let us realize that the continued preservation of our way of life, both in this country and in other democratic nations, is a global problem. We cannot separate the issues because some of them are occurring in Europe and some of them in Asia. The fact that war exists now only in Korea should not lead us to the false conclusion that it will not break out tomorrow in Yugoslavia or Iran or some place else. It should be remembered that a leaking dyke must be plugged at all its weak points, or the torrent, built up behind it, will find other openings and engulf us.

But because Korea is uppermost in our minds tonight, particularly as a result of the return of General MacArthur, it might be well to examine briefly the implications of this conflict.

There is, and has been for some time, a school of thought, particularly among some leading Republicans, which calls for an expansion of our military efforts outside the peninsula, into Manchuria, and the Chinese mainland. I wonder, however, if those who have rashly proposed an invasion of the vast Chinese hinterland have ever considered the probable consequences of such an operation—the staggering cost in human lives, or the cost in dollars which could spell ruination for this country's standard of living. And what good, may I ask, would it do if our armies did succeed in capturing Shanghai or Peiping or Chungking or a dozen other Chinese cities. We would have conquered land perhaps, but certainly not the restless millions of Chinese people. And if we sent the remaining troops of Chiang Kai-shek ashore on the mainland, as has been advocated, whom do you think would have to provide the air and sea cover, and, in addition, replace the empty ranks of those who have fallen.

If the Nationalist troops are used anywhere, it should be in Korea, as a part of the United Nations force now engaged against the Communists there. By spreading the conflict to the Chinese mainland we would play directly into the hands of our real enemy, the Soviet Union. It is highly doubtful that if we declared war on China Russia would allow the opportunity to pass without quick retaliation either in Asia or, what is more likely, in Western Europe. If that occurred our thinly spread forces, together with such allies as we might muster, would be neatly buffered by the Chinese Reds, while the Russian Army was free to move at will to outflank us by seizing the North Atlantic area. Surely then there is ample evidence to sustain the thinking that a campaign against China itself is preposterous.

However, the critics of our present policy in Korea, if they fail to steer this Nation into direct conflict on the Chinese mainland, are seeking the same objective through other means. They are calling for all measures short of an actual landing on the Chinese shores. These include, among others, the bombing of bases outside Korea and the blockading of the Chinese coast to mention a few. I will admit that there is more logic for supporting this plan, but even then the likelihood of its success is not overly hopeful. To follow this course would also expand the conflict and draw more men and equipment into Asia. We should take it only as a last resort.

It has been said that there is no parallel to be found in the manner by which the United Nations Forces are conducting the Korean conflict. I believe there is. A parallel exists, or did exist, in the little country of Greece just a short time ago. You will recall at the end of World War II, when Europe lay prostrate and devastated, Soviet Russia, ignoring the principles and aims of the United Nations, threatened, through its satellite powers, to subjugate Greece by direct military methods. The government of that small country was hard pressed, and threatened with disaster by the growing strength of the so-called Greek guerrillas. Had they not been halted, the Communists would have undoubtedly seized that nation, and, perhaps, swept on through Italy as well. But Russia failed in this attempt because the President of the United States, recognizing the Russian aims for what they were, came forward with a bold and imaginative plan to furnish aid to Greece, and to Turkey as well. It was a step which cheered the hearts of war-weary freedom-loving men and women everywhere. Backed by our help, the courageous people of Greece rallied against this threat to their homeland. Key American personnel, including our new commander in Korea, Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, revitalized the Greek fighting forces and saved that little country from destruction. I ask you, what would have happened had we followed the isolationists' principles which call for us to virtually abandon the European continent.

There is an important lesson to be learned from the war in Greece. First, it should be noted that the attacks there were put down in the place where they occurred. It was not the purpose of the Truman doctrine to launch an assault upon the satellite neighbors of Greece. To do so then, as now, might well have inflamed the world into war. The Greek campaign was a limited conflict. When it became clear to the puppets, who were fighting against the Government of Greece, that they could not succeed, the Kremlin was compelled to back down. It was not appeasement to refrain from attacking the satellites in our defense of the Greek Government. What we did do, however, was to make plain that an assault upon a free Nation would not be tolerated, and, what is more significant, we beat that attempt where it occurred.

Not only did we succeed in halting communism in Greece, but as a result of another administration program, advocated first by our great Secretary of Defense, Gen. George Marshall, we have now revitalized Western Europe and aided in a rebirth of hope, courage, and strength in those democracies. Yes, as a result of the historic Marshall plan, the local Communist movement in the western democracies have lost in influence and effectiveness.

I well recall the sight of Europe at the end of World War II, and I am sure that there are many veterans of that conflict here tonight, who also remember the chaotic condition of the Continent in 1945. A year and a half ago, I visited sections of Europe again. The magnificent results of the Marshall plan program were stupendous. Europe has reached and passed the crisis successfully. The patient has recovered and, barring only a reckless assault by a desperate foe, the western nations will continue to live and grow in the democratic way of life.

To further strengthen our relationship there, this country has helped to create the North Atlantic Alliance—a treaty which binds the United States and its democratic neighbors in a program of collective security for our mutual welfare and safety.

I am sure that those accomplishments are well known to you here tonight, but they are worth repeating and reemphasizing as a refutation of the reckless and irresponsible charges which we have heard recently to the effect that the United States lacks an effective policy of resistance against the Reds.

Slowly but surely the democratic nations of the west are building and developing their military and economic power. We are doing so, not to make war, but to defend our way of life against a philosophy which, if unchecked, would make slaves of free people everywhere. Much has been accomplished, much remains to be done. Only in Asia on the remote Korean peninsula do the Communists now dare test the strength of the democracies. But, our quick reprisal has stung the Reds and checked them. The loss of American lives in this endeavor has been heartbreaking, but we hope the end is approaching. For those who cruelly say that our intervention in Korea has been in vain, I can only reply by pointing out that thus far we have prevented the spread of this conflict into a full-scale war. In addition, we have raised the hopes of free people everywhere by demonstrating our will to protect the rights of men when they are challenged by those who would enslave them. Korea is a symbol of hope in the free world, which knows the horrors of war and which is preparing to resist such a holocaust if it is thrust upon us.

My friends, the Democratic Party, which has served the best interests of this country for many years, need not cringe before its record in foreign affairs or its achievements here at home. We may be partisan within our own ranks, but we have kept as our objective good government, and for that reason the American people have continued to accept our leadership.

Time is fleeting, and I do not wish to infringe longer on your generous hospitality, but I think we should all keep in mind for the information of those who may challange our party's principles, that since World War II alone, we have enjoyed the greatest prosperity that ever existed on the face of the globe. The postwar depression, which the crapehangers predicted was coming in 1946, has just never arrived. Instead some 20,000,000 motor vehicles have been built and purchased in the United States in the past 5 years. New homes have been built all over the country. Slums have been abolished. Rural electrification has brought new advances and achievements on farms. Business is healthy and stronger. Look at the corporation profits alone. Wages and salaries are higher. More than 60,000,000 people are gainfully employed, and still we go forward in the fields of science, transportation, communication, and many others.

The free world looks to us for guidance and counsel, because under our system of government, we have achieved a greatness unequaled in the history of mankind. The only grave threat to our future existence and welfare that still lies before us can be surmounted if our global policy for the containment of communism can be maintained. The leaders in the Kremlin will not forever be able to trample the hearts and minds of these millions of people whom they now control by brutal force.

The democratic ideas and ideals which have been given impetus and strength by the party of Jefferson and Jackson shine brightly over much of the earth. Sooner or later that light will penetrate into the darkest recesses behind the iron curtain.

Let us, then, as Americans first and then as Democrats continue to place our trust and confidence behind the lofty principles of freedom and justice. The united strength of the free world, political, military, and, above all, spiritual, is growing greater by the hour. As it does, the chances for the Soviet leaders to win a war of desperation are steadily waning. Even they cannot be blind to stark reality. As our strength increases, the futility of attack will become more evident to them.

Let us, then, turn to the unfinished tasks with vigor and determination, secure in the knowledge that divine providence is with us in the great crusade to lift the hearts and minds of men above the ignoble and wretched state in which the twentieth-century tyrants of the Kremlin have cast them.

A Few Pertinent Questions, Mr. President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Jefferson (Ohio) Gazette:

A FEW PERTINENT QUESTIONS, MR. PRESIDENT, BY A SMALL-TOWN EDITOR TO A BIG-TOWN POLITICIAN, RESPECTFULLY ASKED

Explanation: Your questioner has been a country newspaper editor for 54 years. His recognition by former Presidents has been their personal invitations to attend the inaugurals in 1897 and 1928; and the offer of appointment by Franklin Delano Roosevelt to be one of the seven NIRA dictators for the State of Ohio. (This appointment was promptly declined.)

Agreement: You and I believe in the American way of life with its two-party system. You have stated your desire for intelligent debate and constructive criticism. Although I am a member of the minority party, I am more interested in a worth-while administration of public affairs after the voters have spoken, than I am in the political label of the administration.

Basis for my questions: My questions are based upon your recent Jefferson Day address, with its $100-per-plate campaign fund contribution. Your political party claims that "The Democratic Party (now the New Deal Party) was fathered by the third President, Thomas Jefferson." You profess adherence to Jeffersonian principles.

With one exception, I follow the 11 Jeffersonian principles as enunciated in Jefferson's letter to Elbridge Gary on January 2d, 1799.

I call myself a Republican. President Jefferson said, "We are all Republicans; we are all Federalists." In the broadest sense, we seek to be loyal Americans.

Thomas Jefferson died 6 years before the first national Democratic Convention at Baltimore in 1832. He never heard of a Democratic Party. He never spoke of democracy as if the United States Republic were a political democracy. Our Constitution is based upon a government administered by the people's representatives. It is a Republic, with each of the 48 States required to have a republican form of constitution—a sovereign entity, save in those powers the States or the people delegated to the National Government. Every President from Thomas Jefferson, down to and including Andrew Jackson, until the election of 1832, called himself a Republican.

A CHALLENGE TO MR. TRUMAN

Question No. 1: If you and your political party adhere to the political principles of Thomas Jefferson, have you followed his fourth requirement, namely, "A rigorously frugal administration * * * application of all possible savings of the public revenues to the liquidation of the public debt?"

Answer: No. During 6 years your administration has spent more of the taxpayers' moneys than was spent by all of the Presidents from George Washington, including Mr. Wilson and Mr. Roosevelt, and the waging of two World Wars. Such extravagance results in the average American citizen handing over to the Federal Treasury 2 days of labor out of every 6 days' pay.

Question No. 2: If your political philosophy is based upon the doctrines of Thomas Jefferson, have you followed his principle of "and resistance, therefore, to a multiplication of officers and salaries merely to create partisans"?

Answer: No. The facts stand out. So overpadded is the public payroll and so inefficiently managed is the cumbersome Federal machine that, aside from Federal employees at the National Capital, the Federal payroll for political appointees in many counties in the 48 States exceeds that of elected local and county officers, both in number and tax cost.

My partner and myself and our eight employees pay to Washington about 40 times as much in Federal taxes as is imposed by local, county, and State taxes on our business plant at Jefferson, Ashtabula County, Ohio.

Question No. 3: Mr. President, do you, and does the present Democratic Party, or that of Mr. Wilson or Mr. Roosevelt before you, adhere to principle 7 in the Jeffersonian doctrine, namely, "Opposition to linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe"?

Answer: No! You, like Mr. Roosevelt, and like Mr. Wilson when he got over being too proud to fight, have spent most of your energies upon getting involved in and linking the United States with the quarrels of Europe and Asia. Still you boast of being Jeffersonians.

Mr. Roosevelt ignored Congress when he gave 50 destroyers, 500,000 rifles and other war supplies to England, prior to the declaration of war against Germany and Japan by the Congress. Such gifts constituted a warlike act. It may have been justifiable if the President, as Commander in Chief, drops the robes of a civil executive and assumes the sword of a military dictator. By ignoring Congress, the Commander in Chief elevates the military power above the civil power of Congress, as you did in Korea.

The fact that Roosevelt had been warned that the Japanese navy was moving toward Pearl Harbor and an attack could be expected, and that such Roosevelt information was not communicated to the Army nor Navy at Pearl Harbor has no explanation, save that someone at Washington sought to so excite the American people to justify his previous war-like acts by the public's demand for all-out war.

Question No. 4: You and a majority of Americans were swept into adherence to the Charter of the United Nations as a means of maintaining world peace, through an expected physical power and psychological fear of world power to deter or to punish aggression. Nationalist China was, and still is, a member of the United Nations. Does the United States Navy, by your order, patrol the Strait of Formosa to bar Chiang Kai-shek from seeking to regain his native land? If so, is not such fact an act of aggression by the United States? If so, has not the American Navy been used during the Truman Korean police action (another word for war) as an aid in fact to the mutual enemies of the United States and National China?

Answer: Regardless of any intent of your administration, or the excuse that if the Nationalist Chinese army makes a foray upon the aggressors from Manchuria, it would precipitate world war III, the fact that the American Navy was and is still used to keep Chiang Kai-shek in exile prevents a sovereign power from attacking its enemies in China, who are enemies of the United States. The failure of the United Nations to come to the aid of Nationalist China while a member of the Big Five shows the general hypocrisy of the U. N. as an instrument of peace. This failure shows that it, like the kings of Europe seeking the balance of power, still look to force, coupled with diplomatic dishonesty, as the means of saving their own hides.

Socialist England, to save Hong Kong, demands that the Red aggressors—who have killed, wounded or captured more than 60,000 American boys in this Truman police action in Korea—be recognized as coequals of civilized members of the United Nations. England demands that you surrender Formosa to the Communists. Such act would be followed by the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of the friends of the United States. Such bloody appeasement means more than world war III.

A subquestion No. 4: Mr. President, do you believe that many members of the United States Senate would have approved the U. N. Charter treaty, or made any agreement to yield any sovereign power to the U. N. if they had considered, prior to acceptance, that our own Supreme Court holds that a treaty is the supreme law of the land; and that our treaty in accepting the United Nations takes precedence over the Constitution and the statutes of any and all of the 48 States? Thus you aided the conspiracy to alter the form of government of the United States through the U. N.

Under the terms of the U. N. charter, millions of American boys and girls can be drafted and sent, as you claim is your right and power as President of the United States, without consent of Congress, anywhere anytime for any reason to fight wars not of our own making.

Question No. 5: Mr. President, have you kept your oath of office to preserve, protect and defend the Federal Constitution; and do you follow it along Jefferson's interpretation, or do you, like Mr. Roosevelt, believe that by packing the Supreme Court with party-line stooges you can construe the Constitution to mean anything the Justices say it does? I suggest that you read Mr. Jefferson's first principle, namely, "An inviolable preservation of the Federal Constitution, according to the true sense in which it was adopted."

Question No. 6: And finally, Mr. President Truman, do you follow Jefferson's third principle including "resistance to movements for transferring the power of the States to the general government, and all those of that government to the executive branch?"

Answer: Actions speak louder than words. Mr. Truman, the answer is obvious. For 19 long years the New Dealers have been seeking to socialize the Government of the United States. Some seek to make it a Communist dependency of barbaric Russia. Others have dreamed of world government, ignoring the fact varying social, moral and intellectual grades make world union a mad dream. A world union can survive only by unlimited force and dictatorial power.

As Chief Executive you find excuses for increasing the power of the Executive and the centralization of government at Washington.

You have quarreled repeatedly with the legislative branch of Government; and you now find yourself in a deplorable police action which you dare not force to victory lest it be the excuse for an all-out war by Russia. You are the prisoner of false ideals and of your own diplomatic hypocrisy. You had no constitutional right to set yourself up as a military dictator and start a war under the fiction of a "police action." But you did start it. By the skill of General MacArthur and others in military authority victory was in our grasp. But you listened to the siren of the Thames; and your ship came close to national and international disaster by reason of orders not to destroy enemy bases in Manchuria by American air power.

General MacArthur led a long war against Japan in the Pacific. Then, as now, his pleas for more men and more ships were ignored. Japan had a great navy, a great air force, and a great army near or in Japanese territory.

The Chinese Communists are countless, but not as an army. They have no navy except such as may be loaned by Russia. They have no air power, save what comes from Russia. And Russia is far to the west, with only a single rail artery to carry Russian gifts of heavy war matériel.

No. Mr. Truman, you put yourself up as a military dictator; so you recalled General MacArthur because he, as a soldier and a patriotic American, would not aid the scheme to make the United States the victim of ill advice and treachery, led by Socialist England.

Would it not have been wiser to have followed the Jeffersonian doctrine and asked the Congress to declare war rather than to have assumed yourself to be the great I am in this Korean disaster?

Federal Income Tax on Interest From Municipal Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include a resolution adopted by the city of Newark, N. J., concerning its opposition to a Federal income tax on interest received from holders of municipal bonds:

RESOLUTION OF THE CITY OF NEWARK, N. J., OPPOSING IMPOSING ON INCOME TAXES ON INTEREST FROM MUNICIPAL BONDS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Whereas it is reported that the Secretary of the Treasury has indicated that the Federal administration may undertake to impose Federal income taxes on interest from municipal bonds, and in opposition thereto we submit the following from the American Municipal News (February 1951, vol. V, No. 2) to wit:

"The American Municipal Association and the State leagues of municipalities are on record in opposition to any attempt to remove the exemption. Such taxation would add 1 to 1¼ percent to the annual interest cost on municipal bonds, so a $1,000,000 serial issue running from 1 to 30 years now bearing interest at about 2 percent would suffer an increase from $310,000 to $450,000 or more—about 50 percent higher. In a statement to municipal officials last week AMA suggested that those who oppose this proposal should attack it now in the House Ways and Means Committee. Arguments against the proposal are (1) it increases one large municipal cost by about 50 percent, (2) it comes at a time when the Treasury proposes to increase many taxes heavily used by States such as on gasoline, beer, liquor, and cigarettes, (3) it opens the way for Federal taxation of municipal enterprises, possibly leading to Federal taxes on the income of local water and light plants, and (4) many vital municipal projects now financed by self-supporting revenue bonds would be impossible if the interest cost were increased."

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Board of Commissioners of the city of Newark, That we do hereby give expression of our opposition to the imposition of income taxes on interest from municipal bonds, and for the reasons aforesaid and the related depression which would result by the imposition of such income taxes, in the sale of municipal bonds, to the detriment of the municipality; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey to give voice and support to the objection of the municipality to such proposal to impose income taxes on the interest on municipal bonds; and it is further

Resolved, That the city clerk be and he is hereby directed to forward certified copies of this resolution to the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey, and the director of the department of revenue and finance be and he is hereby authorized to take whatever further action is necessary to present to the Federal authorities and to the Congress and the House Ways and Means Committee the opposition of the city of Newark thereto.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE CITY OF NEWARK, N. J.

"Men of the Free World Have the Same Spiritual and Intellectual Horizons Even Though They Speak Different Languages and Use Different Methods To Achieve Their Ends—In Times of Peril It Is This Heritage Which Binds Us Together"—Dr. John R. Steelman

OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I truly wonder how John Steelman manages to retain the energy to put in the long hours which he does in the discharge of the many and most important duties assigned him by the President—and to seemingly accomplish the desired results with ease, cooperation, precision, and dispatch.

The television program, Battle Report, Washington, upon which he appears each Sunday afternoon—one of his many self-imposed tasks carried on in the national interest—has now become a must item for millions of television viewers each week.

Last Sunday Dr. Steelman brought to the television audience Mr. Thomas D. Cabot, Director of the International Security Affairs of the State Department; Brig. Gen. F. S. Besson, Jr., Assistant Chief of Army Transportation Corps; Mr. Michael Straus, Commissioner of Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior; and, last but not least, Commander Robert M. Schwyhart, United States Navy Division Chaplain of the First Division of Marines, recently returned from Korea.

In his introduction of these officials, the assistant to the President himself spoke briefly with respect to the meeting which had taken place with the representatives of the American Republics assembled in Washington last week to discuss hemispheric solidarity and to make plans for the future.

In the course of his remarks, Dr. Steelman said:

All these men are working to build a world of peace—a world where every man can hold up his head in dignity—a world where no man is a slave of another—and is free to seek happiness in his own way.

The report made by Mr. Cabot, Director of International Security Affairs, was heartening inasmuch as Mr. Cabot was able to give assurance that we shall not have to bear the entire burden of the defense for freedom—that the taxpayers of all Allied countries will henceforth share the defense burden with the American taxpayers, and in doing so will more surely provide the combined strength necessary to defend ourselves.

In making report to the American people of the great transportation problem that confronts our military on the Korean peninsula, General Besson said, in part:

The transportation job in Korea, punctuated now and then by sudden disaster, has called for countless renovations. These operations are constantly harassed by exploding roadbeds and burning gondolas; by guerrilla-ambushed trains and truck convoys; by smoke and death in railways tunnels; by locomotives plunging over mountain trestles and trucks sliding off ice-covered roads; by road blocks; by rugged terrain, poor roads, snipers, and bad weather.

He spoke more or less in detail of the particularly difficult task that presented itself during the campaign which occurred after the Hungnam evacuation and indicated wherein paper calculations estimated that 100,000 troops cannot be moved over the rocky and rugged terrain in less than 11 days—that mathematics can be wrong—and the division actually moved in less than 5 days.

Mike Straus, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, needs no introduction to the Members of this Congress. In describing the starvation now existing among the teeming populations of the arid zone of south Asia, where in places crops are harvested by hand as they were before Christ was born, he painted a vivid picture of the tremendous job that can be done and is, in fact, being done by use of the comparably small appropriations made by this Congress for carrying out the provisions of the point 4 program.

Mr. Speaker, of all the men who have ever addressed a television audience, none have brought a more heartfelt consolation to the fathers and mothers of American boys who are fighting in Korea than did Commander Robert M. Schwyhart, division chaplain of the First Marine Corps.

The gracious tribute General MacArthur paid to Hawaii's heroic dead in memory of Korea when he said, "I know little of the dignity of their birth but I surely well know the dignity of their death," was equaled by the tribute paid to all American boys fighting in Korea by Commander Robert M. Schwyhart when he stated:

The men whom we serve in Korea are the finest in the world. The greatest tribute which can come to us chaplains is to be adjudged worthy of those whom we serve. May God keep all of them in his gracious care.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no more fitting way of having the fires of patriotism kindled in one's breast than to listen to the public officials which Dr. John Steelman brings to the television screen on Battle Report, Washington, each Sunday afternoon.

It is because of the marvelous work which he is accomplishing that I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues in this House to again extend my remarks and include therein the thirty-first Battle Report, Washington, which was as follows:

Mr. BRINKLEY. As the Army demonstrates it first new tank since World War II—the Walker Bulldog—26 tons of concrete evidence of our stepped-up defense production—NBC television once again turns its battle-reporting cameras on the Nation's Capitol.

Washington, which, during the past week, greeted the President of France and the Foreign Ministers of Latin America—and Korea, where American troops once again greeted the muddy 38th parallel by crossing it with their heavy "tiger" tanks.

Today Battle Report scans the world through the eyes of its far-flung cameras and four top official guests. They join to bring you a report ranging from the food crisis in southeastern Asia to first-hand experience with the Marines in Korea. But first, we welcome back from Florida, where he has been with President Truman, the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. During the past week Washington has been host to many distinguished visitors. Delegates from all our sister American Republics are here to discuss our family problems, and to make plans for the future. Last Wednesday, President Auriol of France arrived on an official visit.

It is significant that two points are emphasized in the statements made by these visiting dignitaries. First, they proclaim their desire for peace; and secondly, they state, in no uncertain terms, that freedom—the right of every man to seek happiness in his own way—cannot and will not be sacrificed.

Men of the free world have the same spiritual and intellectual heritage, even though they speak different languages and have used different methods to achieve their ends. In time of peril, this heritage is the tie which binds us together. This heritage is the foundation upon which a world of plenty and a world of peace can be built. Let us hope that the plans for mutual help which are now being made will unite us more firmly than ever before.

This afternoon, we will hear from four prominent officials who are engaged in radically different work. First, we have Mr. Thomas D. Cabot, Director of International Security Affairs of the Department of State, who has just returned from Europe where he saw what our partners in the North Atlantic Pact are producing for our common defense. Next, Brig. Gen. F. S. Besson, Jr., Assistant Chief of the Army Transportation Corps, will tell us about the gigantic task which confronts him. It is the responsibility of his organization to transport everything the Army needs to any place on earth. Mr. Michael Straus, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, who has just returned from South Asia, will tell us how we are cooperating with less fortunate peoples to enable them to increase their food supply, and Commander Robert M. Schwyhart, who recently received the Alexander D. Goode award as chaplain of the year, will tell us of his experiences with the marines in Korea.

All these men are working to build a world of peace—a world where every man can hold up his head in dignity, a world where no man is a slave of another, and is free to seek happiness in his own way.

Mr. BRINKLEY. United Kingdom troops, in the vanguard of our forces in Korea, forces now said to have advanced far beyond the most controversial boundary in modern history. These are men of Canada's famed Princess Pat Light Infantry, who were lately joined by the British Twenty-seventh Brigade and are fighting on the east and central fronts. The common power of Canadian and American troops will be increased even more with the recent agreement between the two countries on the use of similar military equipment. Further evidence of our growing unity, America, is this one-millionth ton of military aid leaving New York for Europe this past week. To tell us more of how the free nations are forging themselves into a single fighting force for mutual defense against communism, we bring you now, just back from touring the Atlantic Pact countries of Europe, the State Department's head of military aid—it's Director of International Security Affairs, Thomas D. Cabot.

Mr. CABOT. The great debate on defending Europe has left doubts in some minds as to the willingness of our allies.

I am convinced that the free nations of Europe realize the danger of the Soviet threat against them, that they are determined to defend themselves and are gaining confidence in their ability to do so.

Furthermore, I feel that our allies will bear their fair share of our mutual defense burdens. Their actual achievements so far in strengthening their defenses, increasing their armed forces and converting their industrial capacities to production for defense indicate that they will accept their full share of the responsibility.

We are building for a lasting peace and it is important that we develop the tremendous potential of Western Europe to support its own defenses and resist attack. Through Marshall-plan aid we have strengthened the internal economies of these countries. We must now expand the productivity of their factories to augment the supply of arms needed for mutual defense against aggression.

All the countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has made substantial increases in their defense expenditures over the last year. All of them are increasing their military forces. Compulsory military service of able-bodied young men is now the universal rule among our European allies. The period of service is being notably lengthened to enlarge and improve their trained forces.

Production of weapons is increasing, too, as here at Woolwich Arsenal in England, but it will take time to revive Europe's ability to provide its own arms. Europe's industry cannot compare with ours in capacity. Only here can we hope to get within a reasonable time sufficient new equipment for the forces being mustered.

As Mr. Steelman has told you, I have just returned from accompanying our Under Secretary of State, Mr. Webb, on a trip to London and Paris where we have discussed with General Eisenhower and with our ambassadors and other representatives, the defense plans of our European allies.

Much remains to be done in these countries, just as much remains to be done in the United States. But the increasing sense of urgency and determination among the peoples there is evident on all sides. Our Ambassadors, whose job it is to observe public reactions, all report that the determination of the people of Europe to defend themselves has increased spectacularly during the past few months. There can be no longer any question about the outcome of our joint defense plans. All the many representatives with whom we talked—military men as well as diplomats—had witnessed the same heartening trend.

Our allies, without exception, look to us for leadership and assistance, and our enlightened self-interest requires that we furnish both.

Adding our own strength to that of our allies often makes our resources do triple duty, or even more. Often relatively small additional resources are needed to enable our allies to achieve production in excess of what their own economies could produce without our help. For example plants and manpower which are idle can often be put to work by supplying only a small part of the materials and tools which are lacking. Then, at small cost to us, quantities of arms become available for our mutual defense.

Let us realize fully just what all of these heartening events mean to us. They mean that we shall not have to bear the entire burden of the defense of our freedom. They mean that there will be such a wide sharing of this burden, to the benefit of all free countries, that we shall be able to maintain our own economic strength at a level far above what would otherwise be possible. They mean that the taxpayers of all our allied countries will share the burden with American taxpayers and in doing so will they more surely provide the combined strength necessary to defend ourselves.

This is the real purpose and meaning of our mutual defense assistance program. Every American—especially every American taxpayer—should be aware of these advantages. For the United States to provide this defensive strength alone and unaided—which is the only alternative—could well be beyond our capacity.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Williams Air Force Base, Ariz. Looking to the day when wing formations will be made up of teams of fliers from different countries, French and Dutch pilots, training here in the United States for the Atlantic Pact air force, give a special demonstration for Battle Report—some of the most spectacular jet formation flying our cameras have ever seen.

Operation Tomahawk. The planes—flying boxcars and C-46's. The troops—3,300 paratroopers of the 11th Airborne. All add up, northwest of Seoul, to the biggest mass jump of the war to cut off the retreating Chinese. This job called into play not only the courage of our Air Force, but posed a previous problem of supply for our miracle-working Army Transportation Corps. Here the supply problem calls for taking to the sea. Small South Korean coasters are loaded with artillery and mortar ammunition. The vessels, under Navy escort, then move up the shoreline to an advance port. For more facts on the unique problems of supply posed by the war in Korea, we focus our cameras now on the Assistant Chief of the Army Transportation Corps, Brig. Gen. F. S. Besson.

Brigadier General BESSON. From the very beginning of the Korean emergency the Army Transportation Corps was confronted with a challenging situation to deploy and support United Nations forces in combat. Not since the Civil War has transportation become so all-important in military tactical operations.

The transportation job in Korea, punctuated now and then by sudden disaster, has called for countless renovations. These operations are constantly harassed by exploding roadbeds and burning gondolas; by guerrilla-ambushed trains and truck convoys; by smoke and death in railway tunnels; by locomotives plunging over mountain trestles and trucks sliding off ice-covered roads, by roadblocks; by rugged terrain, poor roads, snipers, and bad weather.

The sudden demand for more cargo and speed posed new problems. To lift cargo over inaccessible areas, the Cargo Combat Command was organized. It transports men and materials via air to points where rail or highways do not exist. For the first time in history, aerial ports of embarkation are operating. We organized the Red Ball Express, a train-to-ship-to-truck operation. It moves high priority cargo from Japan to Korea. Horses, mules, and oxen are pressed into service.

Cargo is carried on the backs of men. Inadequate highways make it necessary to push the railroads within mortar range. These men must fight alongside the infantry to get supplies through. A new role for TC soldiers. Railway men build the roadways as the troops advance, destroy them as they fall back and build them again in the slow grind northward. Transportation Corps is engaged in research and planning for new methods of lifting cargo. Transportation helicopter companies are being organized for combat support. Giant conveyor belts to carry supplies over rugged terrain are under research, also aerial tramways to lift cargo from ship to shore where ports do not exist.

Our most difficult test during this campaign occurred after the Hungnam evacuation. More than 100,000 corps troops landed in South Korea. They were earmarked for a hurry-up transfer across the peninsula. The single-track rail system northward was overloaded, roads and bridges were out, communications poor, and strong guerrilla forces were active. It was directed the Seventh Division, with equipment, be moved from Pusan to the Tangyange sector in 5 days. According to paper calculations this move was impossible in less than 11 days. But mathematics can be wrong. The Division was moved in 5 days.

The entire southern beachhead was combed for every piece of rolling stock. The "miracle express" began rolling north in a shuttle system—again a difficult task was accomplished.

The transportation corps uses every means of transport to supply an army in the lines. This includes land, sea, and air, plus the ability to solve each complicated problem with a new idea. Transportation is the first to arrive and the last to leave. A successful military campaign depends on transportation of troops, supplies and equipment to the right place at the right time, in the right amount and in good condition. The transportation corps, so far, has met these requirements.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Water, as these tank troops would probably be quick to agree, can be a curse as well as a blessing. Here the water born of the spring thaw in Korea turns the battlefront into a quagmire—impedes the advance of our Patton tanks as they clear the way for our ground troops. Thus held up, they can only move forward field by field—seeking to harass the flanks of the retreating Communists.

But these are symbols of the blessings of water—dams that light our cities with hydroelectric power and, through irrigation, turn the dessert into bountiful fields of fruits and vegetables. Just back from southeast Asia, where water is a key weapon in the struggle for peace and democracy, comes our next guest. That he may report to you on how we are using this weapon in the battle for freedom and plenty, we present the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States Department of the Interior, Michael W. Straus.

Mr. MICHAEL W. STRAUS. Hunger is an invaluable ally to tyranny and war. Our fight to win peace and security will be decided ultimately by our success in helping the world's growing hordes of hungry people find ways to feed and clothe themselves. They can do this by developing and making greater use of their land and water resources, and by harnessing their rivers to make electric power.

Some starvation is usual among the teeming populations of the arid zone of South Asia. Yet Asia has vast lands, now idle for lack of sufficient rainfall to grow crops. If irrigated from the rivers, these lands could produce an abundance of food and clothing.

Asians, through their governments, are now turning to America, and to agencies such as the Reclamation Bureau, for technical aid and advice in putting their idle lands and rivers to work.

Ancient methods of supplying irrigation water to thirsty fields helped to build great Asian civilizations. Primitive methods of pumping water, by back-breaking human labor, are still common. But they no longer suffice, in today's crowded world, even though Asia has plenty of low-cost hand labor. Human, or even animal muscle, however abundant, can't provide water and power on the vast scale needed if food production is to catch up with the population growth.

Many Asians still use buffalo to pull their primitive plows—and, instead of farm machinery, drive these great, lumbering beasts over their fields to prepare the soil to receive the seeds. In many places, crops are still harvested by hand as they were before Christ was born.

Primitive methods of building works to harness the rivers are still prevalent. I saw 60,000 hand laborers, helped by camels, digging one canal. I saw uncounted hundreds of women, toiling like ants under the tropical sun, each one carrying concrete in a basket on her head, to build a dam as high as the Washington Monument.

Inspired by how reclamation dams and power plants, such as Boulder and Grand Coulee, have helped make our own American West prosperous, Asian peoples are taking new hope. They are learning our ways of planning and building.

American reclamation engineers are helping many Asian countries plan and build projects for development of their water resources. This is done in cooperation with the State Department, the Economic Cooperation Administration, and the point 4 program. Already this year we have reclamation engineers in Afghanistan, Persia, India, and Ceylon, and others will go to Lebanon and Arabia. These countries, when able, often buy American equipment for construction of their projects.

Asian countries send many of their young engineers to America to gain on-the-job experience with the Bureau of Reclamation. Young engineers from 12 countries are now at work at Reclamation's Engineering Center in Denver, Colo. They come from Turkey, India, Pakistan, Siam, Nepal, and Burma. Some of these young engineers are working on American projects; others on projects for their own lands—such as testing earth to see if it will bear the weight of a dam, testing the strength of concrete—learning how to design structures.

In a single instance, reclamation scientific tests will save the Indian Government $15,000,000 in construction of a dam. Some of our reclamation trainees return home to rise to cabinet rank.

But all of them go home inspired, skilled, and experienced in modern techniques of planning and building water and power projects. They take with them the hope, born of modern America, of peace and better living for their people.

In other days, Reclamation Street, U. S. A., ran from Nebraska to California—where reclamation dams and water and power meant wealth and security for Americans. Today, it runs 25,000 miles around the arid belt of the world—I found it plainly marked Reclamation Street, in both English and Chinese, in the back washes of Hong Kong—and Reclamation Street round the globe is a two-way street—not only do peoples of other lands learn from us, but we gain technical knowledge of great value from them.

We are spending great sums of money to win the world to peace and democracy. But hungry peoples are interested first in something to eat. By helping them to develop their irrigation and hydroelectric power resources, we can make it possible for them to greatly increase their own production of food and clothing. This is the road to peace, democracy, better living and security. That is our destination, travelling on Reclamation Street—round this hungry, troubled world.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Yes, the Marines have landed again—this time, on the Communist Chinese. These are pictures of the first Marine Division back in action. Veterans of the Inchon landing who pushed all the way north to the Manchurian border before being entrapped at the Chonjin reservoir, these Marines were later evacuated by sea. They, are now—after several free months—writing a new chapter in Marine history. (And for most of them it's a grand feeling to be pushing the Communists across the thirty-eighth parallel once more.)

But, though as the Marines are, wherever they go their Chaplains move with them. One such Chaplain is here with us today—the winner of the Alexander D. Goode award for best demonstrating the spirit which motivated the four immortal Chaplains of the ill-fated carrier, the Dorchester. Nothing more need be said of him than—we quote—"He expressed his firm faith in God by exemplifying it to the men whom he served." Ladies and gentlemen—the Chaplain of the First Marine Division—Commander Robert M. Schwyhart.

Commander ROBERT M. SCHWYHART. It is indeed a pleasure to be back in the United States with my family and to report to the American people upon the welfare of their young men in Korea.

As Division Chaplain of the First Marine Division, it was my privilege to direct the activities of 28 Navy Chaplains attached to the Division. These men of God, representing many different denominations, are alike in one important respect—they are volunteers. Every one of them is in Korea to serve your men because he has chosen to be there. Furthermore, every one of them is rendering a ministry for which he is especially prepared by training and by experience. A Marine chaplain is as much a specialist in the field of his ministry as a brain surgeon in the field of surgery. You may be sure that your men are being served by ministers, priests, and rabbis, who know their business.

The chaplains are probably the busiest people in the Marine Division. In combat they accompany the troops wherever they go, offering the consultation and inspiration of religion, frequently presenting to their men worthy examples of bravery and devotion to duty. You will be glad to know that eight of the chaplains who serve with me were decorated for bravery in action. Nine chaplains in the First Marine Division have been wounded in action. Day and night, these men of God in uniform devotedly serve their marine parishioners tirelessly, moving from one unit to another, keeping prayerful vigilance over the wounded, pronouncing the last sad words of committal over those who had given their last full measure of devotion. When the battle was done the officers and men of the division went into the rear areas to rest and recover their strength, but this was not a time of rest for the chaplain. His hours were filled with service to his men. He counseled with them, organized recreation for them, shared with them their grief for the fallen, and proudly set up his chapel in a tent over which flew the church pennant.

At night, when the camp was dark, the light was on in the chaplain's tent. He was writing letters of condolence to the fathers and mothers 7,000 miles away who had lost their boys. And it was long after his men were asleep that the chaplain would say a prayer for those committed to his charge and slip into his own bunk.

Although I am proud to have been selected to receive the Alexander D. Goode Lodge award, I could not have done so for myself alone. It represents to me a gracious recognition of the B'nai B'rith of the selfless service offered by all my brother chaplains in the First Marine Division, a tangible token of the strong fellowship which binds us together in spite of our differences of creed, and the common sacrifices which they have endured in order to serve your sons and husbands.

The men whom we serve in Korea are the finest in the world. The greatest tribute which can come to us chaplains is to be adjudged worthy of those whom we serve. May God keep all of them in His gracious care.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Word has just reached us that Robert McCormick, whom you customarily see on Battle Report, put down a few hours ago at Westover Field, Mass.—back from 3 weeks in Europe with NBC cameramen, the Jones brothers. He will be on hand next week to narrate the fourth of our teledocumentaries on Europe—Battle Report, Italy.

Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another teledocumentary—this, then, against the background of Battlefront Korea, is David Brinkley putting a period on your thirty-first Battle Report, Washington.

Trouble for the Tuna Industry?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, the Pacific Coast tuna industry has grown from little or nothing to the point that it is now the most valuable fishery that the United States possesses. Commendably the industry has developed itself with practically no cost to its Government and almost entirely upon its own resources. It was not until its further development became dependent to a considerable extent upon the negotiations with foreign governments that it became unable to transact its business upon an equal footing without the assistance of its own Government in conducting negotiations.

Problems have now arisen which can be solved only by negotiations between the government whose industries or nationals are involved. Faced with this situation the American tuna industry has turned obviously to its own Government. Through a variety of negotiations there ultimately developed the formulation of a convention with Costa Rica which our Government ratified. Implementary legislation passed through the Congress. It now appears that the Inter-American Tuna Commission for which the convention provided may now fail to carry out its objective for want of the relatively small financing which is required. The facts are well-stated in a letter dated April 18, 1951 which was addressed to me by Mr. Milton E. Brooding, chairman of the executive committee of the Pacific Fisheries Conference. Mr. Brooding's letter is as follows:

PACIFIC FISHERIES CONFERENCE,
Terminal Island, Calif., April 18, 1951.

The Honorable JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALLEN: I am writing to you concerning the appropriations for the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission.

The primary purpose of this convention and the Commission which is provided by it is to ensure peaceful relations between the United States and the nine Latin American Republics directly to our south on the Pacific in the field of fishery development. These relations have been marked on many occasions in recent years by strife, acrimony, and friction arising out of the rapidly developing tuna fishery of the United States.

It is necessary that an inter-governmental body make investigations, analyze the scientific facts so determined, and recommend such regulations as the scientific facts require, to prevent overfishing. These Latin American Governments must have an equal say with the United States Government in the planning of the investigations, the analysis of the facts and framing of the regulations, otherwise they will not accept the findings as being unbiased.

This is the function of the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission, and it is designed admirably to perform this function. If this Commission is given appropriations to go ahead with its work, it is certain that the international friction will diminish, and the resources will be protected in perpetuity for the use of all peoples of this hemisphere.

The tuna fishery of the Pacific has become the most valuable fishery that the United States possesses. Its product, canned tuna, has become a staple item in the American diet, valuably supplementing our supply of animal protein food. Approximately 11,000,000 cases of tuna have been consumed in the United States during the past year, or about 3½ cans for each man, woman, and child in the country. The annual product is valued in excess of $100,000,000; upward of $125,000,000 is invested in the vessels, canneries, etc., that produce the product, and many thousands of people in the States of California, Oregon and Washington are employed directly in the industry.

The remarkable development of this fishery has been accomplished by the tuna industry by its own initiative, by the investment of private capital, without ever calling upon the Federal Government for assistance, financial or otherwise. It desires to maintain that independent position. It would not call upon the Government for any appropriation whatever if there were any practicable way to handle the problem with private funds.

More than 90 percent of the tuna produced by this industry is caught south of our border. The fishery extends to Northern Peru and works the year around in all of the coastal area between California and Peru. Some of the tuna is caught, under permit from the particular country, in the territorial waters of those several independent nations; most of it comes from the high seas off the coasts of those countries.

Nearly all of the fishing is done by the live bait method. This requires the use of small live fish of particular kinds which are found only in the shallow coastal waters adjacent to the fishing grounds. All of this bait comes from the territorial waters of one or the other of these nine sovereign nations. It is taken under individual boat permits from those nations.

Most of the friction between the fleet and these 9 countries centers on these bait fisheries. These several countries do not use these bait resources themselves but they may want to, at some time in the future when their tuna fisheries develop. They are worried lest the American fishermen overfish and destroy these resources. This worry extends also to the offshore tuna resources, which these countries scarcely use now but may want to use in the future as their populations increase and their supplies of animal protein foods decrease.

These worries express themselves in vigorous political disturbances within some of these countries directed at the United States industry, the enactment of unsound regulations which hamper our industry and do not conserve the resource, and in continual friction which disturbs the friendly relations between the United States and our Latin American neighbors.

The basic reason for this situation is that practically nothing is known about the biology or abundance of the tuna or the bait fish and either their migrations or the effect of the fishery on their abundance. Practically none of the scientific facts needed to detect overfishing or to frame regulations to prevent it are known.

These Latin-American countries do not have trained scientists to do this work. They are so suspicious that the United States is solely intent on exploiting their resources even to the point of destroying them, that they look upon information from the United States on this subject as being biased in favor of exploitation, whether that information comes from the United States Government or from the United States industry. In particular, they are suspicious of the intent of the United States industry. Consequently, the industry itself cannot provide the research information needed. These sovereign nations will not accept it as unbiased information. The industry cannot treat with these sovereign nations. The dealing must be on a governmental level between the Government of the United States and these several governments.

If the Commission is now permitted to die because of lack of appropriations, it is quite as certain that these international frictions will flare up once again in an even more aggravating manner because these Latin-American countries will justly feel that the United States has welshed on the international commitments it has made, and that there is no true interest on the part of the United States in preventing overfishing of these resources. That appears to be what is going to happen.

The Commission held its first meeting in July 1950, and began actual operations in January 1951, when its Director of Investigations entered on duty. The program is under way. Costa Rica has given the Commission its share of the joint expenses, but the United States has only $12,000 of its $59,000 share for the remainder of this fiscal years. These funds will be exhausted by the middle of May and the scientific staff of the Commission will have to be put on payless furlough unless additional funds are forthcoming for the remainder of fiscal 1951.

Pending before the House Appropriations Committee is also the Commission's budget request for fiscal 1952 in the amount of $339,000.

It should be borne in mind that this Commission was established under a convention between the United States and Costa Rica which was ratified without dissenting vote by the Senate of the United States on August 17, 1949, and entered into force on March 3, 1950.

Legislation designed to give effect to this Convention and to authorize appropriations for this purpose passed both the House and Senate last year without dissenting vote and became Public Law 764, Eighty-first Congress

Failure of the Congress to provide funds for the maintenance of the program would in effect be a rescission of the ratification of a convention to which we have invited other nations to adhere, and of the passage of the implementing legislation (Public Law 764, 81st Cong.).

Members of the Pacific Fisheries Conference believe the Congress would not wish to take any action which could be considered by these other nations as a repudiation of such recently approved legislation and we would very much appreciate your doing anything you properly can to assure favorable action by the Appropriations Committee on these two items which are now under consideration as part of the budget of the Department of State.

The Pacific Fisheries Conference is composed of all labor unions, vessel owners associations and trade associations engaged in all of the fisheries of the United States operating from the States of Oregon, Washington, and California, and from the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii. A principal purpose of the Pacific Fisheries Conference is to aid the United States Government in every possible way that the fishing industry can to decrease the international friction which the operations of high seas fisheries has so often brought about.

The Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission is considered to be a keystone in the progress of a policy of friendly development of the vast food potential of the Pacific Ocean. This conference has followed the development of this subject from the first. It encouraged the Department of State to negotiate the convention with Costa Rica, and participated in the negotiation. It urged the ratification of the convention by the Senate. It pressed for passage of the implementing legislation through the Congress. It now prays that the Congress will provide the funds with which this Commission can engage in its appointed duties, which we feel are of such importance to the international relations of this Nation and to the continued welfare of one of this hemisphere's great natural resources.

Sincerely yours,

MILTON E. BRODDING.
Chairman, Executive Committee,
Pacific Fisheries Conference.

Mr. Speaker, the Pacific Fisheries Conference represents all segments of the fishery industry on the Pacific coast of the United States including the organizations of labor, boat owners, producers or processors, and also the professional associations and publications which are interested in the fisheries field. The amount which is presently involved is something less than $400,000. It might be well to point out that the fisheries are an efficient source of food which has not been expensive to the Federal Government. By comparison the average annual contribution of each fishermen and farmer to total production is 47,000 pounds for the fisherman and 34,500 pounds for the farmer. The annual Federal expenditure for each ton of food produced—Senate Document No. 51, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, page 131—was 83 cents for the fishery produce and $7.04 for the farm produce. The industry as a whole has been very conservative in its requests upon the Government.

Address by Hon. James E. Murray, of Montana, to the National Muscular Dystrophy Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] at the National Conference of the Muscular Dystrophy Association in the Statler Hotel, New York City, on April 14, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I deem it a great privilege to be invited to address your first national medical conference.

As chairman of the Senate's Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I have the responsibility of studying all legislative proposals affecting the health and well-being of our people. But, in addition to discharging that official responsibility, I feel it my duty to keep in touch with all developments which promise to help solve national problems in the field of health, even if they have not as yet resulted in the submission of proposals for legislation by the Congress.

Consequently, when I heard of the organization of the Muscular Dystrophy Association some 10 months ago, I promptly inquired into its nature and its objectives. Since then I have tried to keep informed on its progress. As a result of what I thus learned, and on the basis of more than 10 years of committee experience with legislation resulting from the activities of similar organizations, I know I can say with all confidence that the Muscular Dystrophy Association is a splendid organization with a humane purpose; an organization that has already accomplished much that is worth while in furthering its basic aims; an organization that holds great future promise, not only for its members but for the country as a whole; an organization I deem it an honor to appear before.

Naturally I do not have detailed knowledge of the day-to-day workings or activities of your association; nor can I by the furthest stretch of imagination claim to be an authority on muscular dystrophy. But since most people are altogether unaware of this strange malady, perhaps a recapitulation of what I do know about it would be in order here. This is so because yours is a story that should be told and retold. It is a dramatic story; a story of great courage in the face of tremendous odds; a story of mobilizing for battle against a disease that has baffled medical science for centuries—a disease which is an insidious, silent, creeping sort of killer, numbering its victims in the thousands. Many of these sufferers are adults; at least half are children between 3 and 13 years of age—children who should be running and leaping and playing during the most happy and carefree period of life, but children whose muscles are slowly and mysteriously wasting away; children, few of whom will live to adolescence and none of whom will live to maturity unless, through your generous efforts and with the aid of an understanding nation, our vast scientific resources may be mobilized and directed to discover the cause of this dread disease and find a cure for its victims.

To date, your fellow citizens and your Government has done pitifully little to help solve this problem. Not because of any intentional lack of interest, but simply because the people of our country generally have been and, for the most part, still are wholly unaware of its existence. And when even the medical profession so far have learned so little of the disease that most of them cannot recognize or diagnose it, surely the people cannot be blamed if they remain unaware of the compelling need for concerted action against it.

Obviously, the first step in the battle is to create that awareness. And obviously, this is the most difficult step of all because, in the first instance, it can only be taken by the victims of the disease and by their families; by people who, while carrying their own heavy burdens of pain and sorrow and expense must nonetheless rise above their individual burdens and sorrows and join together to help one another and to help their fellow citizens learn of their common plight. This is the step that calls for courage and determination and for sacrifice. And this is the step which, to your great honor and to the Nation's benefit, you took when less than a year ago you organized the Muscular Dystrophy Association and began to set up chapters throughout the country.

All of this early spade work—and it was a gigantic job—was done with the "blood, sweat, and tears" of the association's members—and most important of all—with money contributed by the members themselves. It was a wonderful and typical example of American humanity; of American grit and courage; of people surmounting their own burdens and pitching in and working together to solve a problem beyond the capabilities of individual effort.

The association's first national convention held in New York in January of this year helped spread the word around. Shortly thereafter, the press became aware of the nature of this murderous ailment in the case of the four Godfrey brothers in New York and other young victims living in the Middle West, the South, and on the west coast. And now you have brought into being this first national medical conference on muscular dystrophy—a conference attended by prominent medical men from every section of the United States and from outside our borders. So now, through your generous and persistent efforts, there is real hope that the research needed to find the cause and cure of muscular dystrophy will be undertaken on a scale large enough to be really effective. If you persist in your efforts with the same determination and energy as you have shown to date, you may be sure that what up to now has been a hope will soon become a certainty.

To be sure, there is much yet to be done. The New York Times recently commented in an editorial, and I quote:

"In 1950 only $20,000 was spent on research in muscular dystrophy, and all but $1,000 of this was contributed by the newly organized Muscular Dystrophy Association. It is an anomaly in a country always ready to support medical science that Dr. Ade T. Milhorat, of the New York Hospital—Cornell Medical Center—is the only scientist who is devoting all his working time to research in muscular dystrophy. The evidence that he has collected justifies the belief that a cure can be found not in the remote future but in a few years. The hospitals are ready, but there is no money for research."

Well, I say that if the hospitals are ready, then the money for research should and must be provided. And I believe that since this is a problem of concern to all our people, that a portion of these funds for muscular dystrophy research, as in the case of other mysterious maladies, ought to be provided by the Federal Government, to supplement the voluntary contributions made by the members of your association and persons sympathetic to its aims.

It is dreadful to think what might have happened had your association not come to Dr. Milhorat's rescue when lack of funds threatened to curtail his very limited research program. While your grant of $25,000 will make it possible for him to continue, and to expand his activities to some degree, it is most obvious that additional help must be found. The funds given New York Hospital will cover operating expenses for only 2½ months.

As a Member of the United States Senate, I am proud to say that I have either initiated or been the cosponsor of such legislation as the National Cancer Act, welcomed by doctors specializing in that disease and by the American Cancer Society; and the national heart bill, which represents the first really effective attack on heart disease by the Federal Government. I hope, and expect, to be of assistance in furthering the cause of similar organizations in the health and medical field, and I most certainly include in that statement the cause to which the Muscular Dystrophy Association is devoted. I have also had the honor and privilege of cosponsoring legislation which resulted in the establishment of the Neurological and Blindness Institute at Bethesda, Md., a division of the United States Public Health Service. Undoubtedly, some of the funds to be allocated to the Neurological and Blindness Institute at this session of Congress will be used for limited research in an attempt to find the cause and cure for muscular dystrophy.

As a matter of fact, there is no doubt but that the work being done in each of the seven great research centers we have created at Bethesda will contribute its part to the final solution of the problem. For that is the great advance represented by the National Institutes of Health. Instead of having scientists working away at their own separate problems, each of them ignorant of the discoveries or new developments perfected by the others, we now have a mechanism through which every forward step in one field is immediately called to the attention of workers in other fields. It is through this concept of separate but coordinated research that we hope to find the causes and cures for disease far sooner than would otherwise have been possible.

This is all to the good. But, while we are discussing the use of Federal funds for such research, permit me because of my experience in this field to offer a word of advice. Despite what you may occasionally read, ours is not a "give-away" government. Time and time again my colleagues in the Congress have proved that, while they will appropriate money to aid in such research, they will do so only when the people immediately concerned are really attempting to help themselves. Usually Federal aid is made available in amounts approximately equal to those raised by the voluntary groups themselves. This has been true in the past and it is most certainly true now when the Congress is faced with the task of raising the huge funds needed to finance an all-out mobilization.

But I know I need not dwell on this. You have already gone a long way and I know you will persevere in your efforts. I am sure you all share in the thought expressed by your own president, Mr. Paul Cohen, when he said- and I quote:

"By joining our hands we have created the organism that can make more intensive research activity a reality. It is simply a matter of basic arithmetic; the more research we can pay for, the more likely a quicker cure."

And while you continue to campaign for funds and to publicize your efforts and make the layman more conscious of what muscular dystrophy is and what must be done to arrest it, I believe there will be further help forthcoming from still another quarter.

Last year the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which I am chairman, reported a bill to the Senate calling for a national survey of sickness in the United States. The last public census of the various ailments and afflictions affecting our citizens had been taken in 1939. Since then, the United States had engaged in the most disastrous war in her history, with vast population changes taking place. Therefore, we of the committee felt it imperative that the facts concerning the health of the people be brought up to date.

The bill was subsequently passed by the Senate, but unfortunately did not pass in the House because of the great number of other measures which took precedence over it. However, that bill has been reintroduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman JOHN FOGARTY as H. R. 3339. If enough people express their interest and the bill passes the House, I am confident that we in the Senate will again do our part to make it law.

Specifically, as regards muscular dystrophy, such a survey could indicate how many persons suffer from the disease; how many of these are men, women, and children. It would establish just where these individuals live, which of the States have the greatest number of victims; which of the States are devoid of them. It would provide for reports on the disease on a State-wide basis. We would know how the disease strikes as regards age groups, whether it affects all income brackets equally or if it is found just among the middle- or low-income groups. These and dozens of other questions of great importance to our research workers would be answered.

"Knowledge is more than power"—knowledge gives you the power to tackle a problem head on, armed with every available weapon and the right kind of weapon. We, in America, do not have that knowledge as regards the incidence of disease among our people. And if those of you who are kind enough to listen to me today share my belief that it is important to us, I would urge that you let your own Congressmen and Senators know of your interest in the bill calling for a "Survey of Sickness."

And while I am urging action on your part to make this survey possible, let me mention one more bill the passage of which is of great importance to the realization of your hopes. To conquer muscular dystrophy we must first establish the facts; then we must provide for research on those facts; and, finally, we must make sure that we have the skilled medical personnel to put the results of that research to work. The first can be taken care of through the Survey of Sickness bill. The second item through the raising of additional funds for research. But while we are working together on these two, we must also realize all this effort may be wasted unless we move quickly to rescue the schools on which we depend for the training of doctors and nurses from the very grave financial crisis which now threatens them. If we are to have enough doctors and nurses to treat our sick, we must provide Federal assistance to the medical and nursing schools. A bill which will do just that will be debated by the Senate within the next 2 or 3 weeks. It is a strictly nonpartisan and most carefully drawn bill. It is sponsored by Senator TAFT as well as by myself and all of the other members of my committee—Republicans and Democrats alike. It is Senate bill 337—the Federal aid to medical education bill, and it is wholeheartedly endorsed by the deans of our medical schools, by the presidents of our universities, and by the American Dental Association. In addition, it is endorsed by farm and labor groups, by church organizations, and by the American Legion and the Disabled Veterans of America. Yet without your aid and that of other groups throughout the land, this badly needed bill might not pass the Congress because it is opposed by one single organization—by the million-dollar lobby of the American Medical Association.

If we are to conquer muscular dystrophy and similar killers of our people, we must act on all three fronts. We must pass the survey of sickness bill now in the House—so that we may learn the facts. We must provide, through a combination of voluntary and of governmental effort, for greatly increased medical research. And we must pass the aid to medical education bill which is now before the Senate.

All three of these efforts are based on the principle that problems affecting the Nation's health are of concern to us all; that diseases which without warning can strike any family in the Nation warrant the attention of a Government representing those families; that such problems can best be solved when individual citizens join together to attack those problems through their own voluntary organizations and in partnership with their own Government.

It is in keeping with this principle that I urge the members of the Muscular Dystrophy Association to keep working, keep fighting, and in every possible way continue to give proof to the Congress and to the Nation that it is your intention not to rest until this serious malady is tracked down and overcome. With this fact made evident, I am confident that your Government will also assume its share of the responsibility.

And now, in closing, permit me to again express my sincere appreciation of your invitation to join with you today, and also to express my compliments to you for the magnificent effort your association is making in this great humane cause.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, last week the Independent Bankers Association of the United States met in annual meeting at Mobile, Ala. In attendance at the convention myself, I was privileged to introduce the principal speaker on the program—one of America's youngest, most forceful, and brilliant executives serving the Federal Government in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, Hon. Edward H. Foley, Jr., Under Secretary of the Treasury, needs no introduction to the Committee on Banking and Currency of either House nor, for that matter, to the great majority in both Houses here on Capitol Hill.

We know Edward Foley as an indefatigable worker. We know him as a man of great force and drive. We know him as a direct actionist and as a prudent, sagacious, and an able administrator. A graduate of Fordham University, one of America's greatest schools of law, he has long since distinguished himself for his aptitude and ability in that profession as well as in finance.

After having served as assistant general counsel as well as the general counsel of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works he was named assistant general counsel of the Treasury Department itself in 1937 and in May of 1939 was appointed general counsel of that most important department of government.

Resigning his Federal appointment at the outbreak of war, he joined up with the troops, was commissioned a lieutenant colonel and given an assignment as general counsel to the Quartermaster General of the United States Army.

In the following summer he was promoted to the rank of colonel and dispatched to Italy to serve as chief American financial representative of the Allied Control Commission. For his duty in this all-important task he was awarded the Legion of Merit for his distinguished military services in this field.

At the end of the war, Colonel Foley returned to civilian life as general counsel in the Office of Contract Termination and Settlement and was then appointed Under Secretary of the Treasury in 1948.

Known as the watchdog of the lend-lease program, he was given full charge of all Treasury's legal activities at the time that that Department was concerned with playing a major role in world affairs through the establishment of the lend-lease program with the embattled British Empire.

Congressional observers are universally agreed that much of the credit for the manner and the dispatch in which this major piece of legislation was administered belongs to Ed Foley, inasmuch as no small part of the work fell upon the broad shoulders of our great Under Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, in his address before the Independent Bankers Association, Mr. Foley, among other aspects of the Treasurer's duties, discussed the problem of the enforcement of income-tax evasion against characters of the underworld. In doing so, he pointed out that the activities of gamblers and racketeers with well advertised names—like the Capones, the Mickey Cohens, and others—who appeared before the Kefauver committee did not by any means represent the full problem of income-tax enforcement against that ilk or type of citizen.

For one racketeer—

Mr. Foley told the bankers—

with a widely advertised and well-known headline-rating name, such as appeared on television in the Kefauver committee investigation, there are scores upon scores of others about whom the general public rarely if ever heard but who deserve and, in fact, do get the internal revenue service's most energetic and effective attention.

In his address to the Independent Bankers Association, Under Secretary Foley called the roll of a few of the criminal-type characters who had been indicted, brought to trial, and fined or imprisoned, or who had received both penalties, on pleas and convictions involving violations of internal-revenue laws.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that while Mr. Foley spoke he held in his hand a mimeographed sheaf of papers containing the names of the very sort of persons to whom I refer. He stated that "long as it is, it is still merely a representative list 13 pages long, which the internal revenue services of the Treasury Department had previously presented to the Kefauver committee, setting forth the names and addresses of gamblers and other racketeers who operated in practically every State in the Union."

In almost every case—

Mr. Foley said—

the tax deficiencies and individual penalties assessed ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars and, in some cases, into the millions.

Mr. Speaker, in order that all my colleagues in this House may read one of the most interesting and factual addresses with respect to law enforcement by our Treasury Department, the activities of our Internal Revenue Bureau and other related agencies of Government, that could be made, I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks and include therein the speech made by Hon. Edward H. Foley, Jr., to the Independent Bankers Association, in Mobile, Ala.

The following is the address made by Under Secretary of the Treasury Edward H. Foley before the Independent Bankers Association at the Admiral Semmes Hotel, Mobile, Ala.:

It is an honor to address this gathering of members of the Independent Bankers Association. I am sure every one of you shares my happiness that for tonight's occasion you are convened in this splendid southern city. An unerring destiny long ago endowed Mobile with just about everything to produce a community that is at once beautiful and vital, pleasant, and industrious, restful, and animated.

Born and educated a New Yorker, I must confess that I am not yet completely familiar with all the details of the Mobile formula for city building. But I needed no more than my first acquaintance with this city some 15 years ago, when I addressed a meeting of the Alabama League of Municipalities in Mobile, to be prepared to recommend that formula strongly wherever I may go. Since then I have married one of Alabama's fairest, Emily Ligon, of Montgomery, and with justifiable pride I am happy to relate that the home of Mrs. Foley's parents, the late General and Mrs. Robert F. Ligon, only last January became the new Governor's mansion of this great State.

Many areas of the South have stepped out in front in recent years in planning and carrying through improvement programs. Mobile's great water-front development is particularly notable in this respect, and is a most impressive tribute to the initiative, pride, and civic spirit of its people.

Today we are all giving much thought to the resources on which we rely for defense, and Mobile rates very high among the bastions of production and transportation which dot our coast line.

Tonight I bring to you from Washington a report on another aspect of American strength and American defense. It is a report on a significant phase of that subject of universal interest and concern—Federal taxes.

It is not, let me say at the outset, a report on tax rates. The matter of rates is now before Congress. What I shall talk about tonight is even more important than rates, at least so far as basic and long-range considerations go. It is my purpose to remind you of the salient characteristics on which depend the whole vigor and power of the Federal tax system, and tell you what your Government is doing to protect that system from being undermined by the activities of certain classes of human termites abroad in the land.

You have heard news lately about the relations between the Treasury Department and some of these underworld characters: news of Ralph Capone being arrested at Chicago, of Mickey Cohen being indicted at Los Angeles, and of various similar happenings.

And this may surprise you: If you think those cases of which you have been hearing lately are highly unusual and out of the ordinary, you are mistaken. They are not. The Treasury Department's internal revenue service turns up cases of this nature year after year. Long and painstaking investigations are completed, charges are filed or indictments returned, and fines or prison sentences or both are imposed. If the cases happen to reach the charge-filing stage while some important public inquiry, such as that of the Kefauver committee, is under way, then they rate headlines.

I am glad indeed that this country has had the benefit of the Kefauver committee's work. The committee's program has been of peculiar interest to me because I am the Treasury official designated by Secretary Snyder to supervise the activities of the Department's six law-enforcement agencies.

The Treasury sought to give—and I think did give—to the Kefauver committee the fullest measure of cooperation. Certainly the committee was entitled to nothing less than that.

As to income-tax affairs, however, I am concerned lest misconceptions should gain currency in connection with such discussions and disclosures. I think we must be sure that the conclusions we reach are in correct perspective and reflect a proper emphasis.

For instance, I do not think we can allow the fidelity with which the revenue service administers the income-tax laws to be measured solely in terms of the number of criminal prosecutions it is able to bring, through the Department of Justice, against the Cohens and the Capones.

Not for one minute, let me assure you, will the Service ever ease the pressure it maintains against those notorious boys. But for one Cohen, one Capone, there are scores of less widely advertised tax evaders of the same general stripe, some of them differing little from the "big fellows" even in the amounts of money out of which they try to cheat the Government.

Let me show you what I am talking about. I have here a mimeographed list of names of the sort of people to whom I refer. It is a list 13 pages long which the internal revenue service presented to the Kefauver committee on Tuesday, March 27. The names are those of alleged gamblers, racketeers, and others in the criminal element who have run afoul of the income-tax laws since 1945.

It is merely a "representative list," 150 names, or thereabouts, from a record of 1,500 cases, involving all classes of taxpayers from all parts of the country, in which criminal prosecutions were recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and instituted by United States attorneys.

Here is another list which we handed to the Kefauver committee—34 closely typed pages, this one—giving factual summaries of some of the representative cases prosecuted during the fiscal year 1946 or later. These, I repeat, were cases in which tax evaders allegedly derived their income from such criminal enterprises as gambling, the numbers racket, lotteries, slot machines, extortion, abortion mills, graft and corruption, and vice.

Does the revenue service really make it hot for tax evaders of the gambler and racketeer kind? In these documents you have a pretty conclusive answer. Yes, it does!

We have in this country a self-assessment, voluntary payment system of income taxation. Congress established that system because it accords with the American concept of maximum of individual responsibility and a minimum of Government supervision. It is a fixture in our body of law. Each individual squares his own return with the law's requirements as to reportable income, deductions and credits. We have no Gestapo to look over the taxpayer's shoulder.

In general, this self-assessment, voluntary payment system works pretty well. Nearly all Americans have a sense of responsibility for the common good, and it impels them to try to be honest about their tax payments. Most mistakes in returns are honest ones, with nothing deliberate about them.

The square shooters among taxpayers are entitled to know that they will pay only their fair share of the necessary expense of Government services and protection. They are entitled to know that the proper attention will be paid to those who try deliberately to dodge their tax responsibilities. If in some cases proper attention means the threat or imposition of severe criminal penalties, then the honest taxpayers must know that those penalties are being enforced.

And here let me urge on you an inquiring mind toward any aspersions on the revenue service which you may chance to hear. Before you allow your confidence in the efficiency and the integrity of the service to be shaken, let me urge you to call for more than blanket accusations and vague implications against this vitally important arm of your Government.

I want to tell you a story I heard the other day which is illustrative of the way I feel about the Treasury.

It is the story of a young farmer who assaulted a tramp with a stick of cordwood and wound up in jail. His lawyer finally came to see him and asked, "Jim, how did you come to hit this fellow? You know, you almost killed him. He is in the hospital now and may not live. 'Whatever made you do it?"

"Well, Mr. Smith," said Jim, "you see it was like this. This feller came by the farm the other night, and I invited him in for supper. Right away he started criticizing the furniture. Well, I let that pass because our furniture ain't any great snakes at best. Then he teed off on the food. Well, I let that pass, too. A lot of times my wife's cooking leaves a little something to be desired. Then my wife came in out of the kitchen, and he jumped on her. He said, 'Say, you ain't nothin' but an old bag, are you?' Well, I didn't do nothing about that 'cause as a matter of fact, when she gets that wrapper on, she don't exactly look like Cleopatra, anyway. But then, by jiminies, he started in on the Treasury Department. That was too much for me, so I let him have it."

If you are inclined to wonder why the revenue service does not rush forward with a defense of itself every time some allegation of laxity or favoritism is made, let me remind you that disclosures of individual income tax returns and related records may, under the law, be made only through court proceedings or under certain conditions to committees of Congress.

Public cooperation, confident and sustained, with the revenue service, keeps our Federal tax system working. I think that you and I and all the other individuals who make up the public, must guard carefully against contributing in an ill-considered way to the weakening of the cooperation.

Let me tell you with the utmost sincerity that your confidence in the revenue service is fully merited. Its personnel enforces the tax laws vigorously, honestly, and impartially.

During the years of my association with the Treasury Department in various capacities from general counsel to Under Secretary, the number of employees of the Internal Revenue service who have betrayed their trust has been infinitesimal. And the departure of these very, very few from the path of rectitude has, in every case that I recall, been discovered through the pride and precautions of the service itself.

You perhaps read in recent months of a blast of criticism against the revenue service issued by the California Crime Commission. When the blast was reduced, through careful analysis, to factual elements, it involved asserted misdeeds of two or three deputies in the California and Nevada collection offices. We stated publicly, by way of comment, that Treasury investigations into these misdeeds had been under way for some time. Since then, on the evidence our investigators obtained, two employees have been fired, and one of them and a former employee have been indicted.

I don't want to burden you with figures. But perhaps a few will be helpful.

The revenue service has at present 55,500 employees.

It administers not only the individual income tax, but 78 other Federal tax levies.

The tax returns which must be received and processed each year number 90,000,000.

In addition, about 120,000,000 related documents, such as records of income tax withholdings, must be received and processed.

Last year the revenue service collected nearly $39,000,000,000. This fiscal year the total will rise to almost $48,000,000,000. In the fiscal year 1952 it probably will reach $60,000,000,000.

The annual costs of the service total about $246,000,000, so that the expense of collecting each $100 of revenue is about 59 cents.

But that 59 cents per $100 is an average figure. What keeps it so low is the fact that 90 percent of the taxes are paid voluntarily by those honest and straightforward citizens to whom I referred earlier.

It takes half of the entire Revenue Service personnel to collect the other 10 percent of the Federal taxes. This half, 26,000 persons, is assigned to what we call front-line enforcement, beginning with the sifting out of returns which appear deserving of close scrutiny, and proceeding through the whole catalog of enforcement work right up to the handling of the cases against the Cohens and the Capones.

When an enforcement case bears the earmarks of fraud it is taken over by the special agents of the Revenue Service Intelligence Unit. During 1950, 314 cases involving racketeers and gamblers received the attention of the Intelligence Unit investigators. They constituted more than 12 percent of all fraud investigations which that Unit conducted. And they turned up $24,000,000 in additional taxes and penalties proposed for assessment. They also resulted in 1932 recommendations for criminal prosecutions.

A new step has just been taken to render front-line enforcement still more effective. By direction of Secretary Snyder, the Revenue Service is now in process of organizing a Special Fraud Section, made up of investigators who have shown superior skill at breaking through the false financial fronts of the big-time tax evaders. This section will devote its entire time to inquiries into tax dodging by gamblers, racketeers, and others of the confirmed criminal stripe.

I am willing to prophesy that the work of this Special Fraud Section will be productive of many violent headaches for racketeers and gangsters in the days to come.

But I distinctly do not want to prophesy that the activities of the Special Fraud Section, or indeed any other portion of the Revenue Service, will obviate the necessity for greater vigilance on the part of local law-enforcement authorities against all maner of racketeer and gangster criminality.

Almost every day some writer or speaker implies publicly that the Revenue Service should bear general law-enforcement responsibilities, and is in fact to blame for the very existence of gambling and racketeering. For this attitude there is no basis in present public policy as expressed in the Federal statutes. Nor is there any basis for it in the Service's appropriations and its manpower situation.

If State and local governments are to remain impotent against the leaders of organized crime, then the question presents itself whether we should enact Federal laws aimed directly, or as directly as constitutional limitations will permit, at the basic crimes of which the hoodlums are guilty. There is little logic in reliance on the Federal tax laws for the general punishment of State and local gambling and similar crimes, as distinguished from the punishment of the crime of Federal income-tax evasion.

Even for more effective Federal tax enforcement, our laws have some shortcomings. We have our problems of income-tax law enforcement just as the Kefauver committee found itself facing problems of how to elicit information from recalcitrant witnesses. And the Kefauver committee, of course, had all the power of Congress behind it to punish contemptuous and lying witnesses.

The very nature of our voluntary self-assessment tax system requires a specially diligent effort to make it work with respect to those who derive their income from illegal enterprises. They are not the sort of people whose records can be relied upon, and our agents are not so naive as to think they can be. This forces our investigators many times to put in long months of work gathering the most difficult varieties of evidence to create a net worth case. Sometimes the job is an almost impossible one.

Suggestions for revision of the tax statutes are now being studied for the Congress by a subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee. These suggestions would fortify the tax code against evasions of the types of which I have spoken. Generally, they would give our agents a stronger hand in dealing with willful cases of improper returns and improper tax records.

In closing, I want to repeat some remarks by Secretary Snyder which I had the privilege of reading for him before the Kefauver committee at the last of its public sessions, a short time ago. The Secretary said:

"Our common purpose is to protect a priceless national asset. That asset is public confidence that the affairs of Government, and in particular the affairs of the Internal Revenue Service, are being properly conducted. The responsibility for keeping this confidence inviolate rests upon us all.

"We in the Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service give our best efforts to the preservation and strengthening of that confidence. We have every official reason and every personal reason to do so.

"On the personal score we share the concern of every American for the safety of the country and the preservation of our liberties. And we know that our success in collecting the huge revenues required for national defense is dependent in tremendous measure on every honest taxpayer having assurance that the revenue service will leave nothing undone to bring chiselers to justice.

"There is full warrant in the Revenue Service record for every taxpayer to accept that assurance as an established fact. Bringing chiselers to justice has always been the service's determined policy, and continues to be its pledge."

Air Power in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK T. BOW
OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I read with great interest an article in the February 17 Saturday Evening Post entitled "The Truth About Our Air Power," by Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force.

I served as a combat war correspondent in the South Pacific and took part in the liberation of the Philippines. I found myself in agreement with many of the statements of General Vandenberg.

Because of recent events, I have reread the article to which I refer, and I believe there are several paragraphs in this article giving the views of the Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force which will clarify some of the issues being debated today. I quote, in part, from General Vandenberg's article:

It is not my province or my intention to criticize the decision of the United Nations which prevented air strikes at the Manchurian troops and supply depots supporting the Chinese. Isolating the battlefield from reinforcements is the prime function of tactical air, and I am simply stating the military fact that air power was rendered practically inoperative when the U. N., in an effort to avoid a diplomatic rupture with the Chinese Communists, halted offensive action at the Yalu River, the boundary between Manchuria and Korea. U. N. pilots scrupulously obeyed orders by cutting bridges across the Yalu only on the Korean side, but those measures were nullified when the Yalu froze solidly, forming a natural bridge for the Chinese to move up with enough food and light-arms ammunition on their backs to sustain them for weeks.

I believe of further interest is the following statement of General Vandenberg:

A controversy affecting the lives of soldiers cannot be settled by lining up votes as in a popularity contest. It is resolved by weighing the best methods for achieving desired results. All right. The job of tactical aviation is to help win the air war and to weaken the ability of the enemy's ground forces to impede and damage your people.

Mr. Speaker, shall we continue to render our Air Force inoperative in Korea, and permit the continued toll of lives of American troops, which might be saved?

Gen. Douglas MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein excerpts from a sermon delivered last Sunday in the German Congregational Church at Clinton, Mass., by its able and distinguished pastor, the Reverend Harold S. Winship, sergeant major of a machine gun battalion in France during World War I, on the subject of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

None of the many messages I have received on this subject in recent days is couched in such eloquent and balanced language. I am desirous that the House and the Nation should have the opportunity to read it.

Patriotic sentiments contained in this and many of the messages I have received, all point toward the fact that the American people are aroused to the need for decision, unity, and strength in national policy and expect the Congress to discharge its full constitutional duty in promoting these ends. The above-mentioned follows:

GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

Millions of Americans, through the miracle of radio and television, were deeply impressed when Gen. Douglas MacArthur spoke at the joint meeting of Congress. Why is it that the minds and hearts of so many Americans were stirred and touched and inspired with deep feeling and exalted emotion? Because there stood before us the noble figure of a real man, a true Christian, and a great American.

General MacArthur, in his appearance, his character, and his daily life, is a real man. His splendid physical condition, his self-control over mind and body, and the spirit shown in his words to his fellow Americans—all reveal him as a real man, a man's man, a woman's ideal man.

He stood before us as a courageous Christian—believing in the principles of Christianity, upon which our Constitution is based, believing in the power of prayer to Almighty God, the God of all nations, the Ruler of the universe. What an inspiration it is to us all to see an international leader take such a stand.

General MacArthur made a profound patriotic impression upon his fellow citizens as a great American. His words aroused our enthusiasm, they inspired our renewed loyalty and devotion to our country, and it seemed as if his return home and his presence among us symbolized new hope and stronger faith in the future of our United States of America.

Coal Mines of Pennsylvania Contribute To Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article taken from the Times-Leader, the Evening News, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., entitled "Coal Mines of Pennsylvania Contribute to Nation":

COAL MINES OF PENNSYLVANIA CONTRIBUTE TO NATION—12,438,552,000 TONS MINED SINCE EARLIEST TIMES

No greater evidence of human energy exists anywhere in the world than that expended, over the years, in digging the coal of Pennsylvania. From the earliest record of mining to the present date, 12,438,552,000 net tons of coal have been removed from under the hills and valleys of Pennsylvania. For many years Pennsylvania mines were producing more than half of the fuel energy of the Nation. Today the State planning board of the Pennsylvania Department of Commerce estimates that with the addition of the relatively small, but highly valuable petroleum output of the Commonwealth and its developed water power, our State's mines produce one-seventh of all energy consumed in America.

In the total of Pennsylvania coal production, anthracite, the earliest form of coal in use in our State, represents about 40 percent of all the coal ever mined in our Commonwealth, though that type of coal comes from a relatively restricted area. Today, Pennsylvania produces about half of all the anthracite mined in the world.

To form some notion of how much actual work is represented by the mining of Pennsylvania coal almost staggers the imagination. The Panama Canal has, in recent years, represented the greatest engineering achievement of the modern world. The construction of that Canal required the removal of 240,000,000 cubic yards of earth. Pennsylvania's coal mined out to the end of 1950 represents a total of more than 17,000,000,000 cubic yards, or a total equal to the bulk of material involved in the digging of 71 channels as long and deep as the Panama Canal. As a matter of fact, in many single years, Pennsylvania miners have removed more material than was involved in the digging of that great passageway between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

One more comparison might perhaps help us to understand the tremendous contribution made by our State to the settlement and development of this Nation.

In the ancient world, the great Pyramid of Egypt was universally regarded as being the greatest single monument ever constructed by human labor. In the accuracy of design and in the great bulk of its stone work, it is still, quite properly, one of the wonders of the world. It required, over many years, the slave labor of possibly 100,000 men. Massive as that great structure is, and impressive to all who are fortunate enough to see it, the actual bulk of the Pyramid represents only some 3,400,000 cubic yards. In some recent years, the bulk of coal removed from Pennsylvania's mines has represented a volume of material more than 80 times that of the great Pyramid and represents a far greater achievement. It is, in fact, an enduring monument to the thousands of freemen whose energy and skill, over the past 125 years, has done so much to make possible the material progress of our Nation and to create the industrial power which enables us to defend before the world the American system of free enterprise.

Former Governor of Oregon Speaks on MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Charles A. Sprague, former Republican Governor of the State of Oregon, has long held a position of leadership in Oregon politics and affairs. Governor Sprague spearheads political thinking in keeping with the best tradition of liberalism. Always a careful student of affairs, the Governor is to be commended for his straightforward thinking regarding General MacArthur and his return to the United States as he writes in his Salem (Oreg.) Statesman column, It Seems to Me, April 12, 1951:

IT SEEMS TO ME

(By Charles A. Sprague)

The first duty of a soldier is to obey orders. General MacArthur failed to obey the orders of his Commander in Chief. I do not see that President Truman had any alternative than to remove him from his command. This is a very unfortunate termination of a brilliant military career, but the general has invited this summary action by the President.

Partisans of MacArthur and foes of Mr. Truman are having success in stirring up public emotions against the President. That is not surprising, and surely was anticipated by Truman. Yet he had the courage to brave that reaction, proving that he had at least one of the qualities of a commander.

Over a considerable period of time MacArthur has been insubordinate in trying by public statement and personal interview to dictate the international policy this country should adopt. These statements have been disruptive, dividing opinion within the country and causing friction with our allies. Such conduct could not be tolerated by the Chief Executive who is charged with prime responsibility in this area. Truman is our President, not MacArthur; and Truman is the one the people should rally behind and support in this time of crisis, not the general who sought to force his own will on our Government and on United Nations.

I have the opinion that much of the furore that is raised over the President's action, and the calls for impeaching the President are rooted less in admiration for MacArthur than in hatred of the President or in a design to wreck his political power. The baying of the wolves for Dean Acheson's blood starts again. One can see the planning of a Roman triumph on MacArthur's return. The general himself with his sense of history, probably regards himself as another Caesar, proconsul of Gaul, about to cross the Rubicon to challenge those in seats of power.

When the emotional storm is over somber judgment will affirm the decision of President Truman. We cannot have divided authority in the conduct of our foreign and military affairs.

Harry S. Truman, President, Versus Douglas MacArthur, General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, never since Pearl Harbor have so many of our people been so deeply aroused.

On June 26, President Truman, without the consent of the Congress, involved us in world war III. As Commander in Chief, he ordered our Armed Forces to fight that war under General MacArthur's orders.

Our men, the foot soldiers—your sons and husbands—went in, fought heroically and—it seems unbelievable—when they appeared to be winning against overwhelming odds, President Truman, Commander in Chief and MacArthur's superior, ordered him not to accept the aid of the 500,000 Chinese Nationalists who wanted to cross to China's mainland from the Island of Formosa, and, on the flank or in the rear, attack the Chinese Communists who had entered the war.

MacArthur was told that he must not use our bombers or air force beyond a certain point to destroy the enemy's supply lines, ammunition dumps or rest areas.

By his orders, President Truman created a "sanctuary," "cities of refuge," to which—as a criminal in biblical times—Communists might flee and find safety.

The result of this order was that, when MacArthur's men went forward, fought and drove the enemy back to a certain line—at one time, the thirty-eighth parallel—there they must stop. Beyond that line the enemy might not be pursued; back of it he might find safety, sanctuary, rest, and, with reinforcements, launch another offensive—and so on, ad infinitum.

Had General Eisenhower in World War II been likewise denied the use of the bombers which destroyed Germany's munitions of war, her submarine bases, that war never could have been won.

Permit an illustration: A football team has a game on. Its opponent is superior in weight; has greater reserve strength in every position. It is told to win. It has outstanding passers, triple-threat men, but the coach says it must not use the pass nor its open-field runners after it reaches the opponent's 38-yard line. It must just buck the center where it is outweighed, outplayed.

The situation in Korea was intolerable. General MacArthur was ordered to fight and, one would assume, win a war. But he was also ordered not to seek the aid of millions of Chinese Nationalists who wanted to fight the Chinese Communists; ordered not to use his bombers to attack the enemy behind the battleline—not to use methods which would aid in winning.

That meant that our men, under General MacArthur—and more than 9,000 have been killed; they have suffered upward of 60,000 casualties—could not win the war in Korea. It meant that the war would continue indefinitely. With this opinion, General Ridgway, who has succeeded General MacArthur in command in the Far East, agreed when he said:

> I see no end to the military operations unless there is a political settlement.

Unfortunately, the politicians in U. N. and here at home have not yet charted their course. The representatives of Britain and France argue with those from Russia and India. The representatives from our country, which has furnished 90 percent of the men, done 90 percent of the fighting, suffered 94.6 percent of the casualties in Korea, apparently await the outcome of that political argument. Our men fight on.

President Truman put us into this war. He is a politician, and the politicians have been running it. General MacArthur is a professional soldier and, as President Truman admits, one of the greatest. Being a patriotic American and a professional soldier, he could not quietly submit, remain silent, while American soldiers were being needlessly slaughtered; their efforts to win the war thwarted. He protested. Because he protested the restrictions which hindered the war effort, he was relieved of command.

President Truman now charges that General MacArthur seeks to involve us in world war III. How false. How absurd. All he asked was that we either get out of this war, or that he be permitted to use established, proven military tactics to win that war as quickly as possible at the least cost in human lives.

President Truman ordered our men into world war III in Asia. His orders created a stalemate there. Indications are that he will follow the policy of United Nations which would give Korea and Formosa to the Communists; make futile the sacrifices of our men who have died there; absurd his contention that we seek through war to contain communism.

Do not be deceived by Mr. Truman's attempt to brand General MacArthur and his supporters as warmongers. President Truman is the man who is now seeking an army of three and one-half million or four million men, evidently for the purpose of sending them to Europe, where they may become involved in world war III.

Mr. Truman chose to disregard the advice of MacArthur, the outstanding patriot, administrator, and military expert. Mr. Truman chooses to follow the ruinous policy of Mr. Acheson, who has always been sympathetic toward British interests; whose acts so often have resulted in the advancement of communism.

As Commander in Chief, Mr. Truman had authority to recall General MacArthur. To millions of Americans that seems to be the most tragic mistake which he, a man of many mistakes, has made as President.

The President's removal of General MacArthur, his acceptance of Acheson's policies, has aroused the Nation as it never has been aroused since Pearl Harbor. Acheson's removal is demanded. Congress is asked to impeach the President.

Because President Truman ordered our men into a war where they are being killed, but follows a policy which prohibits the effective use of our Air Force which would save the lives of many of our men, in my judgment the Congress should make every effort to oust him from office.

With a corrupt political machine at his back, Congress may not be successful in that effort. But if the people will continue vigorously to express their desires as they have been doing since General MacArthur's removal, there is hope that Acheson, the supporter of Hiss, may be fired, the country saved from disaster by a Congress fully aware and mindful of their constituents' demands.

Overlong the people have condoned Mr. Truman's shortcomings, put up with a complacent Congress. Our danger now is that they may fail to continue their opposition until they have opportunity in 1952 to restore this Government to the people.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. VAUGHAN GARY

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a portion of my weekly radio broadcast to my constituents on April 21, 1951:

Fellow citizens of the Third Congressional District, all other news in Washington this week was overshadowed by the appearance of Gen. Douglas MacArthur before the joint meeting of the Congress of the United States on Thursday.

He was a dramatic figure as he strode down the center aisle of the House past his young son, Arthur, who was sitting with the high Army officials in the front aisle seat. He appeared a little tense as he entered the door, but after he had mounted the platform and waved to Mrs. MacArthur, who was sitting on the front row in the gallery, his tension disappeared and he immediately became master of the situation.

General MacArthur's address to the Congress was magnificent. His voice and delivery were superb and his persuasive eloquence made a strong emotional appeal to the entire audience.

With the greater portion of the text of his speech no true American could take exception. It did, however, raise several issues upon which the future security of America depends and it also raised certain questions which demand the immediate investigation of the Congress.

There appears to be a wide difference of opinion between General MacArthur and the administration with respect to our far eastern policies. If the Joint Chiefs of Staff agree with General MacArthur, as he said, the Congress and our people should know that fact. Inquiry should be made by the Congress as to what military assistance this country will have to contribute to the forces of the Republic of China on Formosa to support their effective operation against the Chinese mainland. The ultimate effect of such operations must also be considered. The military advantage must be judged in the light of our global policy, our commitments to the United Nations and our program of cooperation with our allies.

General MacArthur stated that if we bomb the Chinese bases in Manchuria and give support to the forces of Chiang Kai-shek, the Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves. We were told the same thing concerning the Chinese Communists when we crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea. Certainly the intervention of Russia is a factor to be reckoned with and seriously considered before we extend the Korean conflict.

General MacArthur has rendered a great public service in so forcibly presenting these issues. He will not fade away as he predicted. The fact that he is now free to express himself on American policies offers him the greatest opportunity of his brilliant career.

Already General MacArthur and the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been invited to appear as witnesses before appropriate committees of the Congress so that their views may be presented and weighed. These issues should not be determined on the basis of a clash of personalities. They are of far greater importance than the welfare of either Mr. Truman or General MacArthur.

Your Representative will follow the testimony before the congressional committees with interest and support those policies which appear to be for the best interests of the Nation. Frankness compels me to say, however, that I am opposed to the appeasement of communism in any part of the world. I agree with General MacArthur that "history teaches with unmistakable emphasis that appeasement but begets new and bloodier war." On the other hand, I do not favor starting a big war in China for the purpose of winning a little war in Korea.

It is a tragedy that in the midst of this debate, so vital to our national security, Senator Arthur Vandenberg, the chief author and exponent of our present bipartisan foreign policy, has passed away. No Member of the entire Congress has contributed more to the advancement of world peace than Senator Vandenberg. His views on foreign policy were respected by Republicans and Democrats alike. His services in the Senate have been sorely missed during his prolonged illness. Following his death on Wednesday night, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Thursday approved a formal resolution praising its former chairman and member for his "wisdom, judgment, and patriotism." It is a great pity that the Nation will not have the benefit of his vision, judgment, and nonpartisan approach in the determination of the grave problems which confront us.

Farm Credit Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT E. JONES, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, on February 14 I introduced H. R. 2642 because today there is hardly anything more important to the farmers of the deep South than a sound agricultural program and the credit to finance it.

And of all the things which a farmer needs if he is to do his part in the war effort, the most important is credit. With it, he can get the other things he needs, or do the job which must be done on his farm. H. R. 2642 provides a credit program which will enable farmers to take advantage of the present opportunities to engage successfully in livestock, dairy and poultry production.

H. R. 2642 does not sponsor credit that competes with banks. The loans it deals with are only made to farmers who cannot get financed elsewhere. H. R. 2642 will also develop efficient farm owners.

In farm visits in my own district and throughout the South I have talked to persons who really know farmers and farming, and in their opinion, the farmer is expected to take run-down land, insufficient or inefficient operating equipment, a sorry home and without any help from outside, grow on that farm not only what he needs to feed his own family but also to feed the city production worker and the members of our Armed Forces.

We would not say to a soldier fighting in Korea, "Here is a chuck of wood and a lump of iron ore. Make yourself a gun and beat these Communists." Yet in effect that is what we tell the farmer everytime we deny him credit to buy the seed, feed, livestock, equipment, buildings, or land he needs.

We would not tell the worker in an airplane factory, "Here is a binful of aluminum ore. Use only your hands, but build us an airplane strong enough to defend this Nation." Yet, again, in effect, that is what we are telling the farmer when we ask him to grow the food we need without making it possible for him to do the job. He needs and we must supply credit to do the job.

In 1947 farmers had $18,000,000,000 net farm income. But since 1947 that farm income has been dropping each year as the prices which farmers pay for their equipment and other farm needs rise more rapidly or decline more slowly than the prices farmers receive for the crops and livestock they grow. Last year the farmer's net income was under $13,000,000,000. While that sounds like quite a bit, over 6,000,000 farmers shared it and the average farmer's net income was only about $2,000.

Almost the cheapest form of city labor gets more for his year's work than that and does not have to take the gamble that the farmer takes.

Almost 3,000,000 farmers, in fact, had gross incomes under $1,500 last year. Out of that they had to pay farm-operating expenses, family living expenses, and to buy whatever seed, feed, fertilizer, or equipment they needed for the next year's crop. They could not possibly do it without credit.

A few of these farmers could get the credit they need from local banks, but not many. With incomes so low, they have not been able to build up the chattels they need for bank security. Even when they can get credit locally, usually the terms require repayment in a short period of time, and these farmers need long repayment periods so they can pay out of increased farm income rather than by selling capital goods. If, for example, a farmer borrows to buy dairy cows, and has to repay the loan in 9 months, then he has to sell the cows to pay the loan and all the benefit he receives is his milk check during the 9-month period.

On the other hand, if he had a long-time loan—say, a 7-year loan such as he might get under H. R. 2642—he should have a number of calves born during that period. He can save some of them to build up his herd, and with the money he gets from the sale of the others and from 7 years of income from milk, he can repay the loan and still have the nucleus of a good herd.

H. R. 2642 makes that type of credit available to the farmer who needs it. It provides a period long enough to repay the loan out of increased farm income instead of sale of capital goods. One indication of the need for this type of credit is the fact that the Farmers Home Administration who now make this type of loan received over 110,000 applications for farm credit during the past 7 months.

Present legislation limits to 5 years the time any borrower may have to repay these Government operating-credit loans. In many cases this is enough; but where the farmer needs to make a complete adjustment in his operations he may require a longer time. In my district, for example, the typical pattern of agriculture has been cotton raising. Today many of these cotton farmers are learning that their farming enterprises are more sound if they also raise other crops and carry livestock. The number of dairy farms in my district is increasing rapidly, and these dairy farmers are getting milk checks every month instead of a cotton check once a year. And their land benefits by being in grass instead of row crops.

But it takes time and money to convert from cotton raising to livestock. A cotton farmer who changes over to a dairyman must develop his pastures, then build a dairy herd. Records kept by the Farmers Home Administration indicate that of the 27,755 borrowers who repaid their operating loans in full during the 1950 fiscal year, 21.5 percent of the borrowers were indebted to the agency longer than 5 years. These farmers proved that they could be successful by earning enough from their farm to repay the loans while supporting their families, but under present laws the Government, after 1951, will allow these potentially successful farmers only 5 years to succeed. H. R. 2642 would allow up to 7 years, a far more realistic figure.

Extending the repayment period and increasing the number of years that a borrower may be assisted are needed to provide a more effective system of credit where larger amounts of credit are required to allow needed expansion or reorganization in farming enterprises.

The bill will also permit loaning larger amounts to a farmer and that too will help his transition to a sounder farming economy.

The bill will also help our Nation's economy by making it possible for more farmers to own their land than to be tenants or sharecroppers on it. The owner husbands his land resources better, tries to build it up, takes an active part in his community affairs. The tenant moves from farm to farm, and seldom remains fixed in one place long enough to build up the land or take an active part in community affairs.

Deep down in the heart of every farmer is an ingrained desire to own his own farm, to have a little bit of America he can call his own. That is real Americanism. The banks know that many of these tenant farmers are good farmers and would be good landowners if given a chance, but the bank's regulations will not permit making long-term real-estate loans to them.

H. R. 2642 helps the banks to make such loans, and to safeguard their own interests, too. The bill broadens the base of the insured mortgage loan program established by the Farmers Home Administration Act of 1946 so that more local banks can lend money to qualified farmers to become farm owners, and have those loans guaranteed by Government.

This insured mortgage program has been growing in importance each year as more and more banks and other private lenders make loans to qualified farmers and accept Government guaranties of repayment and government servicing of all work connected with making or collecting the loans. It has been estimated that 6,000 such loans will be insured—creating 6,000 new farm owners or making family farms out of two small units in this country—during the coming year. Department officials estimate that at peak capacity the program could create or strengthen 30,000 family farms each year if the provisions of H. R. 2642 were in effect. That amounts to only about 10 per county, and surely all Members of Congress know that in their own districts—unless they represent a purely urban area—there are far more than 10 qualified farmers who should be allowed the privilege of family farm ownership.

The bill also broadens the program of real estate development loans to farmers who need to improve their land and buildings to make their farms efficient operating units. It is just as important to help a small farm owner develop his farm as it is to make an owner out of a tenant.

I therefore offer H. R. 2642 as a method of solving many of the farmer's financial problems. With its aid, I believe we can benefit the farmer, the community, and the entire Nation. It provides the farmer adequate credit to do the job which must be done on our farms. It provides money which will be spent in the local community. It insures our Nation of the food and fiber needed by our defense program.

Safety, Health, and Welfare of Inductees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, the letter printed below received from General Hershey certainly shows the need for a coordinated program in our armed services:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1951.

Hon. WILLIAM H. AYRES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. AYRES: This will acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 17, enclosing a clipping from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, April 13, containing the adverse comments of a father and mother who visited their son stationed at Keesler Field, Biloxi, Miss. You also express the opinion that it is my responsibility to see that youths inducted under the Selective Service Act are not subjected to the conditions that apparently exist in the vicinity of Keesler Field, Miss.

Under the present Selective Service Act, the Selective Service System is responsible for the registration, classification, and delivery of its registrants to the Armed Forces induction stations for physical examination or induction. The moment they enter the Armed Forces they are outside the responsibility of the Selective Service System and there is nothing that the Selective Service System can do under the law with regard to the conditions of which your constituent complains. Incidentally, no registrants were inducted pursuant to 1948 Selective Service Act, into the United States Air Force, which prefers to recruit by voluntary enlistment.

While I am in sympathy with, and sincerely appreciate the misgivings of, these parents, I believe that the problem involved must be solved by the Armed Forces in coordination and cooperation with State, county, and city authorities in the neighborhood of military installations.

The Senate version of the Universal Training and Service Act now pending in Congress contained a provision for the establishment of a National Security Training Commission which would have the responsibility for establishing policies and standards with respect to the conduct of initial basic training (including the moral, religious, recreational, informational, and educational phases of such training) of the trainees. The House version provides that the Commission is to direct and control the basic military training of the National Security Training Corps, establishing such policies and standards with respect to the conduct of initial military training, as are necessary, making adequate provisions for the moral and spiritual welfare of the trainees. The Commission is required, among oth r things, to prepare and submit to Congress plans covering measures for the personal safety, health, welfare, and morals of the members of the National Security Training Corps and to prescribe a code of conduct. These directives of the Congress, in my opinion, are steps in the right direction as far as the members of the National Security Training Corps are concerned. However, as far as the Selective Service System is concerned it has no authority or responsibility over its registrants once they are inducted into the Armed Forces.

It would appear that the questions raised by you more properly come within the sphere of the Department of Defense and I am, therefore, taking the liberty of referring your communication to the Secretary of Defense for his consideration. It is hoped that this disposition of the matter will satisfactorily serve your purpose, and I regret that I cannot be more helpful in this situation.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS B. HERSHEY,
Director.

The Role of MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from Life magazine:

THE ROLE OF MACARTHUR—HE HAS A HISTORIC OPPORTUNITY TO BRING FOCUS AND FORCE TO UNITED STATES POLICY

General MacArthur has a great role—a role of greatness—to play in this country now.

The size of the role is indicated by the fact that he was ousted for no petty reason but because he chose to challenge the whole drift of events and the dominant attitudes of the Government of the United States and of the United Nations.

If we remind ourselves of some of MacArthur's distinguishing qualities and characteristics, we shall be able to sketch the nature of the role itself and his fitness for it.

MacArthur is a man of the west, a man of Asia, and an American.

MacArthur is a man of the west. At all those times when we are not bogged down in trivialities, we realize that it is nothing less than western civilization itself which is in peril in this generation. The peril comes not only from the external barbarian but from weakness and betrayal—or sheer stupidity—within. MacArthur is a man deeply of the west. He knows its history—its spiritual no less than its military history. Greece, Rome, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, the age of Britain's greatness—all the splendid and tragic meanings of the drama of these centuries are the constant prompters of his mind and spirit.

MacArthur is a man of Asia. Nothing is sillier than the glib punditing that MacArthur is interested in Asia at the expense of Europe. As a matter of fact, if Truman had been inspired, he would have sent MacArthur to Europe and Eisenhower to Asia. Within a week, Eisenhower, an intensely practical soldier, would have seen how right MacArthur is about Asia. Within a week, all Europe would have recognized the truth of what we have said above about MacArthur. But it is significant and terribly important that MacArthur is a man of Asia. He is today the only man of the west who has in Asia not only immense prestige but also the devoted loyalty of millions and millions of Asians. True, he has bitter enemies there. But who are they? They are the Communists and their dupes. For the people of Japan, for the people of the Philippines and of other islands, for the hundreds of thousands of anti-Communists in China, MacArthur is a great symbol. How do they think of him? As imperialist? Conqueror? No—as liberator and friend.

HIS QUALITIES FIT OUR NEEDS

MacArthur is an American. He has not been in this country for 13 years. He may be "out of touch," as his enemies hope and some friends fear. But his is not the pulse-taking patriotism and he is certainly not the typical American of this or any week's Gallup poll. He is something more important: he is the basic American. Indelibly stamped upon his character are the basic precepts by which this Nation has lived and either will live or, in denial of them, perish.

Besides being a man of the west, a man of Asia, and an American, MacArthur is a number of other things. He is a master of his profession—the profession of arms. This he considers to be an honorable profession; he has served it with honor. He is a statesman—a title which few can claim today but which he earned in Japan by a performance without precedent in history.

Finally, MacArthur, though he may be charged with vanity has the humility to believe in God. This last fact has an important consequence for this hour. For it means that for him it is impossible to divorce policy and action from moral principle. He may not always do the right thing, he may do wrong; the point is that for him right and wrong are basic considerations.

Applying these characteristics of MacArthur to our present confused and perilous situation, we see how aptly they fit our needs.

We need a man of the west because we need a grand alliance of all those national and spiritual elements in Europe and the Americas which are still in allegiance to the highest ideals of the west and which refuse suicide and cynicism. (We can't win the struggle for the world through vulgar, ignorant, provincial nationalism on either side of the Atlantic.) But the leader of the west—whether as spokesman or statesman—must be an American; for circumstances have devolved the task of leadership upon this country. We need a man of the west who, by deeds and character, is accepted as a true friend of Asia in travail. We need, above all, a man of moral principles—that is to say, of moral principles clearly understood so that the policy and action he proposes can be—and inevitably will be—grounded in moral principle.

OUR PERILS ARE HIS TEST

It may seem impossible that any man could rise to the greatness which our present perils demand. At the moment, although he wears as he always will the five stars of a general of the Army, MacArthur is free to speak plainly and honestly to his fellow Americans and the world. He has no political obligations, and will, we hope, contract none. He will, we hope, be wary of all cliques or claques which even now so blatantly seek to use him for ends less noble than we believe his to be. Surely he is wise enough to know that he can be destroyed by idolatrous friends no less than by obvious enemies.

MacArthur's task now is to speak—to cut through and disperse the double-talk, the poisonous politics, the meanness and smallness of most of the speech by which we have been engulfed in these last months. He will speak to northerners and southerners, to Democrats and Republicans, to men whose ancestors came with the Mayflower, and to the refugees who came yesterday. MacArthur may have other tasks to perform later, in or out of Government, but in these next few weeks his task is to put before the Nation a believable policy—to tell us what we ought to do, and why, and to challenge us to choose our course now.

What is certain is that this Nation cannot remain in the passive, helpless, and hopeless position into which it was put by President Truman's speech on April 11. In defending his removal of MacArthur, Truman moved on to a calamitous error—he defined the policy of the United States in a way that ties the Nation's hands and gives all initiative, all power of choice, to the enemy. Not even America is strong enough to win if it has to fight under that handicap.

Can any man rise to the greatness our perils demand? MacArthur may fail—and the cloud of disillusionment may again darken the already dreary landscape of our time. Yet he seems to have been shaped for a role of greatness. His chance of fulfilling it may be measurably increased by every American who will strive himself, in his own thinking and in his own private judgment, to rise as an individual to the greatness of this hour.

Prize-Winning Essays—American Legion Essay Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I am including essays by two of the winners of the American Legion essay contest in Ohio. Of the 12 winners in the State of Ohio, 2 were in my congressional district. I am very proud of these essays by Miss Dolores Amedei, of Steubenville, Ohio, and Miss Mary Ann Wiggins, of Bellaire, Ohio, and I commend them to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN OUR MODERN WORLD

(By Dolores Amedei)

Although conceived by patriots of a new Nation under living conditions and economic circumstances vastly different from those of present days, the Constitution has successfully met the challenge of rapidly changing conditions in all phases of our national life.

Different political parties find no difficulty, when they assume power, in changing the laws of the land in accordance with their principles and beliefs, under the basic tenets of the Constitution as a fluid yet firm guidepost.

It is because the forefathers, in their wisdom, drafted its basic principles in such broad, democratic fashion, that the Constitution has met the test of time and undoubtedly will be found to meet the complex problems facing us in the future under the entirely new conditions of an atomic age.

In essence, the Constitution is a simple document guaranteeing to all citizens certain rights and privileges that cannot be taken away without due process, meaning that any changes in the application (but not the principles) must be done in such a manner that allows the fullest opportunity for all to have their opinion expressed to those by whom the reins of government are handled.

Those guarantics in the Constitution relating to certain freedoms such as (1) of assembly, (2) of religious belief, and (3) of expression, are the bulwarks enjoyed by citizens of the United States that have never been guaranteed to citizens of any other nation. They are the guideposts that make it impossible for this country to plunge headlong into any form of dictatorship, because such forms of government cannot be instituted, let alone continued, where citizens are possessed of these rights.

Modern times require the presence of a time-tried, flexible Constitution capable of yielding to the swiftly changing circumstances of a machine age, yet firm enough to resist (or at least retard sufficiently to allow time for mature consideration) of any sweeping and sudden departures from the recognized concepts of its meanings.

This country is feeling the effects of the impact of new ideas of government less than other nations because its citizenry, feeling more secure in its rights by virtue of constitutional guaranties, are prone to examine those radically different concepts more leisurely and circumspectly than citizens of countries, where because of the absence of such guaranties, any newly advanced ism is seized upon as an attractive, even if untested and unproved, way of bettering the way of life.

One of the most valuable principles of our Constitution is the protection given minority groups, whether religious, economic, or political. This guaranty perhaps makes us appear slower in meeting changes because of the democratic processes that must be adhered to, but results on the other hand in sounder solutions to our problems.

It is because of these things that we can confidently face any problems that may confront us in the foreseeable future with a calm and assurance made possible by the knowledge that no individual, clique, or pressure group can seize power in such a fashion that its will can be forced on all our citizens without their consent.

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Mary Ann Wiggins)

The American Constitution embodies the fundamental principles of democracy. These fundamentals do not change quickly for behind them are people, and the will of the people is the basic reason for a democracy.

People all over the world are very much the same. They all want freedom from oppression by the state or by a dictator. When this freedom has once been obtained it becomes a living thing in the hearts of the people who have worked for it, and it cannot be easily taken away. When you have worked for this freedom and your sons and daughters have died on countless battlefields to preserve it, it becomes very precious to you. Such a freedom as this needs a foundation if it is to be kept alive for future generations. The American Constitution is as strong a foundation as can be found in our modern chaotic world.

In crises where other governments have failed, the Constitution has proved itself a stable foundation for our Government. Compare our Constitution with other forms of government. You will find that many of the things that we take for granted are not known in other countries. Hitler had thousands of helpless people put to death without giving them a fair trial or even a trial at all. Under communism people do not experience religious freedom, they are not allowed to speak their opinions freely. They are told what they should believe, what they should read, and how they may vote. The Constitution has survived because it instituted a government of the people, carried out by the chosen representatives of the people.

Our Constitution stands for equality among men. Through our courts it provides a way for all men to receive equal voice before the law.

The Constitution provides protection for the rights of all citizens of our country. Although the Constitution gives many privileges and rights, it also requires that the citizens perform certain duties and obligations. If we want to see our Constitution accomplish the most good we must work to fulfill our obligations as citizens. The Constitution contains the conditions and terms of democracy by which we all must live or suffer the penalty.

By using the power to amend the Constitution, we can overcome difficulties that did not exist when the Constitution was drawn up.

The Constitution, of course, is not perfect. There are many loopholes that must eventually be cleared up. How much can I say about my neighbors and my Government and still be protected by the Constitution? To what extent may I carry out my freedoms and still claim that they are my constitutional rights? These are some of the problems that often bother us.

Most Americans do not realize the far-reaching effects of the Constitution. Our Constitution was drawn up by the ablest statesmen of that time. These men had experienced oppression, and they were well qualified for the job of making a Constitution for a free people. Let's keep it a Constitution for a free people.

MacArthur's Greatest Hours

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, SR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Sees MacArthur's 'Greatest Hours'," written by Edgar Poe, and published in the New Orleans Times-Picayune For April 20, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEES MACARTHUR'S "GREATEST HOURS"

(By Edgar Poe)

WASHINGTON, April 19.—The two greatest hours in the colorful life of Gen. Douglas MacArthur were in Tokyo Bay when formal surrender was wrung from Japan and Thursday when he delivered a powerful, drama-packed address at a joint session of Congress.

This correspondent was privileged to be present at both of these tremendous occasions.

Perhaps no one has ever delivered a more spine-tingling, thought-provoking address to the American Congress than did the general of the Army, just dismissed from his Far Eastern commands.

When this correspondent was aboard the battleship Missouri to see the conquered and humiliated Japanese representatives of Emperor Hirohito sign the surrender on September 2, 1945, General MacArthur was in his greatest glory. Thursday he was an "old soldier." But to the United States Congress and a jam-packed gallery of leading Americans, General MacArthur truly was "MacArthur the magnificent."

Some veteran observers expressed belief that at no time in American history has a Congress and the audience been more touched than in the general's closing remarks after citing his 52 years of military service. Ringing applause swept over the Chamber. He then told of his hopes and dreams on the plains of West Point.

General MacArthur said those West Point dreams have long since vanished. He said he remembered the old ballad which proclaimed that "old soldiers never die; they just fade away."

"And like the old soldier of that ballad" he said, "I now close my military career and just fade away, an old soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty. Good-by."

This statement brought tears streaming to the eyes of Members of Congress, to men and women in the gallery. Hardened soldiers and admirals who were sitting on the front rows took out their handkerchiefs and wiped their tear-filled eyes. So did some Members of Congress. One of those affected was General Wainwright, the great soldier, who was captured when Bataan fell, but who was freed in 1945 just in time to be alongside General MacArthur when the surrender was wrung from the Japanese.

History was made that day. Peace—which turned out to be only temporary—had come to a world that had paid a tremendous price in blood and destruction.

This correspondent a short time later sickened when he stood in the melted ghost-like city of Hiroshima where an estimated 120,000 lives were wiped out with one single bomb. Some 75,000 to 200,000 others had been wounded.

There was no doubt that one of the great historical and horrible happenings of the world had taken place here. An impact on the world had been made at Hiroshima.

In Washington, Thursday, one felt that here, too, a speech of historical significance had been delivered.

Most of the applause during the general's address came from the Republican aisle. They applauded often. A scattering of applause came from the Democratic aisles, but both Republicans and Democrats gave the general a tremendous ovation when he concluded.

As the general walked down the aisle out of the chamber he waved in the direction of Mrs. MacArthur, who was sitting in the gallery. Youthful Arthur MacArthur, who was sitting on the front row on the Democratic side of the aisle applauded his father along with all the Senators and Representatives and the jammed galleries.

General MacArthur had made a triumphant return to the Nation's Capital.

Proposed Sale of the Former German Embassy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three editorials dealing with the sale of the former German Embassy in this city. The editorials appeared in the German press published in the western occupied zone of Germany. I particularly wish to read one of the editorials. It is entitled "Under the Hammer: The United States Between Emotion and Reason." It reads:

UNDER THE HAMMER: THE UNITED STATES BETWEEN EMOTION AND REASON

During the First World War the rules of civilization were still observed. The seizure and the announced sale of the German Embassy Building today obviously belong to the progress of international law, which, if not stopped, will hurt each nation in the long run. Political opportunism may go unpunished while violating minor laws of behavior, but it is fatal to violate international law which binds and protects each member of the family of nations. The advertisement in the Wall Street Journal offering the Embassy for sale has a terrible psychological effect because it opens old wounds which had slowly started to heal. (Excerpt from an article in the Dusseldorfer Nachrichten (Christian Independent), March 21, 1951.)

Mr. President, I may say that the editorials bear out the editorial comment which appeared recently in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, to which reference was made by the junior Senator from Nebraska yesterday, and they bear out the argument that we should have an investigation of the proposed sale of the German Embassy.

There being no objection, the other editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT ONLY STONES

In the midst of forming great world policies (by which the Western Powers intend to lead the Germans back into the community of free nations) one should not forget those little gestures which improve mutual relationships. This was clearly recognized by Senator HUGH BUTLER, who has protested against the policy of putting the former German Embassy in Washington up for sale.

The German Embassy in Washington is not only an accumulation of stones worth a certain number of dollars. Tied up with it, there exist certain imponderable values which one should not add to the heaped ruins of World War II without careful consideration. (Wiesbadener Kurier (Independent), March 13, 1951.)

STEPCHILDREN

German consuls abroad have many difficulties. Consul General Krekeler in New York uses the former quarters of a nylon shop. He could easily have found a place in the rooms of the old German Embassy. This hope has now been destroyed by the United States Department of Justice. The Embassy Building is being put up for sale, and for Americans only. Is this "equal treatment for the Germans"? The Germans are being disinherited and told to accept the status of stepchildren. (Westfalische Nachrichten (Christian Union), March 14, 1951.)

On Academic Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a two-column article written by James Marshall, a member of the Board of Education of the City of New York, and published in a recent issue of Strengthening Democracy, a publication of the Board of Education of the City of New York. The article is entitled "On Academic Freedom." I think it is particularly important because it shows the reasons why the Board of Education of the city of New York passed a resolution to the effect that anyone who is a Communist is unfit to be a teacher in the American public school system. No one is going to accuse the city of New York of being a reactionary spot on the American map.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON ACADEMIC FREEDOM

I believe that we have to begin with the principle that in the forum of the mind all is fair and permissible no matter how unorthodox. Suppression of people who hold unorthodox ideas and discrimination against them because of the views which they may entertain must be abhorrent to all of us who are devoted to democracy as we know it, as it has descended to us from the English and American revolutions, as it has been expressed in the English Bill of Rights, our own Declaration of Independence and Constitution and in the writings of men like Milton, Jefferson, Lincoln, Mr. Justice Holmes, and countless others. This freedom is the very basis of all other freedoms. To place restraint on freedom of thought or discussion in classrooms or lecture halls endangers all other freedoms and imperils our basic American civil rights. This freedom of the mind and of expression as applied in classroom and lecture hall is the very essence of what we call academic freedom. Consequently it is basic to American education.

REQUISITES FOR ACADEMIC FREEDOM

Academic freedom is more than a mere guaranteed power for self-expression. There cannot be academic freedom where a teacher himself is not free, where he himself is for some reason unable to be honest, where he is under pressure to say something or not to say something irrespective of objective truth.

The counterpart to academic freedom may be said to be freedom to learn the truth, the right of students not to have ideas perverted and thought controlled. In the name of academic freedom they have the right to have teachers who, if not always competent to think for themselves, at least have not surrendered intellectual integrity to others to do their thinking for them.

The evidence before us is clear that Communist Party members have a loyalty to Soviet Russia and to the promotion of world communism which is a higher loyalty than loyalty to their own country; that class hatred and the destruction of the bourgeois state are part of Communist doctrine; that the seizure of power in the interest of creating a so-called dictatorship of the proletariat is implicit in Communist Party membership; and that party members engaged in education have the special task of using education for these purposes.

HE CANNOT EXPRESS OBJECTIVE TRUTH

Consequently, how can it be said that anyone committed to Communist doctrine, anyone following the Communist Party line is free? By the nature of his allegiance to communism, his adoption of the Lenin-Stalin system of belief, he cannot accept and express objective truth. He must accept and prosecute class war and the destruction of the bourgeois state. He is bound to his principle that democracy is not the democracy that we know, but something quite different called social democracy. He is obliged to doubt the Mendelian law and to espouse the biological theory of Lysenko. He dare not applaud the music of Shostakovich and Khachaturian and others when that is deemed to be contrary to Communist musical doctrine. His political, economic, and social beliefs must follow the ideological meanderings of the Kremlin line. This is not truth. No man accepting such doctrine can claim the right to teach such concepts in classroom or in lecture hall in the name of academic freedom. He is not academically free if he is in such intellectual bondage. Whether in classroom, in guidance work, or in club work after class he cannot be trusted with children.

Where he conceals the fact that he is a Communist he is all the more unfitted to be a teacher because he is mislabeling his wares. Where students are young and immature, where they cannot fairly be expected to form judgments even where all the facts are available, where they are not free to choose their teachers or hear a contrary doctrine and weigh the two, where they are subject to compulsory education law, as are the children in our schools, then it is the duty of the Board of Education to protect them.

JAMES MARSHALL,
Member, Board of Education.

Assistance for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the India emergency assistance joint resolution, I am deeply disturbed over the failure of the Congress to take prompt action on this measure. The people of India are not faced with the prospect of famine at some time in the dim future: the threat is immediate.

The letters which have poured into my office from all over the State of Missouri indicate the very real concern of our citizens for the hunger-stricken people abroad, and urge that we put decency ahead of political expediency. If we have learned any lesson at all from history, we should have learned that communism finds fertile ground amidst poverty and hunger. We will have only our own parsimony and procrastination to blame if the discouraged people of India turn to communism and Soviet Russia for aid.

It is false economy to deny starving millions grain which we have in abundance, and which will, if timely given, save many lives, and be an eloquent testimonial to the humanity of our people.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat has stated the case well, I think, in a recent editorial:

The United States has tried to assume a position of great moral force in the world. The hope for human integrity, justice, and compassion has attracted millions to the policy of the United States leadership among the tenuously free people of south Asia. This is being torn and smothered by failure to help now. * * * Here is an instance where we can serve humanity in traditional American fashion and serve our own self-interest by countering Communist posturing with western generosity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the editorial entitled "As India Starves" from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of April 11.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS INDIA STARVES

The teeming millions of India, confronted with famine, have urgently appealed, through their government, for 2,000,000 tons of grain from the United States. This plea was made last December. More than 3 months have passed, yet Congress has done nothing about the request.

Red China has offered 1,000,000 tons and Russia a smaller amount. Probably neither nation has the grain pledged, but they quickly made the promise and no doubt will send in some food. They recognize and capitalize on the propaganda opportunity. Are the seeds of communism literally to be poured into India, while the grain of American humanitarianism is padlocked under congressional dawdling?

Opposition to sending India foods has arisen in Washington. Some object to Prime Minister Nehru's Red appeasement and criticism of our policy in Korea. Some want to bargain for a loan, for atomic materials, for embargo concessions.

This is a wrong time to bargain. Bargaining with death from starvation would justify the Uncle Shylock sobriquet which already is emerging in India.

The United States has tried to assume a position of a great moral force in the world. The hope for human integrity, justice, and compassion has attracted millions to the policy of the United States leadership among the tenuously free peoples of south Asia. This is being torn and smothered by failure to help now.

The hungry of India should not be allowed to starve because we do not approve of the policies of Nehru. Famine should not be a plaything in politics. Whatever may be the doubts over India's Prime Minister and his occasional pro-Red implications, the helpless people of India need American aid. They need it quickly.

The Indian Government stated it must have 6,000,000 tons of grain to avert critical famine. It can pay for only 4,000,000 tons. Indians were led to believe months ago Washington would open its granaries to give what is needed. Now some counties in India have meager provisions to carry them only three more weeks. Bills in Congress to provide the needed grain have been dormant in the House Rules Committee and in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

If Communist sources provide food for India in crisis, there will be strings attached. Even if there weren't, the cause of communism would profit heavily. If we hope to improve the cause of western democracy, we should send the grain without strings. Margaret Parton, writing from New Delhi in the New York Tribune, observed, "While America may not win India with wheat, America may well lose India without wheat."

We have the grain and can afford to send it. The President should take extraordinary measures to help India whip starvation. Here is an instance where we can serve humanity in traditional American fashion and serve our own self-interest by countering Communist posturing with western generosity.

Screen Actors Guild Replies to Gale Sondergaard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. NIXON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. NIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from the board of directors of the Screen Actors Guild to Miss Gale Sondergaard, which was published in the Hollywood Reporter on March 21, 1951.

The reply of the Screen Actors Guild to Miss Sondergaard's appeal for support of her attack on the House Committee on Un-American Activities is most commendable. It is reaffirmation of the unquestioned loyalty and patriotism of the great majority of those persons who are affiliated with the motion-picture industry.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCREEN ACTORS GUILD,
March 20, 1951.

Miss GALE SONDERGAARD,
Hollywood, Calif.

DEAR MISS SONDERGAARD: The board of directors of the Screen Actors Guild has received and carefully considered your letter of March 13 which you saw fit also to publish in the press. The Guild's answer should be equally available to the public and will be published.

Your letter (1) attacks as an inquisition the pending hearings by the House Committee on Un-American Activities into alleged Communist Party activities by a few individuals and (2) asks that the Guild protect you against any consequences of your own personal decisions and actions.

The Communist Party press also has attacked the hearings as a "warmongering, labor and freedom-busting * * * witch-hunt * * * by congressional inquisitors." The Guild board totally rejects this quoted typical Communist Party line. We recognize its obvious purposes of attempting to smear the hearings in advance and to create disrespect for the American form of government.

The deadly seriousness of the international situation dictates the tone of our reply. This is not the time for dialectic fencing. Like the overwhelming majority of the American people, we believe that a "clear and present danger" to our Nation exists. The Guild board believes that all participants in the international Communist Party conspiracy against our Nation should be exposed for what they are—enemies of our country and of our form of government.

It is not the province of the Guild board to decide what is the best method of carrying out this aim. It is our hope that the current House committee hearings will help to do so, in an objective and intelligent manner. We are informed that the committee will guard against smearing of any innocent individuals. We will watch with extreme interest the way in which the hearings are conducted and any and all developments stemming therefrom.

The Guild as a labor union will fight against any secret blacklist created by any group of employers. On the other hand, if any actor by his own actions outside of union activities has so offended American public opinion that he has made himself unsalable at the boxoffice, the Guild cannot and would not want to force any employer to hire him. That is the individual actor's personal responsibility and it cannot be shifted to his union.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Screen Actors Guild.

On the Eve of Victory With MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR A. JONAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, in commemoration of the memorable day when General MacArthur came home after near completion of his job which began at Bataan and moved to Korea through years of bloodshed, strife, slaughter, hunger, torture, suffering, and conflict—under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit an article written by Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, as a colonel, when he called on General MacArthur in 1945.

General Klein served under General MacArthur in the Pacific theater and holds his past commander in great devotion and esteem, as is set forth in glowing terms in his article entitled "On the Eve of Victory With MacArthur."

This document is submitted with the thought that no matter what accusations are made against him, nor what vindication he achieves, the words of General Klein in 1945 are spoken for the many thousands of men, living and dead, who served under him in the bloody days of Guadalcanal, Biak, Tarawa, and the Philippines—through the tedious years of reconstruction—and now the period of defense of his acts in service to his country. The article follows:

ON THE EVE OF VICTORY WITH MACARTHUR

(By Brig. Gen. Julius Klein)

(Written August 4, 1945, in Luzon, Philippine Islands, for the Army and Navy Journal and International News Service.)

The sign over his door reads simply "CINC." I entered with the natural awe of a soldier for his Commander in Chief, but as he moved from his desk to greet me, I felt my heart pounding as it had so many years ago on my first big assignment as a reporter.

It was late in the day. This man was the nerve center of a gigantic war machine. But I could detect no trace of exhaustion in spite of his many callers and conferences, and the decisions he had rendered that day.

I recalled when I saw him, in the Washington days of Herbert Hoover. I remembered well his youthful dignity, his immaculate dress, and the dashing gallant figure that he cut. With the terrible war at the greatest climax, I was prepared to see a much older man, wear, bearing the mark of the tragic war years.

But the man who greeted me was the MacArthur of old.

He had not altered. He remains the erect, charming, youthful, black-haired soldier of those distant days when he was Chief of Staff.

As he spoke I began to realize the greatness of the man—he has long since proved himself the soldier. My mind flashed back to the great of another war whom I had interviewed, Pershing, Haig, Foch, March, Bliss and the others, and he suffers by comparison with no man. I know why the United States Under Secretary of War, Robert Patterson, in a chat I had with him a few months ago, referred to MacArthur as "the General of the Age." One could sense in his presence the great general, the fine patriot, the statesman, scholar, and humanitarian who embodies all those qualities that make him the most illustrious American of our time.

We discussed various problems facing America now and after the war. The general's great devotion to the sons of America, his interest in the smallest detail concerning the welfare of his men, were only a high light of the interview. MacArthur knows what he wants for them, for America, and he hopes and prays with millions of others that the sacrifices made by the flower of our youth will not have been in vain.

His memory is remarkable. His eloquent use of the English language, his diction, his own presentation of what he tries to bring home to his listener can be matched with the best I have ever read or heard.

When he talks about war and the suffering that it brought about, you detect a sad emotion. It is the only time he resorts to rough language. He knows what Pearl Harbor, Bataan, Corregidor, and Santo Tomas meant to America, and as I sat there I realized what it meant to MacArthur himself.

As may be expected, he discussed the important strategy of the war with equal brilliance as concerns Army, Navy, or Air Corps activities, and he is not only equally well posted but also something of an expert in the economic, political, international, and cultural consequences of the war. He see with great clarity what is needed in addition to the United Nations Charter to assure lasting peace, with a powerful, strong, and free America guaranteeing that our generation will return to its own form of living and pursuit of happiness.

I had given him a 10-page report on my mission, and as he perused it my eyes strayed round the walls and rested on a framed inscription. Reading it I was struck by the key it gave me to the general's life and actions—I took out my pen and wrote down the words, as MacArthur read on.

"I do the best I know how, the very best I can, and I mean to keep on doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right what is said against we won't amount to anything; if it brings me out wrong, all the angels swearing that I was right would make no difference." (Abraham Lincoln.)

I had taken down these words, which I hope I have rendered correctly without knowing that the general had observed me. Looking up, he said:

"I noticed that you were copying Mr. Lincoln's words. I shall remember them always for they give me courage, and often in dark hours I look to that wall and feel comforted."

I was thrilled by the aptness of this inevitable comparison between the two liberators, Lincoln, the great emancipator, and MacArthur, the man who had stood like a wall of steel against the crumbling Australian bastion and held back the yellow tide while he forged the weapon with which he was to cleave his way back to the Philippines. He has returned, and he has brought back freedom and the joy of liberation to our valiant fellow Americans of the Philippine Commonwealth, paving the way for "the road to Tokyo."

Inevitably also, I thought of General Pershing, old "Black Jack," resisting with all his might the inclusion of the young AEF under any but an American commander. His insistance on an integrated American force was fully justified by the triumph of our arms just as MacArthur's embracing courage and brilliant conviction forced recognition of the Philippines as our necessary springboard to victory in the Pacific. Opposition, neglect, apathy, none of these stayed him.

My thoughts turned to the words of Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger as I heard them a few weeks ago at his Eighth Army Headquarters. The man who led the assault on Buna and Biak, and hurled the Eighth Army like an avenging bolt through the Bisayas and Mindanao, had said to me:

"His military achievements are triumphs of courage and ability over limited materials. It was General MacArthur who insisted that the Philippines must be taken as rapidly as possible to divide the Jap Empire, reestablish our prestige in the east and, most important, provide a base for the concentration of overwhelming force for the final blows against Japan.

"Not only did his great heart go out to the people, but he knew that without the Philippines we would have no comparable place where the great supply bases and staging areas, so necessary for our concluding campaign, might be built. So unshakable and so firm was his conviction that this would shorten the war, that he had to express his willingness to advance with what was already available, or not advance at all. His brilliant leadership, statesmanship, and strategy were merely superb tools which he used unsparingly.

"His real claim to greatness in history," concluded General Eichelberger, "lies in the strength of his conviction of the soundness of his daring concept, and in his unparalleled moral courage in beating down all obstacles through years of scarcity, meager troop support, frustration, and criticism."

Typical of the loyalty and esteem in which he is held by his able leaders is the statement made to me some time ago by Lt. Gen. Robert C. Richardson, Jr., logistical and tactical genius.

"Klein," he said, "I hope and pray that MacArthur will be our commander in chief. He is the only man whom we can follow with confidence wherever he goes; the only man, moreover, whose concern for the success of his mission is touched by his consideration for the safety of his men. He will do great things at a minimum cost."

Both General Eichelberger and General Richardson are old disciples of MacArthur, their association with him dating back to their West Point days some 40 years ago. They, as brilliant tacticians and commanders in their own right, can keenly appreciate his genius and powers of leadership.

There was another inscription on the wall, an essay on youth written by a close friend of the general's, to which he directed my attention. It read in part:

"Youth is not a time of life; it is a state of mind * * * nobody grows old by merely living a number of years; people grow old only by deserting their ideals. Years wrinkle the skin, but to give up enthusiasm wrinkles the soul. Worry, doubt, self-distrust, fear, and despair—these are the long, long years that bow the head and turn the growing spirit back to dust. You are as young as your faith, as old as your doubt, as young as your self-confidence, as old as your fear, as young as your hope, as old as your despair."

It explained the erectness of his carriage, the firmness of his handshake, the stamina that makes his youthful secretaries and staff officers gasp in wonderment.

This insight is carried into the selection of his able lieutenants—the iron-willed Sutherland; Blamey, the swashbuckling Australian; Kenney, daring and forceful; Krueger, a general's general, cool and calculating; Eichelberger, brilliant tactician, fearless and intrepid; Richardson, a logistical and tactical genius, wise, far-seeing, and intensely loyal.

Prominent in that simply furnished room overlooking the shambles of MacArthur's beloved and once beautiful Manila was a tribute by Walter Lippmann to the heroes of Bataan.

"They fought * * * knowing that they themselves had no hope. This is the very heart of courage, transcending all other acts of which men are capable, and the surest proof that man is more than his flesh, his blood, his bones, and his appetite. On this proof as on a rock, that there is in all men a capacity to live and a willingness to die for things which they themselves can never hope to enjoy—there rests the whole of man's dignity and the title to all his rights."

The general paused as he saw that my glance had centered on this inscription. He rose and, laying aside my report, stood there with me as I read it. He drew his head back slowly as he, too, formed the words silently with his lips. Pain and pride and deep emotion crossed his face. Pain perhaps, in the thought that he had been ordered to leave them there, and pride in the knowledge that he had made his pledge, "I shall return," come true. It was as though he rendered a silent salute to those who had fought and bled with him there, and to those who remained to endure the torture and humiliation of those dark hours of America's history.

His faith in the Philippines was no less great than theirs in him. The failure of Tokyo's "Asia for the Asiatics" policy was foredoomed by this, the mutual love and trust they bore.

Bataan is more than just a historic battleground to MacArthur. His love for that sacred spot goes deeper than his personal devotion to the heroes that lie there in glory. For him whose intense patriotism knows no equal, it stood as a bastion of democracy, of freedom, and of human decency, a symbol of the American way of life. It had fallen only after every last ounce of energy had been expended, only after every sacrifice had been made, only after a display of such courage as the world had never known.

Its fall was a blow to the dignity of man, a treacherous stab at the heart of humanity, a thrust at his beloved country that had to be avenged. And so in the shining hour of victory, when General MacArthur as Supreme Allied Commander directed the Japanese Emperor to send his emissaries to Manila to accept the surrender terms, he erased forever that blot upon America's history by demanding that, on approaching the city, they flash the symbolic identification signal—"Bataan."

The conversation swung into easier channels. One is held spellbound by MacArthur's eloquence. His keen eyes, calm dignity and extraordinary command of speech make one feel that his presence is not only that of a great military leader, but of a great scholar and teacher. One might think that a man in his position would be engrossed in the task at hand—in maps and charts and figures. But his thoughts rise far above and beyond all these. Free from all illusions, he is alive to all the economic, political, and cultural consequences of war, and to the need for a free and powerful America which will guarantee future generations the right to live in peace and to devote their energies to the benefit of men and the glory of God.

A diplomat to the core, his phenomenal memory reaches out to each unit and individual under his command. He spoke with feeling of the citizen-soldier, that unique product of our democracy. National Guard units have fought long and well, often under the most difficult conditions. The general was especially pleased with the Thirty-third Division, my old outfit whose gallant action at Baguio was highly regarded.

As we returned to our chairs, my reporter's curiosity got the upper hand and I could not help asking a few questions.

"General," I said, "I have read many speculations as to what you will do after the war is over. What really are your plans?"

He smiled at this.

"Klein, I'm going to get myself a great big rocker and put it on my porch before a small, beautiful garden, where I can finally spend life as the average American husband with his family in peace and contentment—that is, if the Nips don't get me first."

I remarked that I doubted the American people would let him do that, but he waved the thought aside.

"Why think of it now. There is so much to do and, like every other GI, my thoughts are of home and rest but first I have a job to do and that job isn't finished, and when my job is finished then, and only then, am I ready to go home * * * to my rocking chair, my garden, and my family."

My colleagues among professional newsmen have told me he seldom makes radio broadcasts, has held few press conferences and, when he does see the press individually or in small groups, it is at their request and not his. The American people have demanded that copy be made of their hero. History has not made him; he has made history.

It was dark when I entered the bomb-shattered streets of Manila. An endless stream of trucks rolled by bearing supplies for the front. Thousands of cranes and winches strained at their task of unloading cargo from the myriad ships that dotted the harbor. Everywhere was a scene of antlike activity. My thoughts turned to the main streets of America and I thanked God that they had been spared the horrors of war.

The lights in the headquarters burned brightly far into the night. MacArthur and his men were awake to insure that the children of America might sleep.

I wrote this article on America's greatest general and foremost citizen at the headquarters of General Eichelberger's Eighth Army, then awaiting movement orders. As it was completed, the world began to rock with the staggering series of blows which were to drive the Japanese to surrender; their vocabulary previously void of this word "surrender," had been enriched.

As MacArthur had planned, this victory was chary of American blood. Not so for the Japs. The blinding flash that completely demolished 60 percent of the city of Hiroshima, on the southern tip of Japan's main island of Honshu, was a terrifying, soul-searing blow to arrogant Nippon. The devastation has been admitted to be beyond all human comprehension, retribution in full for the agony and long privation of General Wainwright and his companions in exile—a just and righteous vengeance for the heroic American lives poured out on the sand of Guadalcanal, Biak, Buna, Tarawa, the Pelaus, and the Philippines, poured out that freedom might return from exile.

General MacArthur and his leaders and his men had fulfilled their pledge; the might of America had seived the Nipponese throat in the final grip of total destruction.

When this terrific news broke, I recalled the advance information General MacArthur had given. His comment at this time belied any thought of personal glory. He saw the possibility of an early end to the war and said:

"Anything can happen now. What branch of service gets any credit is immaterial if this horrible war can come to an end and a needless sacrifice of life be prevented."

My head reeled with the grandeur of comprehension. The Russians, our allies now in the East, unleashed their armor and rolled into Manchuria driving all before them. The general's words, spoken to me only a few days before, stood out in my mind in letters of fire. His gift of prophecy, founded on his capability and knowledge, his strength and inflexible determination, had again come true in total fulfillment.

The Japanese Empire awaits its master, its guide, if it chooses, back to rehabilitation as a nation. What could be more fitting than that this task should fall to that great leader of men whose wisdom as a scholar and as a teacher is no less than his genius as a conqueror?

History's pen is poised, stilled over its perpetual creed in which is inscribed the eternal story, the faults and foibles, the grandeur and the heroism of mankind. A chapter has been finished. We and the peoples of the earth await the next.

Whatever the peace will bring, there are men whose passage through time is marked with meteoric brilliance. Such men are history. Many days have passed since the interview which gave birth to this story. Were they years, they could never eradicate the memory of the emotions it roused, or that swift fulfillment of the general's words of prophecy. His slogans, "I shall return" and "On to Tokyo!" were words come to life.

He had kept his faith with America and with God; let faith be kept with him.

MacArthur Is Right

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Sacramento Union on Saturday, April 21, 1951.

The editorial follows:

MACARTHUR IS RIGHT

Now that the tumult and shouting has subsided and the incidents of the past week can be viewed calmly and dispassionately, there can be but one conclusion—MacArthur is right.

We are at war with Soviet China in Korea. It is not called a war; it is called a police action. Americans are being killed at the rate of one every 15 minutes, but they are not called Americans; they are United Nations troops. But to us they are Americans, and we wonder what they are doing there.

The commander was Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the greatest general in the Armed Forces. But he did not take his orders from the United States; he took them from the United Nations, of which Soviet Russia, which instigated the Korean war, is a member with the power of veto.

General MacArthur recognized that this was a war without a target; therefore, as long as it remained so, it could never end except in defeat for our side. He could not fight it to victory, because no one over here knew what a victory would be. General MacArthur was not permitted to fight the war to a victory, because left-wing Europe, refusing to arm itself, sought to appease communism in the Far East and divert all military aid to its own countries.

If the situation is as serious as MacArthur says it is, why are the little men in Washington still debating about how to run the war? If it is not so serious, why are we being asked to pay war taxes?

General MacArthur is one of the greatest Americans in the history of this Nation. His welcome home is without a parallel.

We must never lose sight of the fact that in Korea the Russians are lend-leasing the Chinese jet-propelled planes and submarines, and the British are selling the Chinese rubber and gasoline. Yet Russia is a neutral and Great Britain is actually fighting the Korean war on our side.

It becomes increasingly apparent that the weak and inept administration in Washington—easily the worst in our history—has been used by the British to have MacArthur dismissed. MacArthur is a sacrifice to British trickery.

Most of us are getting tired of what the very little people in Washington think is the art and science of politics. Particularly when they get in the way of great Americans like Douglas MacArthur. For Truman and Acheson have no policy; they play by ear; the chords they strike are consistently flat.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I revise and extend my remarks and include therein two statements, which I made to the press concerning the General MacArthur episode—one, when the general was summarily removed, and the other, after he had delivered a brilliant, eloquent, and penetrating address to the Congress.

Whether one agrees with General MacArthur or not, whether one accepts his thesis in whole or in part, it will be recognized by all fair-minded persons that his speech to the joint session of Congress will go down in history as one of the great speeches of our time.

It is our duty now, as representatives of the people, to try to bring some order out of the confusion that exists throughout the Nation and in the minds of the people concerning national policy. Our democratic way of life permits sharp differences of opinion and that frequently clarifies our policy. But we must never permit these differences to drive a wedge into the structure of national unity and full national cooperation so essential to the conduct of the Koeran war and so vital to the implementation of our national defense. However ardently we may desire peace, however zealously we may strive for it, we must fix our eyes upon the unwavering star of universal freedom which enables us to chart our course safely across the tumultuous seas of confusion and dissension.

We want peace but we do not want a dishonorable peace. We do not want a peace that will carelessly throw away all the fruits of victory. We do not want a peace that will abandon great continents of the world and great historic peoples to the exploitations of ruthless and cruel communistic leadership. We do not want a peace that will further strengthen world communism and enable it in time to destroy democracy and all its blessings and its precious freedoms so cherished by Americans and other liberty-loving peoples. We do not want, and will not stand for, a dishonorable peace which will compromise the true interests of America before the threats and blandishments of the Kremlin and its puppets.

We seek and will be glad to accept peace with honor, peace with justice, peace with protection for democracy, peace with security for our country based upon liberty, universal disarmament, and mutual cooperation and good will.

The important thing and vital thing is not to flinch, not to fear, and not to fail to stand courageously against our potential enemies. I do not favor preventive war or anything resembling it, but we must keep in mind that every day we delay to press for settlement of these great questions of war and peace the Soviet's stockpile of atom bombs is growing together with the armed strength of that mighty power.

But let us not, greatest and most powerful Nation we are, cringe in cowardly and craven surrender before these threats to our Nation, but rather press with renewed vigor and with genuine determination for the kind of a peace that will let all nations, great and small, choose their own form of government and live under institutions of their own selection, unbridled by international bullies and unfettered by international conspiracy, unhampered by internal plots against their independence and security.

We have had the great debate. Now let us get down to brass tacks and have the great show-down—it is long overdue. The above-mentioned follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN, OF MASSACHUSETTS, ON THE FIRING OF GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

The Commander in Chief has full power to control personnel of the armed services. However, I greatly explore the summary manner in which General MacArthur—great war hero and great American that he is—was removed from his command.

This action is a smashing victory for the British Socialist Government policy of appeasing the Soviets, trading even war materials with the Chinese Reds, and scheming and working to bring the latter into the United Nations, even as their hands are dripping with American blood.

It is most unfortunate, particularly at this time, that the impression of disunity in American policy and military command, should be given to our potential enemies and the rest of the democratic world.

This policy may well mean our complete capitulation in Asia to world communism—the yielding of Formosa, the encompassment of Japan and the Philippines, Soviet domination of all Asia and the breaking of our security line in the Pacific.

STATEMENT BY HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN, OF MASSACHUSETTS, ON GENERAL MACARTHUR'S ADDRESS TO JOINT MEETING OF CONGRESS

Congress was profoundly impressed by General MacArthur's stirring, historic address. It was statesmanlike, lofty in tone, and carefully avoided personalities.

The General made it clear that he is not an advocate of all-out general war on the mainland of China.

He intimated that, by reason of higher official decisions here, he was lately compelled to wage the Korean war without benefit of air reconnaissance and without being able to strike enemy troop and supply concentrations and air bases behind the lines, which in effect, has required our American and UN forces to conduct the war with one hand tied behind their backs.

He plainly stated that his over-all military objectives and methods had been previously approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and left the clear inference that their execution was blocked by orders from a higher level.

The address poses the question: Will this Nation permit the British Labor Government and appeasers of the Chinese Reds and the Soviet Union in this country to dictate a policy and course of action that could well have the result of leading us into a still graver situation? How about the gallant boys who suffer and die in Korea?

The American people demand, and have a right to know, who is responsible for such a policy and why it is being pursued. We ardently desire peace but we cannot compromise our national safety and endanger our civil liberties before the pressure and artifice of world communism.

I am sure that the American people will be deeply impressed by General MacArthur's observations and will be very grateful to him for his candid, forthright analysis. I hope that his utterances will clear the way for unity, decision, and strength in facing these great problems.

Through patient understanding, through judgments free of the sinister influences of hysteria and propaganda, and through firm, unflinching adherence to American principles and American interest, may our great Nation find the pathway to security and peace.

Alhambra Citizens Protest Removal of MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a petition signed by 240 prominent citizens of Alhambra, Calif., who have been shocked by the President's tragic dismissal of our great American hero, Gen. Douglas MacArthur. These signatures were attached to the petition following:

The undersigned hereby request and demand the reinstatement of Gen. Douglas MacArthur to his full command; and further, because of the ill-advised actions on the part of the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, we demand his impeachment, also the immediate dismissal of Secretary of State Dean Acheson and George C. Marshall.

Mr. Speaker, I share the righteous indignation of these good citizens over the ill-advised action of the President in removing General MacArthur. I feel that General MacArthur's views on our far eastern foreign policy have been far more correct and far more sound than those of Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson who have long followed a policy of appeasement of communism at home and abroad.

In order to clarify my thoughts on this issue, I enclose in my remarks the statement issued recently by four of my colleagues and I from Los Angeles County:

APRIL 13, 1951.

JOINT STATEMENT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION ON MACARTHUR DISMISSAL

In response to the thousands of demands we have received to institute impeachment proceedings against President Truman and Secretary of State Dean Acheson following the summary dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, we believe that our constituents are entitled to an expression of our joint views:

1. We vigorously denounce the ruthless manner which President Truman removed General MacArthur from his command in Japan and Korea. The welfare and safety of the United States was, in our belief, more secure with General MacArthur in Tokyo than under any other available leadership.

2. We believe that President Truman's lack of wisdom in summarily removing General MacArthur has aided the enemy in Korea, given comfort to Moscow and Peiping, and opens the way for communism to prevail in Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and other Pacific island areas.

3. We vigorously support the House concurrent resolution to invite General MacArthur to address a joint session of Congress and to testify before the House and Senate Foreign Affairs and Armed Services Committees; and insist that a thorough, complete and exhaustive investigation of our military and foreign policy in Europe and Asia be immediately started and speedily concluded.

4. We agree with leaders in both the Senate and the House that no impeachment proceedings should be instituted until this investigation is completed revealing compelling evidence which can be used as grounds for impeachment. It must be remembered that impeachment by the House and trial in the Senate are similar to indictment by a grand jury and trial before a court of law.

5. Attention must be given to the fact if Mr. Truman is impeached by the House, it requires a two-thirds vote in the Senate to remove him from office. In the event of removal, his successor is Vice President ALBEN W. BARKLEY. If BARKLEY should decline to serve because of his age, and so forth, the successors in order are: SAM RAYBURN, Dean Acheson, George Marshall, and on down through the President's Cabinet.

6. We have given sober and deliberate thought and consideration to this whole problem. We are fully aware of the temper and the aroused attitude of the public at this time. However, we believe that to institute any proceedings before General MacArthur has had an opportunity to present his side of the story to the Congress and the people would minimize and neutralize the effect and force of his testimony.

Results of Fulton Lewis, Jr., Poll of Public Opinion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, during the past several months the residents of my congressional district of Pennsylvania have taken part in two polls of public opinion. In addition, some 4,000 telegrams and letters have been received concerning the Truman-MacArthur controversy.

The sentiment expressed in the two polls and in over 4,000 communications which I have received on the Truman-MacArthur issue is identical with the following tabulation of the results of the radio poll conducted by the Mutual Broadcasting Co.'s Washington commentator, Fulton Lewis, Jr.

Mr. Lewis asked his listeners to vote yes or no on the following 16 questions, and mail their votes to their own Representative in Congress. There were 1,880 post cards and letters received by me as a result of the Fulton Lewis poll, with the results as follows:

	Yes	No
1. As of today, would you vote for Harry Truman for President?	12	1,868
2. Should President Truman be allowed to continue to receive the $50,000 tax exempt salary recently voted him by Congress?	84	1,796
3. Do you believe that Congress should continue investigations such as the one into RFC loans and the Kefauver crime hearings and extend those investigations into other activities of Government?	1,844	36
4. Are you in favor of keeping Dean Acheson as Secretary of State?	12	1,868
5. Do you favor the United Nations being in final control of United States troops in Korea or elsewhere?	144	1,736
6. Should Chiang Kai-shek be permitted to send his Nationalist Armies against the Chinese Communists?	1,852	28
7. Do you feel confident that Europe will fight to the end against communism	140	1,740
8. Do you approve of the proposed continuation of economic, along with military, aid to North Atlantic Pact nations?	384	1,496
9. Would you favor a requirement that nations receiving military or economic aid from us must agree to stop trading with Russia, Communist China, or any other iron curtain country?	1,864	16
10. Do you believe President Truman's statement that all Communists and Communist sympathizers have been weeded out of Government?	8	1,872
11. Are you in favor of a permanent peacetime program of universal military training?	1,132	748
12. Do you believe President Truman is making a sincere effort to cut out unnecessary Government spending?	4	1,876
13. Should wages be controlled along with prices?	1,788	92
14. Should the Government prevent strikes in time of war emergency?	1,832	48
15. Are you in favor of calling General MacArthur home for a report to Congress on the far eastern situation?	1,716	164
16. Are you in favor of impeaching President Truman?	1,796	84

Mercy at a Price

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial taken from the Washington Post of April 24, 1951, entitled "Mercy at a Price":

MERCY AT A PRICE

Apparently opponents of a gift of grain to starving India have won their argument—or, rather, their sit-down strike in the House Rules Committee. The House Foreign Affairs Committee, which initially endorsed a bill to give the grain India needs, now has tentatively approvad a new bill to send the grain on a loan basis. This follows the action of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in reporting a bill to make the shipment on half-gift half-loan basis.

Very well. The placing of a financial tag on the grain is in the opinion of this newspaper a misguided move which not only will hamper the effectiveness of what should have been a humanitarian action but also may result in serious financial consequences in India. This country has had plenty of experience with the misunderstandings and ill will engendered by "fuzzy" loans, and the provision for repayment in strategic materials for which India is now obtaining dollars is no exception to this rule. But the most important thing is to get the grain moving, for inevitably there will be some delay even after a bill has been passed. Once bills of some sort are cleared in the House and Senate, then those bodies as a whole should decide on the terms they want.

Reports from Bihar State in India are pathetic. In some sections the people have been reduced to eating roots. The wheat ration has been reduced to a below subsistence level, and often even this ration is not obtainable. Prices are skyrocketing and farmers are having to sell their land to buy food. In short, starvation is becoming a fact while Congress haggles, and India has nowhere else to turn. That sobering thought ought to be impressed upon the minds of our legislators.

If Old MacDonald Has a Farm in Iowa, on That Farm He Has Electricity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of the Iowa Development Commission:

MARCH 31, 1951.

If Old MacDonald still has a farm, and it's in Iowa, you may safely bet that on that farm he has electricity.

When the power companies last counted their rural Iowa customers, they found there were more customers than there are farms.

This, the Iowa Development Commission comments, is a far cry from the situation 10 years ago, when only 41 percent of Iowa's farms had the benefits of electricity. Five years ago, 62 percent had electric service.

Iowa's present contradiction of 201,527 electrified farm homes on 200,679 farms is really no contradiction at all. Those 848 extra homes merely prove that both the old folks and the young folks on the "home place" have electricity in their separate houses, or that both the owner's and the hired man's house have electric light and power.

The figures also prove that electricity has moved onto the Iowa farm at an impressive rate in the last 10 years.

In 1940, Iowa had 29,455 miles of power lines in the country, taking electricity to 68,509 farm homes.

Now, there are three times as many rural customers, on 2.5 times as many miles of power lines. Iowa now has 73,890 miles of rural power lines.

Of Iowa's rural power users, 63.8 percent are REA customers, 34.3 percent buy their power from private companies, and 2 percent buy from municipal power plants. REA owns 70 percent of the rural power lines; private utilities, 28.2 percent; and city-owned companies, 1.5 percent. More than half the REA power (53.8 percent) is provided by private utility companies.

Big Steel Companies Are Expanding Their Facilities in the Great Lakes Region and Are Not Worried Over the Iron-Ore Fields in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the February 22, 1951, issue of the Jamestown (N. Y.) Journal in an editorial destroys the desperate effort being made to sell the St. Lawrence seaway and power project to the American people in the name of national defense.

Each Member of Congress should read the following editorial titled "That Seaway Project":

THAT SEAWAY PROJECT

The Truman administration is pulling out all the stops in trying to restore life to the St. Lawrence seaway project. Currently, it is taking advantage of the critical international situation in a desperate effort to sell the plan on the ground that the United States must start its part of the seaway now to assure the country of access to an adequate supply of iron ore if war comes.

That such an argument, advanced by high Government officials including Cabinet members, in the stress of the world crisis, may gain congressional supporters for the seaway is altogether possible. The defense program does emphasize the critical need of a steady flow of iron ore. However, there is every reason to believe that the claims of the seaway supporters as to the limitations of the supply of iron ore in Minnesota and Wisconsin are grossly exaggerated. The fact that the big steel companies are substantially expanding their facilities in the Great Lakes region would suggest that they are not greatly worried over the iron ore fields in the United States.

In any event, it must be borne in mind that the project, if approved, would be at least 5 years under construction, and more likely the period would be even longer. What is further to be considered is the fact that in the event of enemy action the seaway, either under construction or after completion, would be a prime enemy target. The cost for the United States, estimated on figures presumably compiled long before the enormous inflation, and which would be materially higher under prevailing conditions, is $600,000,000. Secretary Sawyer says shipping tolls would pay for it in 50 years. That might be. But it is a lot of money to add to the present stupendous outlays of the Government for defense. And the project certainly could not be completed within the period when Russia can be expected to strike, if it should strike at all.

Gallup Poll Indicates Public Believes in What Truman Foreign Policy Is Trying To Accomplish

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, as stated in an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal, Sunday, April 22, 1951, a recent public-opinion poll conducted by Dr. George Gallup on the General MacArthur controversy offers a good example of why it is not wise to attach great political significance to the removal of MacArthur by President Truman without doing some soul searching as to the real issues involved.

Everyone has great admiration for General MacArthur as a military leader. It is to be regretted the present action became necessary, but I feel the general left the President no other course. If you will read the attached editorial carefully you will find references to public opinion on policies that are the real issues in the case.

It is doubtful if the majority of those taking the general's side in the present controversy would support his position on matters of policy. I do know from observation of their voting records that the majority of the congressional supporters of the general have taken opposite policy views.

I feel, as does the writer of the Journal editorial, that some people are using General MacArthur's popularity for partisan purposes and in so doing they are endangering national security.

The Journal editorial follows:

THE PUBLIC MIND

A public-opinion poll conducted by Dr. George Gallup on the MacArthur controversy offers a good example of why it is not wise to attach great political significance to the ouster without doing some soul searching as to the real issues behind it.

Voters questioned backed up General MacArthur. The vote was 62 percent to 29 percent for President Truman's decision.

But does that mean that the great majority go along with the theory of expanding the war against Red China? No, according to the replies to the other questions asked in the survey.

Only 46 percent thought bombing of Chinese bases in Manchuria would end the Korean War, as against 40 percent that thought it would not. And the public voted overwhelmingly against any all-out war with China as suggested by the extreme position of Senator CAIN, of Washington.

Further, 7 out of every 10 voters believe that a war with China means global war with Russia, and 6 out of every 10 voters believe that bombing Chinese bases would bring Russia into the war.

And, most surprising of all, in view of the loose appeasement talk, the public, by a 3-to-2 vote, believes the Truman administration should make stronger efforts to find mutually satisfactory peace terms in Korea; that it has not yet gone far enough in this direction.

These statistics indicate General MacArthur's public popularity as a military commander who has done a great deal for his country, and also represents the traditional American sympathy for a person who was fired from a top job he has earned the hard way. They also indicate that the public generally believes in what the Truman foreign policy is trying to accomplish.

Any attempt to use MacArthur's popularity to force a change in that policy is partisan tinkering with national security.

Army Quartermaster Corps Charged With Wasting Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I call attention to a letter written by one of my constituents, Mr. Fred Irish, of Tama, Iowa, who alleges a serious waste of manpower in the Army Quartermaster Corps.

I have called this situation to the attention of the Secretary of Defense and the Honorable CARL VINSON, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

The letter follows:

TAMA, IOWA.

Hon. H. R. GROSS,
Washington, D. C.:

With the appropriations for our military defense and the utmost utilization of manpower in our Armed Forces in great need of much closer scrutiny, I believe there is an opportunity for a great saving of both men and money in the food-procurement program of the Army Quartermaster Corps. While we have the civilian staff of the United States Department of Agriculture, Production and Marketing Administration standing by, and in some instances having already done the inspection and grading necessary, the Quartermaster Corps sends its full inspection and grading staff to handle all of the original inspection of the dairy and poultry products purchased for their use.

It is my contention that our tax money would be, in this instance, used to a much greater advantage and more able-bodied men (over 19 years of age, if you please) made available for other military duty, if the Dairy and Poultry Inspection and Grading Division of the Production and Marketing Administration personnel were to be given the full responsibility of inspecting and grading all of the dairy and poultry products acquired by the Quartermaster Corps.

It has been my experience to see, in many instances, exact duplication of inspection service by the assignment of Army personnel to the point of operation while the contract is being filled in a plant already operating under PMA supervision. The Army Quartermaster Corps will not accept PMA graded eviscerated poultry products even though they do accept PMA approved plants to furnish the product. They will not accept United States Department of Agriculture grading of New York dressed poultry. If a plant wishes to have continuous United States Department of Agriculture supervision in order to comply with the 1951 approved poultry dressing and grading program, it must undergo the necessary expense of paying for this service, and also the expense of making the product available to the Army Quartermaster Corps when fulfilling an Army contract. This is a waste of manpower and tax money.

The same situation exists in the disregard by the Quartermaster Corps for the PMA grading of shell eggs. Many, if not most, of the produce houses in this State, or in any State which at any time requires the inspection and grading service of either branch, have a resident United States Department of Agriculture inspector running a continuous inspection of shell eggs. Why, then, is it necessary to send military personnel to this plant to do exactly the same work that these people are there to do?

The United States Department of Agriculture has been able to further train excellent personnel, already long experienced in the dairy and poultry industries. The Production and Marketing Administration established the standards of quality and grades as well as the operational requirements for approved plants and their men are specifically trained to foster the adherence to these standards throughout the industry.

It has been my experience to notice the uniformity and fairness of grading among the PMA inspectors and I must say that in many instances there is a general lack of this uniformity within the ranks of the Quartermaster Corps personnel carrying on the inspection and grading. I am sure that this difference is due largely to the long background of experience and diligent training of the PMA personnel. They have shown themselves willing to be helpful and cooperative, in every conceivable manner, in carrying out their duties. They have gone out of their way to help the plants produce a better product for civilian and Army use as well.

I sincerely believe that this is a matter that should receive immediate attention. It is not a matter of setting up a new agency. It is a matter of eliminating all inspections, at origin, of dairy and poultry products purchased by the Army Quartermaster Corps.

Very truly yours,

Mr. FRED IRISH,
Partner, J. H. Neil Creamery Co.

MacArthur's Day—And Say

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, the dominating news of late has been the return of and the welcome to General MacArthur. The great majority of Americans were pleased to extend a joyful and hearty welcome home to this great old soldier of our Pacific war and an outstanding administrator of conquered Japan. The welcome shown to him was a deserved tribute and an understanding of our realization of his outstanding service for the United States. However, around this welcome home has hung a pall of doubt and uncertainty as to just what differences between the President and the general had necessitated his retirement. By this time the air is beginning to clear and fairly sharp lines of agreement and disagreement are coming into the fore. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial of April 20 from the Daily Sentinel, of Grand Junction, Colo., carefully spelling out its editorial opinion of the issues. The editorial is written in calmness and has a searching quality after fact. I commend its reading to the Members as a penetrating statement of the issues as seen by one of the outstanding newspaper editors of the Rocky Mountain region. I believe value exists within its contents for believers of either side of the present controversy. The editorial is as follows:

MACARTHUR'S DAY—AND SAY

General MacArthur has had his day and also his say. He has been hailed with an acclaim that should gratify any conquering hero. He has had his opportunity to address the Nation and that address was listened to with close attention and high respect.

From the purely military standpoint the general clearly presented his picture of the Asiatic situation. He made it clear that we must dominate the Pacific. In his picture of the Orient he reaffirmed the well-known fact that it is the Asiatics' urge to nationalism that prompts most of the unrest in the Far East. But in the case of China, according to the general, this nationalism has inspired imperialistic dreams. And out of these new-born dreams developed China's entry into the Korean war. As General MacArthur presented the case, Russia, contrary to general opinion, had little if anything to do with Peiping's decision to invade North Korea. In that belief of the general he apparently holds that we—never once does he mention the United Nations—should bomb Manchurian bases, blockade Chinese ports and fully support Chiang. He discounted fears that such action might bring Russia into the war by only the nonassuring assertion that "the Soviet need not necessarily become involved." We would like for the general to have been more explicit on this. Since he had asserted that the fight between communism and freedom is global, can he assure us that our entry into China would leave Russia unmoved either in Asia or Europe? He ignores entirely the mutual aid pact between China and Russia.

Sincerely disavowing any love for war, General MacArthur still has no faith in organizations such as League of Nations—and by inference the UN— so international issues must still be decided in the crucible of war. While not naming them, the general appears to look upon those who seek to solve the Korean War without extending it to China as appeasers, giving no consideration to their honest aims to limit war while other ways than military are sought to end it.

As a military leader it is easy to understand why MacArthur could not explain the surrender of military advantages in the field—for military victory is the only victory conceivable in this grand old soldier's thinking. But there is a great sector of the human race today that seeks, perhaps mistakenly, to achieve victory without utilizing every military advantage before weighing its ultimate as well as its immediate consequences.

We would have liked for the general to have been more explicit in his advocacy for all-out support of Chiang, one of the most controversial issues of the day.

It was a fine speech, delivered in calmness and earnestness. But it leaves many things to be clarified. Perhaps the general will be more revealing before a Senate Armed Services Committee. The speech may prove most helpful if it forces the United Nations, as well as United States, to fresh consideration of their Far East policies. Whether that consideration would result in any change or not it would prove beneficial in clearing the air and clarifying UN policy—however insignificant that appears to General MacArthur.

Hon. Clare Boothe Luce in Behalf of Music

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, because Clare Boothe Luce, former Congresswoman from my State, playwright, author, lecturer, and one of the most humanitarian citizens I know, has so eloquently stated the case for the perpetuation of good music by exempting symphony and grand opera organizations from Federal admission taxes, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of her remarks made at a dinner for Friends of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York on Monday, April 2, 1951, at the Hotel Plaza, New York, N. Y.:

There are two ways to know how much you need and love music: One is to be able to hear it; the other is not to be able to hear it.

Imagine, if you can, what the world—our world—would be like if no music were ever heard in it. Now that's an amusing idea. Let's play with it for a minute.

Let's imagine the rise of some final, superbarbaric dictator. He's a man, we'll say, who hates music. That's a pretty good definition, incidentally, of the tyrant or hater of humanity. As Shakespeare wrote:

"The man that hath no music in himself
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds
Is fit for treasons, strategems, and spoils."

So, let's pretend that this harmony-hating tyrant bans all music. That is, all man-made music from the world. He commands all musical instruments to be destroyed; orders all musicians exiled. He outlaws all music and music-making by man, woman, or child, in private or in public. Under pain of fine or imprisonment there is to be no singing, even of lullabies, hymns, or national anthems, and no playing, even on combs covered with tissue paper, no less barrel organs, or any kind of tunes no matter how thin or tinkling. There is to be no humming, crooning, whistling, beating of fingers on the table, which would show that one was listening to unheard melodies. A man who sang in the bathtub would be considered a flagrant lawbreaker. This tyrant—a logical fellow—would not even allow martial music to be played for his troops marching off to the wars—they would have to shuffle off bound together like prisoners in a chain gang. (The murder of music would show men to be what this assassination would surely make of them—slaves.)

Anyone caught operating or attending a musical speakeasy—or "play-softly"—would be guilty of breaking the law even if his excuse were that he went there to hear a love song with his girl. The possession of bootleg phonographs or earphones would call for the most severe sentences. Anyone caught in the company of composers or conductors in the musical underground would be sent to a concentration camp as an enemy of the state. There, all he would hear for the rest of his life would be drilling machines, cement smashers, taxi horns, and factory whistles. And such other sounds as issue from machines instead of the soul. Even people who thronged to parks, picnic groves, or the country would be suspected of subversive activity, particularly if they sat silently listening to the birds, the brooks, the bees, the wind in the trees. For this would show both a musical and a religious tendency. These people would plainly be listening to the harmony that lies at the heart of all nature, the author of which is God. They would be reflecting that music making is merely the man-made organizing of nature's sweet wild sounds. Man's participation with God in the harmonious act of creation—the creating of harmony.

"Music is the greatest good that mortals know
And all of heaven we have below."

How many people in such a world would still claim that music was a matter of indifference to them? That they could take it or leave it; that music—especially fine music—"bored" them; that they had no "ear" for music at all? I expect none.

For in the final analysis, what people who say such things really mean is that they prefer thin, or simple, or mediocre sounds to rich, complex, superior musical sounds such as are made by a great symphony orchestra playing the works of great composers. (They only think they prefer them—but that's because they won't or don't listen enough.) But, being reasonable people they would have to admit that there is a place for the finest and the best music in American life and culture, as well as for the mediocre. And, being reasonable people, they would agree that if we ever got around to destroying or suppressing the best, we'd be driven on to destroy the second best, and finally, like our imaginary tyrant, all music.

The destruction or suppression of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would be the beginning of the end of all fine music in America. Whether it were destroyed by dictatorship, by government taxation and high cost of music making, or suppressed merely owing to a lack of public and private support, it does come to the same thing: The beginning of a world without music.

We dare not let this happen. We must set about saving our finest music and supporting our finest music makers in the American way—by private support, such as you will give them tonight, and by public support, such as we will get from our radio audience listening to our appeals tonight.

The great philosopher, Plato, wrote 2,500 years ago in The Republic, that "when modes of music change, the laws of the state always change with them." A great, free, noble people with a rich, free culture will have great, free, noble orchestras like the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Where such music and music makers flourish, our liberties are safe.

W. Stuart Symington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, President Truman has nominated W. Stuart Symington to direct the reorganized Reconstruction Finance Corporation and in my opinion, which I am certain is shared by all in Congress, the President could not have made a better choice.

Mr. Symington has had a distinguished career in business and in government. To the latter he brought experience and efficiency which made him an outstanding administrator and public official. He is recognized by Democrats and Republicans alike as one of the most capable men in government.

His record, as well as the respect he commands from all who are familiar with his work, should enable him to restore public confidence in the RFC. I am certain he will.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial in tribute to Mr. Symington from East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal of Friday, April 20, 1951:

USEFUL SYMINGTON

The Senate can be expected to confirm without delay the nomination of W. Stuart Symington to be Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Symington, responsible to the President, supplants the five-man RFC Board that came under fire as a result of Fulbright committee revelations of influence in high place, even in the White House circle.

Investigation of the great Government lending agency will continue, but since the inquiry will deal with pre-Symington administration, the new RFC head will be free to make whatever changes are necessary to restore its usefulness and regain public confidence.

The Symington appointment is temporary. The former St Louis industrialist is a troubleshooter who has held a succession of important jobs in the higher levels of the Government. Once the RFC has been reorganized—or, possibly, abolished—he will be available for another assignment, and there surely will be one.

President Truman has complained often of the short supply of men of outstanding ability who are willing to accept low-pay, insecure Government jobs. Because such men are few the President has shifted them about so that a half dozen men have completed almost a score of assignments.

One of those men is Fred M. Vinson, Chief Justice of the United States. Ordinarily that exalted post would be regarded as the capstone to a distinguished career. But Chief Justice Vinson, former Cabinet member and former "Assistant President," is accounted available for further assignment. He is regarded as a possible Democratic Presidential nominee if Mr. Truman does not want another term. Stuart Symington must be accounted for among the Presidential protentials. He has gathered a lot of Government experience in a few years in the National Capital.

The War in Korea and the Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from two newsgrams appearing in United States News and World Report, the first from the issue of April 20, 1951, and the second from the issue of April 27, 1951. I might add that Americans generally have come to realize that United States News and World Report has an objective point of view and a reputation for high reliability. I think Americans generally will want to read these two very significant excerpts written by the staff of David Lawrence, who has unusual facilities for arriving at factual information in connection with the entire Asiatic problem.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From United States News and World Report of April 20, 1951]

TOMORROW

A truce in Korea remains improbable. Expanding war is more likely.

Communist answer to moves for a truce is to be an offensive. Appeals for peace, soundings, offers of a deal haven't sparked Communist interest.

War, as a result, is to go on. Wars, under way, tend to spread.

With MacArthur in command, Communists did not know what to expect. It might be atom bombing, it might be smashed cities, it might be invasion of south China, it might be anything. Peace might seem better. Without MacArthur, all is simpler. Chinese cities won't be bombed. Invasion won't come. A price will be paid by UN to get peace. There's nothing much to fear, so why not go on fighting and maybe get a higher price later on for peace?

MacArthur's going will encourage the Communists.

Mr. Truman, politically, cannot pay the price for peace in Korea.

Formosa is the Communists' first demand. Britain wants to give it as part payment to the Communists for peace. United States can't agree to that.

UN membership is next. Britain says, "Pay." United States can't agree.

Get out of Korea is the third Communist requirement. After going in, suffering 60,000 casualties, United States now can't suddenly pull out.

So the business of chasing each other up and down the Korean peninsula is to go on. The cost, in United States casualties, averages about 1,400 a week. It's a continuing cost, no end in sight under policies spelled out for Comunists. Idea that Communists will tire of losses and sue for peace is highly unlikely. Manpower is China's cheapest commodity. Losses won't discourage Communists.

As the Communists must size up things in planning new moves:

Mr. Truman's nerve broke at chancing bigger war. Britain gets her way.

Appeasement, not bigger war, is in the wind. United States is ready to deal.

Price for a temporary deal can be held high. United States will pay rather than accept dangers of expanded war in Asia. Whip hand shifts to Communist side.

Actually, Communist leaders may be playing with dynamite. Made bolder by soft talk from United States by punishment for an exponent of victory in war, they may misjudge, go too far, and get smacked. Firing of MacArthur, bid for peace, may help to generate the very expanding war Mr. Truman says he wants to avoid.

[From United States News and World Report of April 27, 1951]

TOMORROW

To help you get the record straight on MacArthur and Truman:

Staff Chiefs of United States did not meet formally and recommend dismissal of General MacArthur. There was no action by Joint Chiefs as a group.

Informally, when their opinion was asked, Staff Chiefs did express the opinion that General MacArthur should be replaced as Supreme Commander.

Method of replacement was not suggested by service leaders.

Mr. Truman, not United States Staff Chiefs, thought up the idea of firing General MacArthur in the middle of the night, without prior consultation, without any explanation. A military commander with 52 years of service to the Nation was fired without a hearing or a chance to take farewell of his troops.

Joint Chiefs, definitely, did not recommend that procedure.

It is true, literally, that Joint Chiefs of United States, in the past, were in agreement with General MacArthur on strategy in waging the present war.

MacArthur strategy called for: (1) economic blockade of China; (2) naval blockade of China's coast; (3) air reconnaissance of Manchuria and of China's coast; (4) end of restrictions on Chiang Kai-shek to use his forces on China mainland and support for Chiang with military supplies, not combat manpower.

Strategy favored by Joint Chiefs, at one point, did coincide.

Ideas of strategy, however, do change. United States strategy is influenced by political as well as military considerations, by attitudes of allies as well as by concepts of strictly United States desires and interests.

United States strategy, as of now, calls for: (1) diplomatic moves to try to get settlement; (2) no blockade of China, no air operations above the Yalu River; (3) limited operations above the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea, to provide for security of UN forces and to maintain contact with the enemy.

General MacArthur differed with this strategy. Joint Chiefs approved the new strategy. Strategy adopted formally on March 20, 1951, was influenced by: (1) Dean Acheson, United States Secretary of State; (2) the British Government.

Diplomats, not military men, now will seek to settle the war. How well they succeed remains to be seen. With MacArthur out, they get their chance.

You will be interested in these other points:

The MacArthur letter to JOSEPH MARTIN, dated March 20, Tokyo, had been written and mailed before the new strategy was laid down for the General. The strategy directive, announcing a peace try, reached Tokyo March 21.

A MacArthur peace offer on March 24, Tokyo time, was considered within the prerogatives of a military commander in carrying out his duties.

A directive from the Joint Chiefs, dated March 24, telling MacArthur to coordinate any further statements with Washington was the last word received by the general from the Joint Chiefs or President before the order firing him. The Martin letter was made public in Washington April 5. The order to fire was delivered in Tokyo April 11. That was an interval of 18 days between any exchange of communications with Washington and Tokyo in a war period.

The order to fire was a complete surprise to General MacArthur, wholly unexpected. Its summary nature was without precedent.

In the war itself, Communist leaders, not UN, hold the initiative.

Communists, with initiative, can strike soon or hold off indefinitely, taking whatever time is necessary to build air and ground forces. There will be time to equip new armies, train pilots, acquire planes, build airfields.

The choice of time, methods, build-up of forces is left to Communists.

United States forces, left in the dark, can probe, make limited advances, use planes for attack within a limited area, but can't try to win a decision.

What comes out of that situation is anybody's guess. The next big move, if there is to be one, is up to the Communists. They can play a waiting game or they can throw in all they've got, including air, for a try at a decision. Only Communists know what the choice is going to be. United States sits and waits.

To get personalities straightened out in a developing argument:

George Marshall, Defense Secretary, is the Europe-first leader. The Marshall thesis is that United States cannot be strong both in Europe and Asia. Asia must be secondary. General MacArthur differs, sees the problem as global.

Dean Acheson, State Secretary, now sides with Marshall. Earlier he had favored broader war with Communist China. Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of Staff Chiefs, is the White House spokesman, expressing official opinions. Chiefs of service staffs operate under White House orders. Staff Chiefs do agree that Korean battlefield could be isolated and the war brought to an end successfully, if Russia did not intervene. Staff Chiefs do agree that, if world war is to come, Europe, not Asia, would be the main theater.

Dwight Eisenhower, supreme commander in Europe, is on the side lines, but inclined more to the Marshall than the MacArthur viewpoint.

Congress Should Review Our Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. J. BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution from Anderson Memorial Post, No. 5996, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Anderson, S. C.:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
ANDERSON MEMORIAL POST, NO. 5996,
Anderson, S. C.

Anderson Memorial Post, No. 5996, Veterans of Foreign Wars, in regular meeting, April 12, 1951, unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, That—

"1. Whereas we have served our country overseas and may have to do so again, we want our servants in Congress to know that we believe the Congress should review our whole defense plan without fear or favor as to individual or party.

"2. We stand in awe at the report of more than 60,000 casualties for our forces in Korea. Our county has had its share of these. Is it a United Nations affair, or is it that in name and United States in blood and lives lost? If British interests can force out the Supreme Commander in Korea, their contribution of men and arms should more nearly equal ours. Naturally, our servants are aware of the economic interests of Britishers in Asia aside from their concern for the future of Hong Kong.

"3. Our chief concern is with policy rather than with personality. We do not believe there is any such thing as the indispensable man in any field. However, if the United Nations ties us to a sacrifice of American lives in Korea in a questionable venture, we ask immediate revision of future commitments. In the light of our Korean experience, we already feel that the wise and practical course would be to cease to implement the provisions of the Atlantic Pact before we find ourselves involved in another equally hopeless situation.

"4. A clean-up in our official family in Washington should not be delayed if careful investigation of the Korean situation shows dereliction on the part of the two Cabinet heads responsible for the action in Korea—namely, Secretary Acheson and Secretary Marshall. There are no sacred heads in our Government. We humbly remind our servants that it is almost axiomatic that the boss fixes the blame while the leader fixes the breakdown.

"5. Many of our members are already on active duty, and others will go soon. We do not wish to face active service again without the utmost confidence in our high command. Under present conditions confidence is low and still sinking.

"6. This is no effort to present a "pressure bloc" in favor of any individual. We are simple Americans who enjoy living. We feel that the ruthless sacrifice of 20,000 lives should be justified by more than we have been able to glean from the bloody blunder in Korea.

"7. It is not our good fortune to possess any superior wisdom as to what is best. In all humility and without apology, we implore you not to be blinded by party loyalty in a review of our foreign policy. It may sound strong, but nevertheless, it is the view of real Americans and cruelly true that "In Arlington we do not find Republicans or Democrats but silent Americans who in time of danger served their country honorably and now sleep side by side in peace."

"8. Our final hope is in constitutional government which in American practice properly operates around the three related but independent points of the triangle, namely, executive, judicial, and legislative. We fear that constitutional government is in jeopardy. We are depending on our servants in Washington."

Service Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of April 24, 1951:

SERVICE INSURANCE

Congressional conferees have done a good job of patching up the totally different House and Senate bills on insurance for GIs. They have taken what we regard as the best features of both versions. The net is to expand insurance coverage of men on active duty by making it automatic and retroactive to June 27, 1950, and yet to continue the right of new veterans to retain their Government insurance by paying premiums on a term basis after discharge.

Reconciliation of the two versions was not an easy task. The House had conferred free insurance benefits on all men on active duty but had eliminated any provision for continuation of insurance after discharge, whereas the Senate had granted coverage for a limited time to men killed on active duty but had left other existing provisions undisturbed. The compromise is a liberal system which satisfies the prime need for permanent, universal coverage of men on active duty, takes care of men disabled in service and permits cash refunds on old-style policies, and still meets the worthwhile objective of enabling future veterans to continue low-cost insurance. The conferees deserve a vote of thanks.

Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Senate Finance Committee is preparing to report to the Senate the bill H. R. 1612, providing for extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. The House, in passing the bill, saw fit to amend it in such a way as to seriously hamper the effective continuance of the reciprocal trade principle should the amendments be permitted to become law. I do not believe that the Senate should retain those amendments. When the bill comes to conference, I hope that the House will agree to their elimination.

The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce has approved a statement issued by their World Trade Committee and World Trade Association which cogently outlines the reasons why the four House amendments of which I speak would render the trade-agreements program practically inoperative. This statement is now before the Senate Finance Committee for their consideration. In the hope that it will persuade my colleagues in the House to reconsider their previous stand on this matter, I ask that the statement be printed in full in the RECORD, and I now submit it for that purpose:

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
March 8, 1951.

To: Board of Directors.
From: World Trade Committee and World Trade Association.
Subject: Approval of Extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

REQUESTED ACTION

That the board of directors approve the recommendation of the World Trade Committee and the World Trade Association of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce to approve legislation to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended. This act extends the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program for a further period of 3 years from June 12, 1951.

STATEMENT

There is attached the report of the World Trade Committee and the World Trade Association dated January 30, 1951, recommending approval of legislation to extend the trade agreements program for a further period of 3 years from June 12, 1951. In supporting this recommendation the two groups submitted a lengthy statement reviewing the history and accomplishments of the program.

The House Ways and Means Committee voted approval of the legislation without amendment. Four amendments were approved by the House of Representatives, which, if approved by the Senate and adopted, would have serious effects on our international relationship with the free countries whose aid and cooperation we are seeking. Further, it would play into the hands of the Soviet propagandists, destroy the effectiveness of the operation of the present program, interfere with the present mobilization program for defense, and penalize the public interest and consumers of the United States, and not accomplish the objectives the proponents desire or claim.

The amendments, following thorough investigation, appear to be restrictive, unnecessary, undesirable, and unworkable, as pointed out in the statement below.

(The proposed amendments as submitted to the Senate and now before the Senate Finance Committee are reproduced and attached.)

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, representing a cross section of all business, agricultural, and national interests of the country which appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee in support of the extension of the program, without amendment for 3 years, will appear before the Senate Finance Committee March 21, 1951, opposing all four amendments. In the FC clipsheet of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of February 16, 1951, they have the following to say:

"Those who favor the highly restrictive provisions (the proposed amendments) show lack of understanding, we believe, of the basic purposes of the trade-agreements program and the benefits which have derived to the United States from the program. To enact such a measure as that which is currently proposed is perhaps worse than no trade-agreements program at all. It would be too cumbersome to be of any practical value. Furthermore, the principle of such restrictive measures is inconsistent with the basic concept of competitive private enterprise and with the practical aspects of the current international situation. In times of shortages throughout the world, it is of extreme importance that movement of materials and goods among free countries be as unrestricted as possible. Such, we believe, can be effected without undue injury to United States domestic industry, and, in fact, with great benefit to this country.

"It is inconceivable that the United States can in good conscience continue to press for removal of barriers by other friendly countries, if the United States itself adopts what is equivalent to an inoperative trade-agreements program."

Serious international effects

The trade-agreements program is the keystone of the foreign economic policy of the United States. The policy today is that we must do everything possible to build up the strength of the United States and the other free nations and to give these peoples a real stake in the future. This can be the only policy to meet the threat of military aggression, of subversion, of stirring up class strife, of exploiting discontent and poverty, and of preventing economic improvement.

An integral part of the process of building strength in the free world has been the effort to expand the flow of trade. Only by a greater exchange of goods between countries can the full benefits of economic development and greater production be maintained (and this means sharing our market with the producing nations of the world). The trade-agreements program has been a major element in our participation in this process of expanding world trade. This program has become a symbol of United States determination to lead in the cooperative effort to expand world trade. Renewal of the act will reaffirm that determination. Failure to renew the act would be a symbol of withdrawal from that cooperative effort.

Short-term renewal of the act with the crippling amendments will in the eyes of the free nations be a repudiation of our economic policy. To them it would have the appearance of our turning back to protectionism and economic isolationism. Their being needlessly denied access to American markets would force them to step up their trade with the Soviet bloc and deprive our defense effort of many badly needed strategic and critical materials.

Such a reversal of trade policy recalls the effects of our adoption of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act in 1930, which resulted in retaliatory tariffs and a score or more of other restrictive measures and practices on the part of nearly 70 countries, which destroyed two-thirds of the world's foreign trade. History has proved this condition deepened and prolonged the worldwide depression of the thirties. A repetition of this catastrophe would weaken all nations, including our own, and make all an easy prey for Soviet domination without a military struggle.

Another serious effect on our national economy is overlooked by the proponents of these amendments, the jeopardy in which it puts our existing foreign markets for agriculture and industry. The current $10,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 annual exports are of great importance to many major industries. These exports are not only the difference between profit and loss and prosperity and failure for the industries, but the share exported helps maintain stable high prices for the full production sold in the American market. Minority agricultural spokesmen overlook the importance of a totally prosperous American economy on the total sales of all American agricultural products. The economic well-being of the large manufacturing industries selling from 10 to 25 percent of their output overseas is the best guarantee for American agriculture for the orderly sale of the larger part of their production at high stable prices.

The reciprocal trade agreements program has proved successful in expanding our foreign trade. According to official figures published by the United States Department of Commerce (Commerce Reports for February 17, 1940), United States trade with trade agreement countries showed a substantial increase as compared with our trade with nontrade agreement countries.

At the end of 1939 the United States had concluded agreements with 18 countries (and colonies). The first agreement was signed September 3, 1934. This period, 1934–39, can be considered the only normal trading period for comparison purposes. Other actions, such as preparations for and World War II itself, altered the normal trade pattern.

These official figures show that our export trade average value for 1938–39 increased 62.8 percent over the average value for 1934–35. Our export trade with nonagreement countries for the same comparable periods increased only 31.7 percent, thus indicating that American export trade with the trade agreement countries was double that of the trade with nonagreement countries, and that the program was successful in accomplishing its objectives.

On the other hand, there was no extraordinary increase in the volume of imports during the same period. Generally imports from trade agreement countries increased 21.6 percent and those from nonagreement countries 12.5 percent.

The reciprocal trade-agreements program has had the approval of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States since its inception. Many national public-interest organizations have approved the trade-agreements program.

Furthermore, several features of the proposed amendments are inflationary in effect, which are contrary to policies of the National Government at the present time.

The proposed amendments

No. 1. Peril points: The peril-point issue was fully debated in connection with the Trade Agreement Extension Act of 1949 and the amendment was then repealed by Congress. When the amendment was proposed in 1948 the Chamber of Commerce of the United States made the following statement before the Senate Finance Committee:

"Placing all responsibility in the Tariff Commission for the determination of so-called peril points appears to have several undesirable effects. These peril points are the maximum and minimum points between which negotiations could proceed without reference to Congress. It is doubtful whether the Tariff Commission could achieve the wide correlation of diverse interests that is now obtained through the interdepartmental committees.

"In the light of its historic functions, the Tariff Commission would probably be chiefly concerned with the impact against the specific domestic commodities involved in negotiation. For the best interests of this country, equal consideration should be given to other producers, to consumers, and to the public generally. To vest the power of determining these peril points solely in the Tariff Commission would make that organization vulnerable to the pressure of affected interests to a degree that might challenge the recognized objectivity of this valuable agency.

"Such a concentration of authority might cause the Commission, from the standpoint of self-protection, to set peril points so conservatively that successful negotiation would have to exceed the range of option. This would mean that almost every successful agreement would necessarily have to go to Congress for approval. Thus it is not only conceivable but even probable that this act may return the highly technical subject of tariff writing to the crowded calendars of Congress."

The requirement in the bill that the Tariff Commission hold public hearings results in duplication of effort. Additional hearings still are necessary because the other departments would otherwise be unable to question the witnesses who have appeared at the Tariff Commission hearings and would thus be unable to obtain in many instances a completely clear understanding of the problem. Furthermore, Tariff Commission hearings do not yield information on United States export products or other matters relating to the agreement. A separate hearing is necessary in order that a segment of the American economy can have an opportunity to be heard. This segment is vastly larger than the one which appears at the Tariff Commission hearing. It consists of people interested in exports; it consists of people who are interested in better international relations; it consists of consumers; it consists of a predominant part of labor; it consists of a large share of the farmers.

The Tariff Commission is not qualified to make determinations regarding the national defense.

Under existing procedures the recommendations which go to the President as to concessions that he should make are the collective judgment of representatives of the Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Interior, Labor, State, Treasury, the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, and the United States Tariff Commission. This judgment is reached on the basis of the special knowledge of these representatives resulting from their respective responsibilities and after full public hearings. The record shows that these judgments have been sound.

To substitute peril-point proposals for this procedure, which has worked so well for so long, would be as undesirable as it would be unnecessary. The peril-point procedure, in effect, makes the judgment of a single agency determinative of the extent of tariff concessions; deprives that agency in making its judgment of the right to participate in the discussions of the other agencies concerned with the program; requires that agency to perform the almost impossible task of fixing a precise point which will serve as a sort of guaranty against injury for the future; and results in a duplication of hearings.

Nothing has happened since repeal of this amendment in 1949 and no arguments have been presented to change the view that the peril-point amendment is both unecessary and undesirable.

Furthermore, to carry out the requirements of this amendment in determining the peril points on several thousand commodities, it will require an expanded working force in the Tariff Commission many times the present size. Businessmen, farmers, and others could expect a flood of new forms and questionnaries to be filled out and a swarm of investigators to study their costs.

No. 2. The escape clause: Ever since the Trade Agreements Act was proposed and all through the administration of the trade-agreements program, there have been industries which have claimed that they would be injured by the program. There is clear evidence, both in the hearings that precede negotiations and in the congressional hearings in connection with renewal of the Trade Agreements Act, that in very few cases have the fears of injury been justified. However, there are adequate means for preventing or remedying any such injury if it occurs after the agreement has gone into effect.

All the trade agreements which have been signed since 1943, including the general agreement on tariffs and trade, have included an escape clause under which any party to the agreement may modify or withdraw an individual concession if it is found that, as a result of unforeseen circumstances and of the concession, imports of the item in question are occurring in such increased quantity and in such circumstances as to cause or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry. Under this clause the concession may be either partly or wholly withdrawn, a quota imposed on imports, or a rate of duty even higher than that in effect before the concession may be put into effect.

By joint agreement a substantially identical clause was included on October 13, 1950, in the trade agreement between the United States and Switzerland, concluded in 1936.

For the United States, the escape clause action is administered by the Tariff Commission, which makes its recommendation to the President, directly and without participation of any other Government agency.

An industry claiming injury or threat of injury resulting from a trade-agreement concession applies to the Tariff Commission for an investigation and public hearing. If, in the Commission's opinion, a preliminary examination reveals facts warranting a formal investigation, the Commission conducts one and recommends to the President the action, if any, which should be taken.

Although the United States has made concessions on several thousand items in trade agreements that contain the escape clause, only 20 applications for investigations, covering 17 products, have been filed with the Tariff Commission. Five of these are still pending. Of the 15 which have been disposed of, only 1 (involving women's fur felt hats and hat bodies) was found by the Tariff Commission to justify action. In that case the Tariff Commission recommended withdrawal of the concession and this was done.

The careful application of the safeguards observed before concessions are made and the way concessions are tailored to particular needs are primarily responsible for the fact that need for using the escape clause has been minimized.

Furthermore, modifications and withdrawal of concessions have been made in several agreements signed before 1943 where evidence was submitted or investigation by the Tariff Commission found injury or threat of injury to domestic industries. These included certain types of embroidered handkerchiefs from Switzerland, linen fire hose from Canada, fox furs from Canada, and potatoes from Canada.

In view of this history of the operation of the escape clause as well as the fact that during the 17-year life of the reciprocal trade agreements program no industry has suffered harm or injury and that the value of United States export trade and the world's trade as a whole has doubled, proves that the program has been well administered and that the proposals for amendment are unnecessary.

No. 3. Ban of concessions on foreign farm commodities sold at less than domestic support price: This proposed amendment does not appear to be in the public interest. It would tend to pyramid subsidization, it is inflationary in character, contrary to established policy of the Government, and does not appear administratively sound. Unfortunately, there can be no complete reconciliation between tariff protectionism and the program of price supports for agricultural commodities and the program for multilateral tariff negotiations. Removing of concessions on price-supported agricultural products may well cause other nations to retaliate by withdrawing concessions granted to United States products. Such actions would affect all segments of our economy. Does it seem logical, or just, to permit the operation of the domestic support program to invite almost certain retaliation, on the part of foreign countries, which will restrict the exportation of all types of American products?

No. 4. Forbid President to grant tariff concessions to Communist or satellite countries: The reasons motivating this amendment are easily appreciated. However, it appears to be designed as a measure of economic warfare rather than as a trade or tariff measure. Advantages to be gained will be more than outweighed by disadvantages. Benefits gained by the Soviet Union and her satellite countries are at a minimum as all shipments to iron curtain countries are regulated under the Export Control Act. Important to our economy and to our defense at the present time are certain materials, notably tungsten and manganese, which we are getting from the Soviet Union. Does it seem wise to take a step that would deprive ourselves of needed critical materials?

Another element of this amendment must be given serious consideration. We should remember that the actions of the United States, as determined by the Congress, are the criteria for honorable international behavior. Congressional approval of this amendment might jeopardize our continued efforts to secure an honorable and peaceful way to settle and dissipate world instability. This amendment could prove a tremendous tool of psychological warfare by enabling the Politburo to say that the United States is clearly the aggressor nation since it has taken the initiative in breaking off all commercial relations.

We feel more strongly than ever that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act should be extended for 3 years without crippling and unnecessary amendments. Its 17 years of successful administration with a minimum, if any, harm to any segments of the United States economy, should be sufficient recommendation for continuation of the program. The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce should reaffirm its position by approving this recommendation.

Respectfully submitted.

T. G. FRANCK,
Chairman, World Trade Committee.
FRANK M. JACOBS,
Acting President, World Trade Association.

Peace Can Be Won

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER FURCOLO
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an excerpt from a forthcoming book by Paul Hoffman, former head of the Economic Cooperation Administration, in which he sets forth his views as to the measures by which the United States can avert a third world war. This excerpt was printed in the New York Herald Tribune on April 18.

I think that his proposal for a unified overseas economic administration, which is substantially similar to a proposal made recently by the International Development Advisory Board, deserves the serious consideration of the Congress.

PEACE CAN BE WON

(By Paul G. Hoffman)

SINGLE ALLOCATION AGENCY FOR FOREIGN AID IS URGED AS BAR TO WASTE AND SPUR TO EFFICIENCY

(This is the seventh of a series of articles condensed from Peace Can Be Won, the forthcoming book by Paul Hoffman, former head of the Economic Cooperation Administration, in which he sets forth his views as to the measures by which the United States can avert a third world war.)

From the standpoint of foreign-aid programs I believe the most important lesson we have learned is this: To get maximum efficiency out of the dollars we spend abroad, we must have only one Government agency with responsibility for allocating all funds. Only by concentrating control over our economic activities abroad in the hands of a single agency can we:

(1) Properly apportion aid among countries (several agencies working separately often tend to give one nation too much help, another too little).

(2) Avoid waste of dollars within a country (two or more agencies often duplicate functions).

(3) Control the impact of our dollars upon the economy of a recipient country (too great a pressure for rearming on a nation of full employment, like Britain, could unduly drive down the standard of living; the same dollars applied to rearming in a nation of unemployment, like Germany, would raise the standard of living).

Therefore I should like to recommend most urgently to the American people and to Congress that an Overseas Economic Administration be formed to administer all aid and technical assistance programs abroad; that this administration have a large measure of control over the policies of such lending agencies as the Export-Import Bank; that United States representatives to all international economic organizations be responsible to it; and that this administration have equal rank with the other departments of the Government, such as State, Commerce, Interior, and that its administrator have Cabinet status.

WOULD TAKE OVER ECA

In effect, I recommend that this proposed Overseas Economic Administration take over the present set-up of ECA; that it absorb the point 4 program now administered by the State Department; that it supervise at least the economic side of all sums to be spent in European rearmament under the mutual defense assistance program. Moreover, American representation in the World Bank, International Monetary Fund, International Trade Organization (when we join) and in all other international government bodies dealing with the world receive its policy direction from such an Overseas Economic Administration.

The sense of interdependence among peoples has given the word politics a new meaning for me. Actually, world politics shapes our lives more tellingly than ward politics. A coffee blight in Brazil, a famine in India, devaluation in Britain, the almost perpetual cabinet crises in France, the discovery of uranium ore in Africa, a political assassination in Lebanon, all have an increasingly direct and pervasive influence upon decisions which determine our destiny as individuals and as a people.

What all of this means is that world politics is a vital salient in waging the peace, and that we must have a foreign policy in time of peace which is quite as positive as foreign policy in time of war. Yet it has been only within the last decade that our peacetime foreign policy has been shifting away from the negative toward the positive.

STATE DEPARTMENT HAMPERED

In the broad sense, we all make foreign policy out of our ignorance or out of our knowledge, out of our courage or out of our fear. But the major burden of crystallizing it rests upon the State Department. In coping with this challenge, it is hampered not only by the carry-overs of our ingrained isolationism but also by traditional suspicion of its personnel. I must confess that when I came to Washington I tended to visualize it in terms of striped trousers and wing collars, the mark of an aloof priesthood. I thought of the State Department as an aggregation of cookie pushers whose only diploma was the parchment of snobbism signed by family wealth and connections.

I found out that nothing could be further from the truth. During my 2½ years as ECA Administrator I learned that the State Department is staffed with extremely hard-working, devoted, and competent people. They are drawn from all groups in our society. The very growth of the Department from 5,400 in 1939 to some 24,000 today attests not only to the growth in America's world leadership responsibilities but also to the fact that its qualifications are hardly confined to social position and inherited opulence.

The need for a positive foreign policy to define our relations with all peoples in all parts of the world is of such surpassing importance that I believe the State Department should concentrate all its energies upon this task. It should not dilute its energies nor divert its skills from this transcendent task of policy making by trying to administer a point 4 program or the Voice of America. To engage in these or similar pursuits, instead of delegating them to separate operational agencies, is to confuse staff with line functions.

ADVANTAGES TESTED BY ECA

The advantages of keeping staff and line functions apart have been tested by the Economic Cooperation Administration. ECA was set up as a separate agency to carry out a political aim, a foreign policy directive, by means of an economic-aid program. When the ECA was being established, considerable anxiety was expressed lest the State Department and the ECA get embroiled in jurisdictional disputes. Indeed, Congress was so worried about this possibility that it wrote into the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 (the enabling legislation for ECA) that the ECA Administrator and the Secretary of State should keep each other fully and currently informed and arrive at mutually acceptable decisions. In case of any moot point which could not be resolved between them, the disagreement was to be laid directly before the President. To date, there has never been a conflict of this kind to take to the President, and I am confident that there will never be one.

Actually, ECA has had the fullest cooperation from the State Department and could not have gone forward successfully without it. I believe that ECA, in turn, by working in the economic field, has helped the State Department move toward one of its major goals: to encourage the peoples of Western Europe to work together more closely than ever before and to perceive more closely the common character of their problems, their opportunities, and their perils. I submit that recent progress in this direction has been due in part to ECA's drive to foster economic integration.

When I made my first visit to Europe as ECA Administrator, back in July 1948, I saw that Western Europe's economy then was like a crazy quilt whose varicolored squares had been cut out but not sewn together. Each nation was striving to be self-sufficient. With this as a goal no single country, nor all 16 of them individually, could possibly make substantial use of the continent's resources. For 50 years, indeed, Western Europe had been moving in the direction of economic nationalism. Countries competed with each other in intensifying trade restrictions, in raising tariffs and in imposing import quotas and exchange controls to protect home industries which were uneconomic and old-fashioned. These impediments to trade naturally made matters worse. They hindered Europe from taking advantage of modern techniques of large-scale, low-cost production which, during those same 50 years, largely accounted for the higher productivity of United States industry and the higher living standards of the American people. The reason is very simple. Large-scale, low-cost production is possible only in a sizable, unified, and unrestricted market area where goods can move freely from factory to consumer.

The harm done by trade barriers among the European nations is best illustrated by comparative production figures between Europe and the United States. In 1900 the per capita output of the European worker and the American worker was virtually the same. Both lived on about the same scale. Yet in 1950 the United States, with a population of 151,000,000, turned out a gross national product of $270,000,000,000 in contrast to the Marshall-plan countries which, with 274,000,000 people, turned out a gross national product of only $170,000,000,000.

The Narcotic Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Lynn H. Fairfax, publicity director of Lodge No. 981 of the American Federation of Government Employees, which is, in effect, an experienced dissertation concerning the growth of narcotic addiction in the United States, and recommended congressional action:

The much publicized narcotic situation confronts us at a time when our country is bedeviled with pressing economic and national defense problems. From within, it poses too serious a threat to our teenagers and youth to permit any delayed action because of other problems.

If not checked immediately it also threatens an outburst of crime that will necessitate expanded municipal and State police forces in many sections of our country. New hospital facilities will have to be provided for prolonged treatment of the addicts and the safety of our streets will be endangered. Contrary to the belief held by many persons, there will be no individual isolation from the effects of this situation.

Much confusion exists relative to this problem. A calm study of the facts surrounding the problem will reveal the fact that the Congress and the President of the United States can take the most effective action to suppress it.

Past and present narcotic rings may have engineered this situation by the operation of recruiting services, seeking to expand this vile business through the recruitment of new users. It is significant that our country, with its greater individual monetary wealth, is the only country confronted with this problem.

All narcotics originate outside our boundaries. The very abundant supply in the possession of the countless thousands of individual peddlers throughout our land clearly indicates the necessity of closing more tightly the doors of entry of the illegal traffic from planes, ships, and across our borders.

It must be clear that it is more effective to deprive the individual peddler of his wares than it is to ferret out and arrest him. The Congress can do this.

Any person who brings merchandise or narcotics into the country illegally is a smuggler. The detection of, apprehension, and arrest of smugglers is a function of the Bureau of Customs, which operates the Port Patrol Division and did operate border patrols for many years. Very little publicity has been given this work or the conditions that adversely affect this work.

THE FACTS OF THE PORT PATROL DIVISION

The Port Patrol Division operates cooperatively with but not under the direction of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics. It is an armed police force of approximately 1,000 men, carefully selected and screened through oral and written examination, and strategically stationed on docks, at air fields, and in some ports, in radio-equipped mobile cars. It searches vessels and enforces the many laws and regulations of the United States Government.

The individual officer bears the title of customs port patrol officer and is neither an agent nor an inspector.

During more than 40 years on our waterfront areas this Division, known for many years as Customs Guards, has acquired a specialized knowledge of the psychology and craftiness of smugglers, as well as the knowledge of ship construction and operation.

Of particular interest at this time is the narcotic control work performed by this group. Working alone, facing hazards and exposure and rubbing elbows daily with the underworld gangs that hide away on the docks of our larger ports, the individual officer seizes in single operations, at the source of entry into our country, quantities of illegal narcotics sufficient to supply four, five, and six thousand individual peddlers. The customs port patrol officer is the only officer regularly assigned to our docks on a 24-hour basis to apprehend and arrest the narcotic smuggler from the ships, arriving from foreign ports.

It should be noted, however, that other important public service is rendered by this group. High lights are the safeguarding of the public health from diseases which might be brought to us with parrots, monkeys, and other forms of animal life, the protection of agriculture from destructive insects which might accompany various forms of plant life, the protection to our wage earners and to industry through the enforcement of the tariff laws, the apprehension of stowaways who could be subversive subjects, the interception of subversive agents carrying messages to and from other agents employed on ships and the prevention of sabotage to our very important docks in times of war.

The public service it renders entitles it to recognition as one of our major law-enforcement groups, yet its classification under the civil service is lower and not comparable to any other law-enforcement group.

The potential effectiveness of this group is boundless. Every dock used by freighters or passenger ships arriving from foreign countries is a possible door of entry for the illegal narcotic traffic. One thousand men, divided into three working shifts and with personnel reductions due to days off and illnesses does not permit the coverage of all such docks on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts and in the Gulf ports. The conditions under which the Port Patrol Division operates necessitates the removal of officers from docks where freight vessels are berthed to perform duties in the clearance of travelers through customs control, thereby increasing the number of unattended docks.

Your attention is directed to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 2, page 1921. Here is recorded a letter, written to the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK by the Commissioner of Customs at that time concerning a reduction made by the Appropriations Committee to the Customs appropriation for the fiscal year of 1948. Three paragraphs in that letter are very significant and are as follows:

"Reference is made to your telephone request for immediate and detailed information concerning the effect the action of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives in cutting by $3,500,000 the estimates for the appropriation, collecting the revenue from customs 1948, will have on the Customs Service if it stands.

"Careful examination of the possibilities for meeting this situation satisfies me that the only activity that can be discontinued without a substantial revision of statutory law is that directed toward the prevention of smuggling. While this is a clear statutory duty of the Customs Service, there is no statutory prescription as to how it shall be conducted and the effectiveness of our smuggling control has always depended upon the action of the Congress furnishing funds.

"Other functions of the Customs Service create bottlenecks through which all carriers, goods and travelers entering our country must pass. The treatment to be given these carriers, goods, and travelers is prescribed by law and the Customs Service must operate to permit their passage through the customs control, and to keep records and accounts required by law in connection with their movement and the collections of the revenue incident thereto."

The significance of these paragraphs is deepened when considered with a statement made by the Commissioner of Narcotics on April 14, 1947, and recorded in a public document concerning the hearings of the United States Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Excerpts of the question and answer testimony of the Commissioner of Narcotics as recorded on pages 73 and 74 of that document are as follows:

"Senator THYE. The customs officials stand down here at the dock, at the gangplank, watching the people coming in off the ships at the debarkation, and the narcotics agent is down there with the customs official; is he not?

"Mr. ANSLINGER. No, sir.

"Senator THYE. Who determines whether any individual is carrying any narcotics ashore from the ship?

"Mr. ANSLINGER. That is the customs patrol officer, the Customs Service.

"Senator THYE. Then they will apprehend the man if the customs official finds he has opium or any other type of narcotic in his possession, after they have examined his personal belongings in every conceivable manner? Then where do you function in this activity?

"Mr. ANSLINGER. The customs follow that case right to the courts. They tell us about it, and we find out whether the man has any connections. If he has, we work together on it. We work together on joint cases where there is smuggling.

"Senator THYE. You must spend an awful lot of time to figure out whose duty it is to take this case and whose duty it is to take that case.

"Mr. ANSLINGER. No, sir; not a bit. The line is so clear that we never have difficulty along that line.

"Senator THYE. The customs officials down in Norfolk or up in New York or any other port where a passenger vessel docks or a freight vessel docks, and where there is the possibility of an individual carrying narcotics across, do all the supervision?

"Mr. ANSLINGER. That is right."

Gentlemen of the Congress, think upon the facts. They are the same today as they were when the Commissioner of Customs wrote his letter and the Commissioner of Narcotics gave his testimony. The customs port patrol officer is the only obstacle to the unhampered flow of illegal narcotics from our docks. He is the only law-enforcement officer regularly assigned on a 24-hour basis to apprehend and arrest narcotic smugglers on our water-front areas.

The customs service has not had the appropriations or the men to operate their border patrol at all, and for this same reason so many of our docks are unattended as to make United States narcotic control nothing more than a sieve. Because of the statutory situation, customs port patrol officers are removed from docks to perform duties in the clearance of travelers. Can it be believed that the American people desire the apprehension and arrest of narcotic smugglers to be the only activity of the customs service that can be discontinued or curtailed without substantial revision of statutory law?

RECOMMENDED CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

The Congress of the United States should recognize the port patrol division of the United States customs service as the major law-enforcement body that it is and should enact a statutory law that will assure that a customs port patrol officer is on every dock where any possibility of smuggling may exist, said assignments to continue without interruption as long as any cargo in which packages of narcotics may be hidden remains upon the pier. The same statutory law should reestablish the border patrol of the customs service upon a basis that will permit short and frequent patrols.

The customs port patrol officer should be classified under the civil service under the same classification held by other law-enforcement groups.

The Congress should appropriate, as a supplemental appropriation if necessary, sufficient funds to finance this.

Stiffer penalties should be enacted for those persons convicted of attempting to smuggle narcotics.

The cost of the recommended action will be returned to the Government, at least in part, through the collection of fines and will be relatively small as compared to the costs of expanded municipal police forces and the provision of hospitals and hospital care for addicts.

Many civic and parent organizations are alarmed by the increase of drug addiction among teen-age school children. The Queensboro Federation of Mothers Clubs of Queens County, N. Y., with a membership of 60,000 parents, has conducted an exhaustive investigation of the narcotic problem during the past 2 years. On January 20, 1951, the delegate assembly of this organization, meeting in the Hotel Statler in New York City, unanimously passed a resolution urging municipal and Federal officials to increase their respective staffs of law-enforcement officers to prevent the growth of narcotic addiction in our schools. This organization endorses the congressional action recommended in this thesis.

The New York City Federation of Womens Clubs, with a membership of 200,000, equally interested in the welfare of our youth and teen-age school children, has accepted the proposition submitted to their organization by the Queensboro Federation of Mothers Clubs urging the enactment of Federal legislation to assure the reestablishment of the United States Border Patrol of the United States Customs Service and for the assignment of port patrol officers at all airfields used by planes arriving from foreign lands; also for the uninterrupted assignment of such officers at all piers and docks where any ship arriving from any foreign port is berthed, and for the other recommendations contained in this thesis.

Reason Succeeds to Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been gratified by the change in tone of my mail since the joint meeting of the Congress to hear Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

In common with other Members, I received, in the 10-day period immediately following the general's relief from his commands in the Far East, a great deal of rather hysterical mail, terrifying in its implication that so many people in the United States could desire, emotionally, a military dictatorship and could almost deify a distinguished soldier who has not set foot in the United States in 14 years.

It would appear that I was more fortunate than other Members in receiving, at the same time, a considerable volume of very reasonable mail offering support to the position of the President, and that mail is continuing.

It is noteworthy that, almost without exception, the communications I received which indicated support of President Truman did not in any way deprecate General MacArthur's very real gifts and accomplishments; they were addressed rather to the crucial question of constitutional responsibilities and authority. Among these were a number of messages from substantial, recognized groups; under leave, I am inserting a number of these in the RECORD, as follows, together with three individual letters typical of scores of others:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 19, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

New York Engineers, CIO, wishes you to know, that in regular meeting assembled April 18, 1951, a motion was passed without a dissenting voice completely supporting President Truman in his removal of General MacArthur for insubordination. Our organization wishes you to understand that we are opposed to any attempt by military forces to supersede civilian authority of the President and the peoples' representatives in Congress. We have great respect for General MacArthur's record but we feel the President must of necessity take the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in military matters rather than the advice of one individual general. We hope you will do nothing that may lead eventually to making our civilian government subordinate to the military as has happened in so many other countries.

EARL KING,
Business Manager, MEBA, No. 33.

NEW YORK STATE CIO COUNCIL,
New York, N. Y., April 19, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are forwarding to you the enclosed copy of a statement adopted by this organization's executive board in meeting at the Hotel Statler, New York, April 18, 1951.

Copies of this expression of support for President Truman's action in the case of General MacArthur are also being sent to the President and to the Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS HOLLANDER,
President.
HAROLD J. GARNO,
Secretary-Treasurer.

NEW YORK STATE CIO COUNCIL,
April 18, 1951.

STATEMENT ON PRESIDENT'S ACTION RE MACARTHUR

The executive board of the New York State CIO Council fully endorses President Truman's action in removing General MacArthur from his commands.

In reaffirming civilian control over the military, the President has strengthened a vital democratic principle. In making clear the determination of our country to use its fighting strength most effectively to advance the cause of peace and freedom, he has strengthened our leadership in the world.

The President's action was in the best interests of the Nation and its purposes in this time of world crisis. The artificial storms which are being whipped up by reactionary newspapers and politicians for selfish and unpatriotic purposes cannot obscure that fact.

We are certain that the overwhelming majority of the American people join with us in approval of the President's stand.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 20, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Our organization consisting of over 20,000 members in the metropolitan area of New York City are squarely behind President Truman in connection with his removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. His action again reaffirms the basic American tradition that this country is governed and controlled by civilians and not by military. We are in full support of President Truman's position against aggression and for the prevention of World War III.

LAUNDRY WORKERS JOINT BOARD OF GREATER NEW YORK, ACWA, LOUIS SIMON, Manager.

AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION,
New York, N. Y., April 18, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: You will find attached a statement of the New York City chapter of Americans for Democratic Action dealing with General MacArthur's removal by President Truman.

Inasmuch as this whole situation has become a problem of great debate and public concern, we should appreciate very much having your views on this matter for presentation to both our board of directors and our membership.

Sincerely,

EVELYN DUBROW,
Executive Director.

STATEMENT ON GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR, ADOPTED BY THE NEW YORK CITY CHAPTER OF AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION, TUESDAY, APRIL 17, 1951

The New York City Chapter of Americans for Democratic Action joins with other New Yorkers in extending a warm welcome home to General MacArthur, after his absence of 14 years. There are none who will deny his brilliant service to his country during World War II and his right to acclaim for it by the American people.

However, the traditional welcome to this celebrated military figure should not be confused with the partisan ends of cynical politicians seeking to make capital of the general's position. In the present acclaim of General MacArthur for his past achievements, it must not be forgotten that the implications of his publicly stated views are a serious threat to his own country. The points that should be borne in mind are:

1. The basis of our democracy is in the constitutional authority given civilian over military authority. A number of other nations have become military dictatorships because of the abrogation of this principle.

2. This country's foreign policy is based on the assumption that Europe is the crucial continent in our cold war with Russia. If Russia takes over the industrial centers of Europe with their potential production, her additional strength would far outweigh that of the United States. General MacArthur, with his publicly-stated opinion (political, not military) that Asia is more important, has flouted the policy of the United States. He has offended our Atlantic Pact allies by saying that "here (in Asia) we fight Europe's war with arms while the diplomats there still fight it with words." This implies that he believes that issues should be settled through war rather than through negotiations which is contrary to the stated objectives of the United Nations.

3. General MacArthur has disobeyed not only his Commander in Chief, President Truman, but also the Joint Chiefs of Staff, their Chairman, General Bradley, and Secretary of Defense Marshall. Would General MacArthur himself have tolerated such insubordination?

4. Disservice is being doné this country both here and abroad by creating doubt as to what our foreign policy really is and as to how consistent we are in sustaining it. The President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are in a far better position to evaluate world issues and world strategy, and they are united in their opposition to General MacArthur's proposals.

The fate of free government continuously hangs upon the maintenance of basic principles: ADA believes that President Truman has built for America a significant milepost in our history by upholding our principles during this crisis.

Because of these facts, and because ADA agrees with President Truman that we are trying to prevent a world war, not start one, and the cause of world peace is more important than any individual, the New York City ADA commends President Truman for removing General MacArthur from office, doing his duty as prescribed in the Constitution and demonstrating to our allies and to the United Nations that they can rely on our good faith in the defense of the free world.

THE NEW YORK YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUB, INC.,
New York, N. Y., April 18, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KLEIN: At its last meeting on April 12, 1951, the board of directors of the New York Young Democratic Club passed the following resolution in approval of your recall of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur:

"Resolved, That—

"We congratulate you on your courageous reaffirmation of the constitutional principles of our democracy;

"You have carried out your clear-cut obligations as President in exercising civilian control over the military."

I take great pleasure in transmitting this resolution to you and in assuring you of our continued support on this matter.

Most respectfully yours,

RICHARD S. LANE,
Corresponding Secretary.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 12, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This letter is to record my strong approval of the action of President Truman in removing from his post a general officer who has left no doubt of his refusal to respect established lines of command or to accept our basic democratic principle subordinating the military to the civilian authority of the United States.

As an attorney, as a veteran of over 3 years of Army service, and as a citizen concerned with the maintenance of our democratic government and republican traditions, I have thought carefully about the issues reportedly involved in this matter. My considered opinion is that President Truman has acted with courage and high purpose to attain and maintain a concept of government that is of greater moment to our Nation than any political or strategic concepts regarding our policy in Korea, Asia, or perhaps anywhere else in the world.

Consequently, I urge that you give to our President the strongest possible support that your office, personal prestige, and superior abilities can muster.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR G. KAPLAN,
Counselor at Law.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 12, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KLEIN: I have just written President Truman and Senators Lehman and Ives stating my wholehearted support of Mr. Truman's actions in the MacArthur case. I want to put myself on the record to you, my Representative.

This is the first time I have ever been moved to write a President, Senator, or Representative, but I feel strongly that this MacArthur dismissal has had a profound effect on the American public and that your mail may not be an accurate barometer of public opinion.

You must be aware that in these cases the antis always write. You must further be aware that the supporters of General MacArthur, many of them of extreme right-wing persuasion, are much more likely to write than those who back the President.

Mr. Truman's strategy of confining the war to Korea, as Messrs. Lippmann and Reston have pointed out, is the only sane policy. The alternative is a disastrous, full-scale Pacific war.

I hope you will do your part to see, as General Eisenhower hopefully put it, that MacArthur will not be permitted to become a controversial figure. I do not see why a dismissed general should enjoy an audience before a joint session of Congress. The need today is for national unity and those who are rushing to the general's support are doing so in the hot flush of partisan politics.

Very truly yours,

BURTON R. BENJAMIN.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 18, 1951.

Hon. ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Regarding the MacArthur incident, it is my personal opinion that the President has acted wisely and with great courage.

We must never let the military authority take precedence in any way over our civil authority. I believe that General MacArthur has increased the area of tension for a third world war and, for that reason, I consider him ill-fit to represent the nations of the world as their commander.

As my Representative in Washington, I trust that you will express this opinion, if the need arises.

Sincerely yours,

NORMAN R. ANDERSON.

Truman Will Go Down in History as the President Who Refused To Surrender the People's Trust to the Military

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, the removal of General MacArthur by the President was a matter of military discipline. No military man is bigger than the Department of Defense—most important, no military man is bigger than his country.

General MacArthur has served his Nation well. He deserves the great tribute a grateful Nation has been paying to him since his return to this country for the first time in 14 years, during which time he has been giving unselfishly of his time and efforts in the fulfillment of his duties.

But even General MacArthur with his great prestige cannot place himself above the Constitution of the United States. We have a civilian government. Civilians direct our foreign and domestic policy. President Truman's courageous action in removing such a popular military hero was a step toward continuing that great tradition of civilian control in America.

I feel, as does the writer of the following editorial which recently appeared in the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times of Thursday, April 12, 1951, that General MacArthur will go down as one of the greatest of all soldiers, not only in American history, but in world history, and that Harry Truman will go down in history as the President who refused to surrender the people's trust to the military. The editorial:

PRESERVATION OF CIVIL AUTHORITY

Last night President Harry Truman wisely used radio and television to explain to the American people just why he took the drastic step of removing General MacArthur from all of his four commands. The President put the matter on a plane above that of personalities, both General MacArthur's and his own. The core of his explanation was, "We do not want to see the conflict in Korea extended. We are trying to prevent a world war—not to start one." To bomb Manchuria and China and to assist Chinese Nationalist troops to land on the mainland of China would be "running a very grave risk of starting a general war. If that were to happen, we would have brought about the exact situation we are trying to prevent."

It is precisely this risk that General MacArthur wants the United States to take. To change foreign policy and broad military strategy the general made various utterances in direct violation of orders for him to clear his statements with Washington. After the latest warning given him in Tokyo on Monday by Secretary of the Army Frank Pace, Jr., MacArthur made it clear that he intended to continue leading public pressure and virtually dared his President and Commander in Chief to remove him.

Harry Truman took the dare. Acting as President and Commander in Chief, acting in behalf of the whole constitutional principle of the supremacy of the civil authority over the military, he removed General MacArthur from all his commands, as Supreme Commander, Allied Powers; Commander in Chief; United Nations Command; Command; Commander in Chief, Far East; and Commanding General, United States Army, Far East.

Douglas MacArthur gave Harry Truman no other choice—except to remove him or to admit to the American people that not their elected civil leader but an appointed military leader was calling the tune.

General MacArthur was pressing for an extension of the war theater to include continental China. This would be the end of all hopes for a negotiated settlement. It would be a major gamble that the Soviet Union would not honor its treaty commitment to aid China in case of attack. If this major gamble was won, there would still be the minor but enormous gamble that Red China could be defeated by airpower, seapower and the landpower of the Nationalist government which were defeated on the mainland 18 months ago. If this major gamble were lost, then world war III would be underway in the area where the United States is least prepared to fight it—in the morasses of Asia, with its vast spaces and limitless manpower. Under all circumstances General MacArthur's policy would put Asia above Europe. It would put the United States in a war where many of the non-Communist nations would regard us as the aggressor. It would divide the United States sharply from its main allies, Great Britain, France, and Canada.

Harry Truman is being bitterly criticized on the grounds of both his policy and his action. But no one can accuse him of not having been patient with MacArthur.

A member of General MacArthur's staff is quoted as saying concerning Harry Truman, "He will lose the next election—and then some." That may be so. That is unimportant. The Presidency of the United States is an office that endures beyond the terms of the particular men who occupy it. The military authority of the United States is a power that endures beyond the men who wield it, even though they be as brilliant and strong as Douglas MacArthur. What is important is that the military remain an arm of the civil authority over which the people have control.

Harry Truman will go down in history as a President who made many mistakes. But at least he will not go down in history as the President who surrendered the people's trust to the military.

In spite of the tragic ending to his magnificent career, Gen. Douglas MacArthur will go down as one of the greatest of all soldiers, not only in American history, but in world history.

The American people are fortunate that to take General MacArthur's commands they have a replacement of the large stature and proven ability of Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway. The important thing now is to get on with the job—the job of winning or settling the war in Korea; the job of arming to prevent world war III or to win it if it is forced upon us, the job of constructing that stable and peaceful world for which humanity yearns.

General MacArthur has been invited by Republican leaders to address a joint session of Congress, and he has accepted the invitation. Gen. Dwight Eisenhower in Europe expressed the hope that MacArthur will not return to the United States and become a controversial figure. This was perhaps too much for which to hope. General MacArthur is eager to be heard and many people are eager to hear him. But it is not too much to hope that despite the debate the American people will close ranks and face up to the challenge of the times.

MacArthur's War Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following article which appeared in the New Republic of April 23, 1951, speaks for itself. I commend it to my colleagues' attention:

MACARTHUR'S WAR PARTY

The uproar that has followed the removal of General MacArthur shows how necessary that removal was. The general had made himself the head of a political clique, mainly but not wholly inside the Republican Party. Only now does the public get a chance to realize how deep was his divisive effort, or how far it had gone.

MacArthur was not a mere soldier taking orders, as he has tried to picture himself. He was the head of an open conspiracy against the policy of the Government he was sworn to serve. Long before his dismissal by the President, his attitude and that of his supporters had done much to deepen the split in the American Government, to confuse and weaken our relations with the United Nations, and thereby to hamper the war effort in Korea.

The forceful action of President Truman has stripped the general of the power to interfere directly in the policies of his country any longer. MacArthur must now carry on his political activity in the open without benefit of the military disguise. The common sense of the American people will doubtless reject the undemocratic philosophy of militarism for which he stands when it is nakedly presented to them. However, the clique of which MacArthur is the mouthpiece will not be easily daunted. They are dangerous men, bound together by an evil design which they will be slow to relinquish. It is an incongruous crew made up partly of those who advocate an immediate world war in order to prevent one, and in part of isolationists at heart who support MacArthur on the theory that if he were given his way we could in a few months retire behind our own shores and pull them up over us. His domestic support is the Tory wing of journalism and of politics—the people who scream "Communist" at everyone who disagrees with them, the enemies of Roosevelt who are still fighting his spirit 6 years after he went to his grave.

Typical of the lost battalion who have found in the general their leader is James H. Rand who has announced that MacArthur will become an official of his Remington-Rand Corp. The ultra-conservative, ultra-isolationist Rand has admitted long-continued support, including gifts of at least $5,200 to Merwin K. Hart's notorious National Economic Council, long known for its inveterate love of dictators and for its doctrines of "white, Nordic supremacy" here at home. Rand's company became famous in the 1930's for perfecting the Mohawk Valley plan for strikebreaking, widely adopted by antilabor employers. In his new job MacArthur will be associated with another ex-soldier, former Gen. Leslie R. Groves, now a vice president of Remington-Rand, who was also fired by Truman for attempting to put military authority above civilian control in development of atomic energy.

As his political manager, MacArthur will doubtless retain the services of Gen. Courtney Whitney, his aide in Tokyo, a lawyer who has always been a political rather than a military adviser. The cluster of international big-business men who frequent the Waldorf Towers and have followed the unglamorous star of Herbert Hoover in the past will be a ready-made court for the deposed general, as well as eager financiers of any political projects MacArthur may desire to launch.

There will be rich and unscrupulous men for MacArthur to command in his new role. It is important, therefore, to examine what would happen if the General actually got his way.

On purely military grounds, the MacArthur policy for immediate war against China would likely be disastrous.

MacArthur appears to believe that if we engage in total war with China, Russia would not come in. Russia and China have a mutual defense pact pledging each of them to go to war if the other is attacked by any third power. It is true that Russia has broken many pledges in recent years, but it is inconceivable that she could break this one except at a cost in prestige and power she could not afford to pay.

MacArthur believes we could win a quick victory over China; Japan made the same mistake in 1937. It is straining our military resources today to hold our own in the Korean Peninsula, with masses of South Korean troops engaged and with a dozen other UN nations giving support.

MacArthur believes that Chiang's army on Formosa could successfully invade the mainland without the use of American troops. This army of a few hundred thousand men is practically without equipment of the type needed for an invasion. Remember the long years it took the United States to prepare for the Normandy invasion, even with England as a base, and with supply lines thousands of miles shorter; multiply the difficulties of the Normandy landing by 10 and you may be somewhere near the problem a Nationalist invasion presents.

The MacArthur who makes these recommendations is certainly the one who let the entire air force in the Philippines be destroyed on the ground just after Pearl Harbor, the man who divided the army in Korea last November and let it be trapped in one of the worst military reverses in our history.

In the First and Second World Wars the United States had powerful allies who spilled their blood for us while we were making up our minds that it was our war, too. In the struggle in Korea we were able to persuade the United Nations to join us in putting down aggression; but there would be no such action if we now went to war with Communist China on MacArthur's terms. We would lose our most important ally, Great Britain. We would lose the support of the UN, and that body would be destroyed.

To repeat in words of one syllable what everyone knows except MacArthur and his followers:

The democratic world, and most of all the United States, is not yet strong enough in a military sense to fight the Communist bloc on one front, to say nothing of two. We will not be prepared to withstand attack for several years longer. The one overwhelming objective in the meantime is to try to prevent Russia from attacking in Europe, which, with its tremendous industrial installations, is the one great prize in the world struggle. If we can hold Europe, we have a good prospect of holding the world; if we lose, victory is against us.

It may be that Russia will strike before we are ready, no matter what we do or don't do. But if MacArthur's advice were followed if we plunged into the quagmire of China, Stalin would almost certainly strike in Europe, and the United States would be helpless to give the democracies of the west the aid they need and have been promised.

MacArthur's abortive "peace offer" to the Chinese Communists stopped a carefully thought-out proposal of the same character that the United Nations (with the general's knowledge) was about to make. Now that he is out of the way, efforts to end the war on an honorable basis can be pursued. The aggression against South Korea which prompted the UN to take up arms has been successfully checkmated; the invaders have been driven back across the line from which the attack was launched. The war is costing the North Koreans and the Chinese Communists a terrible price. This is the moment for a fresh, determined effort to end the war on terms which will discourage future aggression and strengthen the arm of the UN.

The antagonisms that now divide the world cannot be wiped out in short order. But the desire of peoples all over the world for peace has seldom in history been so great. Patience and steadfastness of purpose are what is called for. These qualities are among the hardest for democracies to develop, but they are nonetheless the essential ones for us to cultivate today. We must perfect the defenses of the free world, always with the objective of a future in which large armament will have no place. The presence of MacArthur in the explosive Far East was a constant danger. His removal permits the resumption of a resolute course toward peace.

Pius XII and World Federation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article written by Rev. Edward A. Conway, S. J., which appeared in the April 28 issue of America, national Catholic weekly, entitled "Pius XII and World Federation":

PIUS XII AND WORLD FEDERATION

(By Edward A. Conway, S. J.)

("If winter comes, my Federalist friends exclaim, can spring be far behind?" Thus wrote Father Conway some 2 years ago in an America article on the world federalist movement. For American Catholics who believe in world federation it has been a bleak 2-years' winter since then. But the Holy Father's recent address to delegates of the World Federalist Congress at Rome gives promise of better days.)

The more I study the April 6 discourse of the Holy Father, in which he gave his approbation to the World Federalist movement, the warmer grows my sense of satisfaction. As I write, I have before me the text of his address in French and two unofficial English translations, neither of which can be considered definitive. I hope that we shall soon have an authorized English version, because the discourse, being the first formal papal pronouncement on world government, has profound significance for all students of world affairs. Scholars will be analyzing and interpreting it for months to come. They should have the authentic thought of the Holy Father to work on.

The original text richly repays detailed study. At the very first reading it was obvious to me that here was more than just another extempore greeting to a group of pilgrims. I thought, as I read, that the Holy Father must have worked over that address as carefully as he did over any of his famed Christmas allocutions. I have since been told that his holiness confided to one of his auditors afterward that he had stayed up late the night before to complete the text of his discourse, and that previously he had spent many hours in consultation about it. It seems obvious that the Holy Father had determined to make a major policy pronouncement, and just as obvious that he had determined to use the World Federalist Congress as the occasion for it.

Some of the satisfaction that warms me comes, I confess, from personal considerations. I have been hard pressed at times to defend my presence (with a Catholic bishop) on the national advisory board of United World Federalists, Inc. UWF is the largest membership group among the 70 constituent organizations in 27 countries which make up the world movement for world federal government. The unfortunate and, for me, embarrassing fact is that many American Catholics have been turned against world federalism, and specifically against United World Federalists, by the absurd charge that the entire federalist movement is a Communist conspiracy. Almost daily during the past 3 years I have received letters from Catholics—some inquiring, some indignant—about my part in the federalist movement. It would have been much easier for me to answer them if the Holy Father had ever made a clear-cut and quotable statement dealing directly with world federal government. Unfortunately for me and other Catholic federalists, up to April 6, 1951, he had not.

It was always possible, of course, to prove that a Catholic could be a Catholic and a federalist. But it was necessary to string together texts from the Pope's Christmas allocutions—a hint here and a hint there—sufficient, however, to prove to the unprejudiced that "the new world order" desired by the Pope was actually some form of world federal government. But it was an unsatisfactory business at best, complicated and prohibitively time consuming.

I tried another tack some time ago (America, December 4, 1948, Catholics and World Federation) by arguing not from textual but from circumstantial evidence. On November 11, 1948, the Holy Father had addressed 300 members of the European Union of Federalists at Castel Gandolfo. EUF is a federation of European federalist groups and is closely aligned with the world movement for world federal government. The Holy Father told the European federalists that it was high time to establish a European union. "Some," he added, "are even asking themselves whether it is not already too late."

My World Federalist friends, I reported, were much encouraged by the Holy Father's partial support:

"Even though the Holy Father, they reason, said nothing explicitly about world federation, his warm approval of European federation will surely give immense impetus to their movement and hasten thereby the larger development they desire."

I added—naively, I know now—that I was inclined to agree with my World Federalist friends. My article ended with the observation:

"American Catholics could make a distinctively Catholic and definitely valuable contribution to the World Federalist movement. It remains to be seen whether the Pope's Armistice Day address will inspire them to do so. At the very least we may expect the more perceptive among them to begin taking an interest in federalism, since it so obviously interests the Pope."

Earlier in the article I had warned the Federalists that "Catholics are curiously and often callously indifferent to noninfallible papal pronouncements." But I was totally unprepared for and correspondingly appalled by what followed. Most of the more perceptive Catholics remained indifferent to federalism, while the less perceptive began to take what I must call a violent interest in the destruction of the whole movement.

Catholic newspapers reprinted the misrepresentations of Merwin K. Hart's rabidly nationalistic economic council letter, and quoted approvingly from Joseph P. Kamp's We Must Abolish the United States, which asserts that the aims and objectives of the American Federalists add up to treason. Indeed treasonous, traitorous, and unpatriotic were among the milder epithets hurled at Catholic Federalists by fellow Catholics. For a time we dismissed these denunciations as being merely what Pius XII called in 1948 "the aberrations of an intransigent nationalism which denies or spurns the common bonds linking the nations together."

It was not long, however, before similar attacks came from more responsible Catholic quarters, based only too obviously on the same poisonous sources. Moreover, authorized representatives of respectable Catholic organizations began to appear before State legislatures demanding the repeal of long-standing world-government resolutions. Thanks to this Catholic intervention, some legislatures either repealed or modified them.

United World Federalists, chief beneficiary of this "Catholic interest in federalism," and much disturbed by it, asked its most prominent Catholic member to do something about it. He is Thomas H. Mahony, Boston attorney, former president of the Catholic Association for International Peace, now chairman of the Catholic Commission on Intellectual and Cultural Affairs, and for 3 years chairman of the UWF policy committee. Mr. Mahony tried to lift the level of the debate by compiling Parallel Thinking, Catholic and Federalist, Upon the Organization of the World for Peace. Under five headings: Disarmament; Security and Preparedness; National Sovereignty and its Limitation; Amendments of the United Nations Charter; A Federated World, he compared Catholic statements from St. Augustine to Pius XII with corresponding UWF proposals. Eschewing all argument, Mr. Mahony simply asked his readers to "draw their own reasonable inferences from the comparison." The similarities were sensational.

The booklet was published last September (15 cents, Thomas H. Mahony, 10 State Street, Boston 9, Mass.). But it seems to have made little impression in some Catholic communities—Baltimore, for example. Catholic anti-Federalism reached its apogee there with the appearance of the Baltimore edition of the Catholic Review of February 16, 1951. Under a screaming headline: "Catholics backing anti-Federalist move," the diocesan weekly revealed—it must have had its own revelation—that "almost every Catholic in this archdiocese is expressing support of a resolution * * * up before the Maryland House of Delegates which voices strong objections to the idea of world government as proposed by the Federalists." The Maryland Action Guild, the Knights of Columbus and the Catholic War Veterans were "solidly lined up" with the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Daughters of the American Revolution, Children of the American Revolution, the Minute Women of Maryland, and the Daughters of 1812. The Federalist resolutions, said the Catholic spokesmen, "collided with Catholic patriotic principles." One Louis Carroll, "speaking for the Maryland Action Guild, said that World Federalists were most surely moving into the footsteps of Lenin and Stalin" (Catholic Review, Feb. 23, 1951, p. 3).

Do you wonder that I as a World Federalist, felt grateful relief and warm satisfaction when I read these words in the Holy Father's April 6 discourse:

"Your movement (the World Movement for a World Federal Government) dedicates itself to realizing an effective political organization of the world. Nothing is more in conformity with the traditional doctrine of the church, or better adapted to her teaching concerning legitimate or illegitimate war, especially in the present circumstances. It is necessary, therefore, to arrive at an organization of this kind, if for no other reason than to put a stop to the armament race."

That solemn approbation should end once and for all the argument as to whether a Catholic can be a Federalist. Whether it inspires Catholics to work actively in the Federalist movement remains, as I remarked once before, "to be seen." For my part, I cannot recall a more forthright papal endorsement of any movement, either Catholic, or, as this happens to be, nonsectarian.

Some Catholics, of course, are already saying that the Pope approved only the general ideal of a far-in-the-future world state, not any concrete program for its proximate realization. None but nationalist die-hards would deny that he was talking on April 6 to a definite group with a definite, even though not detailed, program. The Pope implied clearly enough, it seems to me, that the world political organization must be realized as rapidly as possible "if for no other reason than to put a stop to the armament race"—the current race, not one in the problematical future.

The World Federal Government which W. M. W. F. G. proposes and which the Holy Father has endorsed is a strictly limited one. During its Roman Congress, its fourth, by the way, the movement outlined the powers of that government in its declaration to the foreign ministers of the four great powers, to all the governments of the nations, and to the world's war-weary peoples:

"The time has come when the nations and peoples of the world must create an all-inclusive world federal government which can guarantee to each nation security against attack by others. Such a government must have the power:

"1. To prohibit by law the right of nations to use force or the threat of force in international affairs.

"2. To make laws binding upon individuals and national governments prohibiting the construction or possession of armaments beyond that required for internal police purposes, and to administer an agreed schedule for universal disarmament.

"3. To maintain adequate and effective civilian inspection and police forces to assure that the world law affecting armaments is respected.

"4. To bring to trial in world courts any individuals and groups who conspire to build weapons of war in violation of world law."

Catholics who fear that a world state possessing those powers would swallow up their personal liberties overlook the world federalist proviso that—

"All powers not expressly delegated to the world federal government should be reserved to the nations and their peoples, thus leaving each nation its choice of its own domestic political, economic, social, and religious institutions."

In his Parallel Thinking, Thomas Mahony made it clear that "these proposals do not envisage a superstate in which nations would be merged and lose their identity and domestic autonomy—a unitary state or empire. They contemplate complete autonomy of each nation in its national or domestic field. They merely propose a limitation of the external authority or sovereignty of nations—the right to make war."

"Absolute sovereignty," of course, is the motto emblazoned on the banners of the embattled Catholic opponents of world government. I very much fear that a mistaken notion about sovereignty inspires their charge that world federalism is opposed to Catholic patriotic principles. To put it bluntly, I am afraid that they have never accepted that traditional doctrine of the church with which, according to the Holy Father, the world federalist movement is actually in accord. What is that traditional doctrine? Pius XII forcefully defined it in his Christmas message of 1948:

"The Catholic doctrine on the state and civil society has always been based on the principle that, in keeping with the will of God, the nations form together a community with a common aim and common duties. Even when the proclamation of this principle and its practical consequences gave rise to violent reactions, the church denied her assent to the erroneous concept of an absolutely autonomous sovereignty divested of all social obligations."

Is it too much to hope that the Holy Father's latest interpretation of that principle and its practical consequences—the ceding to a world government of enough national sovereignty to save the world from catastrophic war—will not "give rise to violent reactions"? My modest hope is that it will inspire all American Catholics to study this remarkable document. Every one of its paragraphs is pregnant with meaning. Almost every one of its lines reminds one of more extended treatment of the same topic in other papal pronouncements.

I hope, too, that the Holy Father's discourse will arouse new interest in Guido Gonella's A World to Reconstruct. Cardinal Stritch's Bishops' Committee on the Pope's Peace Plan published it in 1944 through Bruce of Milwaukee. My esteemed associate, Father LaFarge, predicted at the time (America, September 5, 1944) that the book would produce wide enlightenment. Would that it had. Signor Gonella, most authoritative interpreter of the mind of Pius XII on the problem of world order, may still be, in Father LaFarge's phrase, "strong medicine." But I question whether, in view of the Pope's recent pronouncement, he still is "much stronger medicine than most people in this country and most of our politicians are prepared to swallow." Is it too much to ask that a revised version of Gonella be published promptly?

In view of the widespread misapprehension that all World Federalists are Communist conspirators, it is unfortunate that in the story on the Pope's April 6 discourse distributed by the NC News Service his concluding remarks were omitted. I add them here to reassure and inspire all Catholic Federalists:

"Therein [solving the problem of a world political organization] lies a vast field of work, study, and action. You have understood this and looked it squarely in the face. You have the courage to spend yourselves for this cause. We congratulate you. We express to you our wishes for your good success, and with all our heart we pray God to grant you His light and His help in the performance of your task."

May thousands of American Catholics soon merit that benediction. May theirs be the mission of helping the World Federalists to skirt the pitfalls which His Holiness warned against in his cordial endorsement of their movement.

Clarify Our Far East Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following address which I delivered over Station WMEX, Boston, Mass., on Monday, April 23, 1951:

Greetings: The fat is in the fire.

President Truman's recall of General MacArthur has touched off one of the hottest issues of this century. At the moment tempers are running high. One is supposed to be for or against, with the few reasonable souls who stand in the middle exposed to a murderous cross-fire.

Where this chain reaction will lead to nobody knows.

The differing viewpoints dramatized by the firing of General MacArthur will have much to do with the outcome of the Presidential campaign of 1952. Much can happen within the next 18 months, both in the United States and in the much larger area of the world itself, to alter the present circumstances and the opinions we now hold.

It is strange that so many Americans have leaped to positive and emotional judgments, pro and con, without first considering the background facts.

I believe that most Americans approve of our policy in Europe. It is realistic and it can point to certain definite accomplishments. By extending vigorous help to Greece and Turkey, we prevented Communist imperialism from breaking out into the Mediterranean. Through the Marshall plan we helped to rebuild the war-shattered and discouraged nations of Europe, eliminating the despair on which communism thrives. By the Atlantic Pact we are starting to build up the collective military strength to resist aggression. This is a hard job and one that will take time. To manage it we have assigned one of our best men, General Eisenhower.

Other nations will have to pitch in and help because we do not possess the power to be equally strong in Europe and in Asia. A choice had to be made, and priority was given to Europe. The industrial plant and resources of Europe, much greater than those of the Far East, must not fall into the hands of Communist Russia. Stalin is deterred only by our head start in the development of atomic weapons and by our industrial might. If he could seize Europe and add its production to that of his empire, our advantage would be canceled and he would then feel confident to attack us. The President and the State Department, Generals Marshall, Eisenhower, and Bradley, and many Republican Senators and Representatives from the Northeast recognize that Europe is the key to our survival and insist that we concentrate our efforts there.

We cannot, however, neglect Asia.

The main strength of our Navy, under Republican and Democratic administrations, has been stationed in the Pacific, and in that fact we have a clue to the importance of that region in our security planning. Pearl Harbor, in Hawaii, which is 2,000 miles west of San Francisco, was the first target of the Japanese attack. They understood its strategic value.

The Truman-MacArthur controversy can be dangerous if it is used for partisan advantage. On the other hand, it can be a wholesome challenge if it succeeds in bringing all the facts out into the open so that the American people can decide what our security requirements in the far Pacific should be, and then support that plan with unity. We do not believe in secret diplomacy that considers itself so superior that it does not take the American people into its confidence. We may be wrong in our suspicions, and we hope that we are. But there is a growing doubt in the American mind. Merely the possibility of appeasement in Asia fills us with dread. We cannot charge off our 60,000 casualties in Korea to sporting losses in the game of international chess. We do not relish diplomacy which becomes so involved in scheming that it ties itself up in knots at our expense. We went into Korea for a principle, and that was to defeat bare-faced aggression and to discourage future aggression. We carried the ball for the UN in order to establish that principle firmly, once and for all. Every small nation in the world thanked God for our courageous and unselfish leadership. Then Red China, stupidly playing Red Russia's game, renewed the aggression. Our allies began to hedge on us. Now we fear appeasement of principle so concealed with honeyed words that the American people will be duped into believing that surrender is victory.

What is American policy in the Far East?

Ask that question of the next 10 people you meet, and you will get 10 different answers.

A year from now as we start down the stretch toward a presidential election we hope that public opinion will have decided the best course for our country and that foreign policy will be governed by it, even before the test of the election itself. We cannot wait until November 1952, allowing those who threaten us to profit from our delay.

But first, what is going on in Asia that seems to be so far away?

I think we stand in need of the facts, and it is my purpose to bring some of them to you in broad outline, and as fairly as I can.

Across the wide Pacific ocean are the three most populous nations in the world: Russia, China, and India. In the last two countries, which are far behind in technical progress and where there is insufficient food for all, great political changes have taken place since the end of World War II. For many generations most of Asia in the Pacific had been subject to Western European imperialism. They were used as sources for raw materials, and their people were treated as second-class members of the human race. But the people of Asia are waking up and are growing up. The United States has given independence to the Philippines. Once-powerful Japan, reduced in size, is being reeducated to democratic ways under the American occupation which will end in the near future. India is now a sovereign nation, completely free from British control. The peoples of Indonesia have won freedom from the Dutch. Nationalist ferment is strong in French Indochina and in British Malaya. Burma, Pakistan, and Korea are new nation names on the map.

But, as western imperialism moves out, Russian imperialism moves in. Seizing opportunities created by the recent war, and the dislocations which followed, the U. S. S. R. is tying into its system such border areas as Korea, Manchuria, and Mongolia. Communist movements, directed from Moscow, have been set up in all Asiatic countries. Their job is to make trouble and to prevent the new governments from functioning properly. They cloak their true motives by posing as champions of popular demands for national independence, and for the redress of economic and social grievances. It matters nothing to them that their own native leaders are trying to eliminate poverty and ignorance. In the confusion that follows sudden freedom, the Commies sound off like patriots only to get into positions of power so that they can betray their own countries into Communist slavery.

The security of the United States depends on countering this move by encouraging peaceful and democratic growth, and by helping these new and struggling nations to raise the standard of living for their people.

We have already given several billion dollars in aid to establish a sound foundation for democratic progress in Japan, the Philippines, and in Southern Korea. We have maintained large occupation forces in Japan to discourage attack on that unarmed country. Japan is a progressive nation. It is densely populated and must have markets for trade in order to support its people. But if democracy catches on, it could be a strong ally against Soviet expansion. In Korea and the Philippines, the situation is different. The people have not had the technical and administrative training and experience to handle their own affairs. Inefficiency and corruption make for weakness which the Communists will exploit for the advantage of Russia. The Philippines are sure to receive further help from us. Furthermore, there is a strong bond of friendship between our two peoples, based on mutual help and fair dealing, that promises well for the future.

Next to Japan, China and India are the two most important countries in Asia, and how they go will determine whether Asia cooperates with us or turns against us.

The stark fact in regard to India is the grinding poverty of her teeming millions. Its government is struggling desperately to cope with this elemental and terrifying problem. It has stated that it will take no sides in the cold war. The leaders privately profess opposition to communism, but in the United Nations they are willing to make every concession to appease Red China. By grants of food and technical aid under the point 4 program, we may be able to strengthen India and inspire it to resist aggression, but right now India cannot be depended upon. And understandably. A hungry man needs more than a pep talk.

China is the nub of the situation.

The establishment of the Communist government as the de facto power in China on October 1, 1949, was not the end but the beginning of the Chinese Communist revolution. Although they defeated Chiang in the struggle, they are now rulers of a country that requires a tremendous reorganization. The Communists rose to power as the Nationalists declined. Russian influence is growing. The Chinese would never have invaded Korea in defiance of the United Nations unless directed to do so by Russia. Maybe Chiang was right in saying that we did not give him enough support to halt the Reds, but that question is now largely academic. In the minds of most Asiatics, Chiang is associated with the past, and they have no intention of going backward. For us to back discredited regimes, would play into the hands of Russian propaganda and alienate whatever good will we retain among the Chinese people. There is no other forward-looking group in sight that we can support, but there are several thinly possible developments that would be favorable to the United States. We could hope for the growth of moderating influences within the Chinese Communist Party, or for the breakaway from control by the Kremlin that is known as Titoism. But these are largely wait-and-see prospects, in deference to the cautious attitude that lets Russia call the plays. A policy of hands off and doing nothing could be worse than that of taking a positive calculated risk. We must display some initiative and leadership.

After the end of World War II, there were two schools of thought as to what our policy toward China should be. One maintained that the Chiang regime was hopelessly corrupt and incompetent and was bound to collapse of its own weight, and that the Chinese Communists were different from the Russian brand. Reckoning that the Chinese Reds would eventually come out on top, these advisers felt we should hop on the bandwagon by backing them early. The other group argued that Chinese governments are traditionally corrupt, and Chiang's was no worse than any other while it was undeniably pro-American. They went on to predict that the Chinese Communists would turn out to be controlled from Moscow and their policy would finally emerge as anti-American.

The first school prevailed.

And the result?

Americans and Chinese Reds are now locked in mortal combat.

Whether that policy will succeed over the long run, in spite of the present contradiction, is a matter of opinion.

As of the moment our foreign policy in Asia is being opened up to searching criticism.

Perhaps it should be revised.

But first, we must get both sides of the story, including any information we have a right to know but has not been divulged to this moment, so that we may decide the future course that is best for our Nation.

A policy that is reasonable and clear to which we will give our whole-hearted support.

Borough Rabbi's Retirement Just Gateway to New Field

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr MULTER. Mr. Speaker, this week's choice by the Brooklyn Eagle of Brooklyn's man of the week is indeed an excellent one. Rabbi Max Reichler has long been a leader of men. I am glad to be able to set forth the article in full as it appeared in Sunday's edition, April 22, 1951:

BROOKLYN'S MAN OF THE WEEK—BOROUGH RABBI'S RETIREMENT JUST GATEWAY TO NEW FIELD

(By Bert Hochman)

The act of retirement means many things to different people. For most it is a welcome and hard-earned respite capping many years of industrious labor. To others it is a necessary withdrawal from active service due to advancement in years.

But the recent retirement of Rabbi Max Reichler from the pulpit of Beth Sholom-Peoples Temple at Bay Parkway and Benson Avenue has merely ushered in a new period of concentrated activity for the bespectacled clergyman—still a young man at 65 to all outward appearances.

"I've decided to declare a moratorium on all lectures and sermons," exclaimed the ruddy-complexioned gentleman, his blue eyes twinkling. This may have come as a jolt to members of the Bensonhurst congregation last fall, but they warmly responded by naming their spiritual leader for 29 years as rabbi emeritus.

"I've been an active rabbi for 45 years," he explained, "and now I want to devote my time to a little bit of writing I've been planning for many years."

The little bit of writing turns out to be quite an ambitious undertaking for even a youngster of 65. Rabbi Reichler has already started work on a series of five volumes analyzing the influence of the rabbinical period on Christ and the writings of the New Testament. He expects the initial book to be ready by January 1; the rest will take at least several years.

His living quarters at the Hotel St. George resemble a newspaper index department more than the abode of a retired theologian. In his study Rabbi Reichler sits behind a desk littered with assorted memoranda, correspondence, and reference books. Surrounding him on two sides are a set of large filing cabinets, tenanted by an exhaustive index of some 50,000 file cards personally compiled through the years on various religious subjects.

Rabbi Reichler doesn't underestimate the amount of work which will have to be poured into the five-volume undertaking. More than that, he is conscious that the self-appointed task would be a stiff challenge for even a much younger scholar.

"I'd rather try and fail, than fail to try," shrugs the energetic descendant of one of Europe's oldest rabbinical families, whose family line of rabbis goes back to his great-great-grandfather.

That same motto has placed Rabbi Reichler in good stead through many other ambitious challenges of the past.

In 1911 he was asked by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations to organize Sinai Temple in the Bronx. He recalls how he started the congregation with seven members and no assets whatsoever. By the time he left in 1922 to take over the Bensonhurst leadership, Sinai Temple boasted more than 400 members, with more than 800 worshipers at its regular services and a new $200,000 edifice.

Similarly, when he came to Beth Sholom-Peoples Temple in February 1922, the newly amalgamated congregation had a membership of 160. Today there is a membership of over 400, its religious school has a paid staff of 15 workers, and close to 400 youngsters attend classes there.

Many of his innovations at the Bensonhurst temple have become standard order of procedure in reform synagogues throughout the country. Chief among these is the congregation taking part in every part of the service, especially the singing of the traditional Hebrew responses.

"I don't want just an audience, I want a participating congregation," says the man who has become known as the spiritual leader of Brooklyn's singing congregation.

Rabbi Reichler was born on November 27, 1885, in Presburg, then part of Hungary, now Czechoslovakia. His father, the late Rabbi Moses Reichler, came to America to take charge of a temple in Utica, N. Y. The family crossed the seas to join him a few years later in 1895.

Through his high-school days in Utica, a local editor sought to interest the youngster in journalism or teaching. But there was never much doubt in his mind; he was going to prepare himself for the Jewish ministry just like his father and grandfathers before him.

He received his B. A. from the University of Cincinnati in 1905, and a year later was ordained a rabbi by the Hebrew Union College. At 21, he was then one of America's youngest men to enter the rabbinical profession.

After pursuing some postgraduate studies at Chicago University, he ministered local congregations in Helena, Ark., and Schenectady, N. Y., before accepting the Bronx assignment. There he met the former Edith Maisner, a school teacher who applied for the principalship of his religious school. Suffice to say she got the job—and 4 years later the couple was married. Mrs. Reichler died in 1944. Their two children are David, 32, and Mrs. Vida Ruth Bial, 29, a speech instructor at Long Island University.

No newcomer to the fold of authors, Rabbi Reichler has always been a prolific writer. Among his works are: The Jewish Conception of Justice, What Is the Talmud?, and The Last Prayers of Jesus, in addition to many Hebrew textbooks. He speaks German, Hebrew and English fluently, and can read Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Syriac.

During World War I, he was a chaplain at Camp Upton. He is former chaplain of Progress Lodge, F. & A. M., and past president of the Association of Reform Rabbis and the Brooklyn Board of Rabbis. World War II found him as Jewish representative on the Brooklyn Interfaith Committee.

On May 12 the Beth Sholom congregation will honor him at a testimonial dinner in the Hotel Pierre, Manhattan. The event will mark the forty-fifth anniversary of his ordination. Rabbi Reichler admitted he will probably have "a few words of thanks to say"—but definitely no lecture or sermon. They are ruled out for the duration of his "retirement."

Essentials of American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on the date of Saturday, April 14, 1951, it was my privilege to address a foreign policy conference held in the Ryan Hotel, St. Paul, Minn. This conference was sponsored by the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party in the State of Minnesota. Chairman of the conference was Mr. York Langton, president of the Minnesota United Nations Association. This conference was attended by approximately 1,000 persons. Participants included Mr. George Demetriou, professor of political science, University of Minnesota, speaking on the subject You and the Communist Threat; Mr. O. Edmund Clubb, director of the Chinese Section, United States Department of State, on You and the Far East; and Dr. Capper Johnson, professor, International Relations, Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., on the subject You and Western Europe. It was my privilege to give the concluding address of the conference. My subject was Essentials of American Foreign Policy.

I wish to pay tribute to the splendid educational program in the field of foreign relations conducted under the direction of the University of Minnesota International Relations Center. I pay particular tribute to the Minnesota United Nations Association, and the Foreign Policy Associations of Minneapolis and St. Paul. The theme of the foreign policy conference was You and the World.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address I delivered at the foreign policy conference be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ESSENTIALS OF AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY

(By Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

America's foreign policy is not created in a vacuum. It results from the fact that we are a nation among nations and in constant association with one another. In this association we must necessarily have a flexible policy to meet changing times and changing conditions. America's foreign policy can never be a predetermined, airtight program of inflexibility.

There are, however, important aspects of our foreign policy to which we are irrevocably dedicated:

1. The maintenance and guaranteeing of America's independence and freedom.

2. Working for and promoting the independence and freedom of peoples and nations everywhere.

3. A firm commitment to work through and with the United Nations. A policy of strengthening the United Nations in order to achieve a just and enduring peace, based upon sound principles of international law and social justice.

4. A well-planned program of political, economic, health, and cultural assistance to those nations and peoples who have dedicated their fortunes and their lives to the cause of freedom.

5. Promoting trade and friendly economic and political relations amongst the nations of the world.

6. A deep and sincere humanitarian concern and generosity for those who are underprivileged and suffering from the ravages of famine, disease, and poverty.

7. Honorably fulfilling all obligations and commitments entered into by treaties and compacts between ourselves and other nations.

8. The maintenance of our national defense military forces.

These principles are part of the glorious history of our Nation.

Let us never forget that we do not live in this world alone. We are not an island unto ourselves. The admonitions of Scripture which remind us that we are our "brother's keeper" need to be applied to the practical realities of international relations and foreign policy. In carrying out the above principles it has been the aim of our Government, first, to aid in the rehabilitation and relief of those who suffered so dearly from the ravages of World War II. This was exemplified by our generous gifts to UNRRA and the interim aid program in 1946 and 1947 to Western Europe.

Secondly, our Government's foreign policy has been directed toward strengthening those free nations that are resisting communism from within and without. This policy has taken shape in the adoption of the Marshall plan of economic aid; the North Atlantic Pact, a compact of the free nations of the Atlantic community dedicated to defense against aggression; aid now being considered for the Republic of India; the Greek-Turkish aid program which preserved freedom and independence for Turkey and Greece; the Voice of America; our program of defense mobilization; and military assistance to our allies.

Thirdly, the policy of our Government is to strike at the roots of Communist growth and infiltration by a broad program of economic, scientific, and technological assistance to the underprivileged and underdeveloped areas of the world. The point 4 program was a beginning. We are now preparing to move forward on a much broader and comprehensive program.

NATURE AND MENACE OF COMMUNISM

In shaping and carrying out our foreign policy, which must, above all, be based on our own self-preservation, it is imperative that every American understand the nature of the menace of communism—how it works, how it gains support, who and what are its natural allies. Communism is more than a military threat; it is destructive of the ideals and principles of our religious faith and of our political philosophy. Wherever communism has thrived, the individual has been enslaved; education has been corrupted and used for the selfish and greedy purposes of those in power; free institutions of business and labor have been destroyed; independent ownership of farms and property has been abolished; the very sanctity of the home and of the family has been jeopardized; freedom of worship has been restricted.

This is the menace of communism—a menace of military force and human slavery. Make no mistake about it—international communism will not satisfy its hungry appetite by enslaving and conquering Europe and Asia. Its ultimate objective and its final blow is directed against the United States, for here, in this great country, is to be found the heart and soul of freedom and democracy.

It is my sincere conviction that we cannot escape—nor, when we understand the issue, do I feel we would want to escape—from assuming the responsibility of leadership for the millions of people who are still dedicated to liberty; nor dare we minimize the threat of brutal power and force that confronts us. It will do us no good merely to hope for peace and security. I believe we must be willing to work and sacrifice for world peace and our own security. The Soviet Union has brought under its control millions of people—satellite nations. Today communism controls over 800,000,000 people. We in the United States, with slightly over 150,000,000 citizens, cannot meet this menace alone. We need friends. We need free allies if we are to preserve our own freedom.

It was the recognition of this obvious fact that prompted our Government to enter into the North Atlantic Pact—an alliance of 13 free nations for mutual defense and common effort in securing peace. The North Atlantic Pact was established within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations. It lends strength to the United Nations. Let it be clearly understood that there can be no United Nations if free and independent nations are conquered and absorbed by the Soviet Union. It is because of the military power and the aggressive actions of the Soviet Union and her satellites that it became necessary to implement the North Atlantic Pact by, first, the military assistance program and, secondly, the creation of a Western European defense system including American troops, air power, and naval forces.

TROOPS FOR EUROPE

The defense of Western Europe is essential to the defense of the United States. Western Europe and the United States represent the muscle, the fiber, and the tissue of the forces of freedom. Communist aggression looks upon the countries of Western Europe as but the steps—the gateway—to a frontal attack upon the citadel of liberty, the arsenal of democracy—the United States of America.

The question is simply this: Where do we defend freedom against the constant pressure and force of Communist totalitarianism? Shall 150,000,000 Americans undertake this task alone, or shall we join as a strong and participating partner with our friends and allies where the battle line has been drawn?

Let's make no mistake about it: The defense of Western Europe is the key to the security of the United States. With the people of Western Europe on our side, we have a combination that the Communists cannot beat. But with Western Europe dominated by Soviet Russia, its people enslaved, its resources exploited, its factories producing the materials of war for Russia, we will be faced with an overwhelming preponderance of power that may well spell our doom.

The reasons for this are perfectly clear. Military power consists of manpower, industrial production, natural resources, strategic bases, and the will to fight and resist. If Western Europe is lost to the Communists, the majority of the world's manpower goes to the Communist forces.

If Western Europe is conquered or dominated by the Soviet Union, the balance of industrial production goes to the Communists.

If we lose Western Europe, the overwhelming proportion of raw materials and critical supplies goes to the Communists.

If we lose Western Europe we lose the strategic bases, air and naval, from whence to defend ourselves against Soviet attack.

If Western Europe is controlled by the Communists, a spirit of defeatism and hopelessness will befall all of humanity.

A word about industrial production. There are three great industrial workshops in the world: First, Canada and the United States; second, Western Europe; third, Russia and her satellites. A striking way to illustrate this fact is to look at the world's steel capacity. For every 10 tons of steel we in the United States can produce, Western Europe can produce more than 6 tons. Russia and her satellites can turn out 4 tons. The significance of this is obvious. Add Russia's 4 tons to Europe's 6, and you wind up with a steel capacity equal to our own. On the other hand, combine free Europe and the United States, and the result is a 4 to 1 advantage in our favor.

There are dozens of other illustrations that can be shown, but they all lead back to the conclusion that the productive capacity of Western Europe and the United States combined tremendously exceeds that of Russia and her satellites. And they also lead to the conclusion that our margin of safety would be tremendously reduced if free Europe falls into Russian hands.

But productive capacity isn't the whole story. With Western Europe in their hands, the Communists would quickly take over all the resources of the Old World. The Mediterranean would become a Red Sea. Africa would be defenseless. The Middle East, India, the rest of southeast Asia, Australia, and the island areas of the Southwest Pacific would fall into the Red orbit.

With the loss of Africa would go the uranium supplies upon which our atomic weapons so largely depend. Manganese, an essential component of steel, reaches us today from India and Africa. Loss of those two regions would cripple our steel output. Much of our tin and all of our natural rubber comes from the Malay Straits and the island areas of the Southwest Pacific.

In short, the loss of Western Europe would mean that we were forced to defend ourselves with the resources and manpower of the Western Hemisphere alone and sharply reduced—and that is not a happy prospect.

There are 2,250,000,000 people on earth. About 300,000,000 of them live in the Western Hemisphere—about one-seventh of the world's population. I do not relish the prospect of living in the kind of world in which the Communists control 85 percent of the world's population. And that is exactly what we would face if we walked out on Europe.

We must send troops to Europe because our national self-interest demands that we save Europe from Communist aggression. To refuse to send troops is to serve notice to the Soviet Union that it can walk across the Continent.

And Europe can be saved. Our military experts, from General Eisenhower on down, tell us so, and this is a military question.

They tell us it can be done by building up the combined forces of land, sea, and air.

The second question is, should we limit troops to Europe? I say "No." If the security of Western Europe is basic to the security of the United States, then it would be sheer folly to limit that security by an act of Congress. World War II should have taught us the lesson of "too little and too late." The events leading to World War II should now be conclusive evidence of the futility of half-way measures. Let this be perfectly clear: Military assistance to Europe—troops for Europe—is in our own national interest. We do not know at any time what the next 24 hours may bring, and the lessons of Korea and Pearl Harbor should have taught us we must be thoroughly prepared.

How many troops belong in any one spot is a question which neither you nor I can decide. Congress and the President have decided, through the North Atlantic Pact and the military assistance program, the basic foreign and military policy. Military leaders must decide technical questions of military strength and troop movements. These decisions must then be finally approved and implemented by Executive direction, namely the President, who is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

MOBILIZATION FOR DEFENSE AND PEACE

There are those who are disturbed about our program of military mobilization and what appears to be the tendency toward war. I am sure that people everywhere are disturbed, confused, and emotionally upset. We live in dangerous times. We are faced with the possibility of war, and yet we are not a warlike nation. We desire peace. We have made an honest effort to preserve peace and will continue to make every effort humanly possible, but peace cannot be obtained without strength. Therefore, we are mobilizing our strength not for aggression, not for world power, but rather to impress upon the leaders of the Soviet Union that the free people of the world will resist aggression and force. At the same time, through the councils of the United Nations and through the normal diplomatic channels, we should let the world know that we stand ready at all times for real disarmament under international inspection.

It is our solemn duty to impress upon the people of the world the understanding that wars do not solve problems and that we in the United States have but one desire—peace, freedom, and security. We know that the answer to the aggression of international communism is not to be found in military preparedness and strength alone. Our major emphasis must be directed to creating and building the conditions of peace. Peace in Europe, peace in Asia will come only when injustice and exploitation have been removed; when people have the right of self-government; when economic and social opportunity is made available; when poverty, ignorance, and disease have been checked and rolled back. These are the objectives toward which we should dedicate our efforts.

THE CRISIS IN ASIA

Our world is changing. Whole areas in Asia and Africa are in revolution. Millions of people are seeking their independence and freedom. Some have obtained it—such as the people of Indonesia, India, Burma, and Ceylon; others are aspiring to it—such as the people of Indochina, north Africa, and Malaya. If there has been a weakness in our foreign policy it has been that we as a Nation have failed to identify ourselves with the legitimate desires of the people of Asia and Africa to attain their own independence and their own freedom. It is my considered judgment that we ought not to be resisting this revolution. We ought to give it leadership.

The tragedy of our time is that we have permitted the Communists to identify themselves with these liberation and emancipation movements in Asia and Africa. Yet communism by its very nature is counter-revolution, reaction, and subjugation. International communism's only purpose in joining with these people seeking their independence is to gain control and inflict on these people their vicious and brutal system of exploitation and oppression. Our job is to explain that to the world, not only in words but by setting an example through leadership, through guidance, through generous assistance.

INDIA

We must be patient and understanding—and we ought to be. We too, only a short time ago in human history, obtained our freedom. We rejected colonialism; we were sensitive and jealous of our liberty. And we were justly concerned with our own independence, trying to keep away from foreign entanglements. Let me give you a modern example. I refer to the Republic of India. Here is a nation of over 350,000,000 people that has just obtained its independence after 300 years of colonial exploitation. India is confronted with overwhelming problems within her own borders. She is new in the art of self-government. She is, in a sense, weak in military and economic power but potentially strong and rich.

Many Americans are disturbed, yes, angry because the Government of India does not see eye to eye with us on the problem of communism in China. But shouldn't Americans consider that India is consumed with the difficulties of her new independence and freedom? That she wishes to keep away from foreign entanglements? This is the natural and the historic pattern of new nations. It was our pattern, our experience of less than a hundred years ago. India is a country that is prodemocratic by its constitution, its government, and its philosophy. It has taken stern measures against totalitarian groups within its own borders. It is a part of the British Commonwealth, our major ally. It is without a doubt the leading free country in Asia. Yet, because India has not alined herself with us on the China question, even though she has supported the United Nations' resolution to resist aggression in Korea, she is today being criticized and condemned and is suffering at the hands of our own Government, which is withholding urgently needed food and wheat from India.

You will be interested in knowing that American policy with reference to the Republic of India has been a major concern of mine ever since my arrival in the United States Senate. I have realized the importance of cordial relations between our country and India. I have attempted to make an intensive study of American-Indian relationships, and in particular the political, economic, and social institutions of that great Asiatic power. On several occasions during the past 2 years I have spoken on the floor of the Senate on the subject of India and its position in world affairs. Not only have I brought these matters to the attention of the Senate, but I have also brought to the personal attention of the President and the Secretary of State America's policy with regard to India and the other areas of the Far East.

Better than a year ago I outlined to the President and the Secretary of State the urgent need of food for India if that country were to avert famine and all of the accompanying agony and confusion. Approximately 8 months ago I had the privilege of meeting one of our great Christian leaders from India, Bishop Pickett, of Delhi. I had Bishop Pickett discuss the Indian food shortage with Members of Congress, with the Secretary of State, and with Special Assistant to the President, Mr. Averill Harriman, as well as with Vice President Barkley. I accompanied Bishop Pickett to all of these meetings where he presented the very real need of food for the people of India. At a later date I arranged for the bishop to visit the President.

On December 16, 1950, the Indian Ambassador to the United States, Madam Pandit, made a formal request to our Government for 2,000,000 tons of cereal grains. Following this formal request, I joined with other Members of the Congress in preparing a letter to the President asking for an audience to discuss the food needs of India. Along with Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, I arranged for a congressional delegation to visit the President. We received from him assurances that he supported India's request for 2,000,000 tons of grain. The President, subsequently, sent a very strong message to the Congress in support of food for India.

Immediately following the President's message, I joined with three of my colleagues in the Senate in introducing a bill to authorize the Government of the United States to provide the grain that India needs.

It is imperative that there be congressional approval of legislation to provide a grant of 2,000,000 tons of food grain to the people of India. There are disturbing signs in India and in all of Asia—signs of great mistrust on the part of the people of that continent that the United States is not interested in their welfare. You and I know that the American people are a generous people; that by philosophy, tradition, and history we have always demonstrated a keen and abiding interest in the welfare of our fellow men. It is imperative that we use the strength of our abundance in our conflict with communism. Without any expansion of industrial capacity, without any further mobilization of manpower, we can strike deadly blows at international communism by lifting the standard of living and by aiding the sick, the hungry, and the exploited.

The people of Asia face starvation. Freedom loses its meaning if it is without bread. Our Nation, if it is to be effective in the struggle against communism, must respond to the appeal for food from the underprivileged peoples of Asia, Africa, and the other underdeveloped areas. Yes, the most effective way to oppose communism and fascism is to eliminate the causes of those malignant diseases. It is not idealistic to say that we must attack poverty in the world. This is practical realism in the twentieth century. The time to assist the democratic forces in India and in other parts of Asia is now. Every humanitarian consideration, every political and religious consideration, and every consideration of our national interest calls for the Congress to act immediately in support of legislation for food grain for the people of India.

Food for India is symbolic of an over-all comprehensive program that is desperately needed—a program striking at the roots of communistic growth—a program that had its beginning in the point 4 program, as announced by President Truman. We can be a partner in the self-help efforts of these new nations in the Asiatic area. The governments of these new nations are struggling to maintain their integrity and their freedom. These governments, as history has proven, can be destroyed from within. There need be no Communist military attack. The attack of poverty and economic distress can be just as ruinous and destructive as a military blow. Communism in Asia, particularly in the southern and southeastern portions, is growing because the economic conditions are favorable to its growth. The propaganda of communism offers bread and land to the under-privileged and to the exploited. A bold and comprehensive program of economic assistance can prevent these areas from going communistic.

I point up the issue of India because I believe that if we are to build a world dedicated to a just and enduring peace, if we as Americans are to give leadership, we must not expect all of our friends and allies to agree with us all the time on every issue. Freedom means the right to disagree. We condemn the policy of the Soviet Union for having satellite or stooge nations that say "yes" at every command. Are we not expecting our friends and allies to be subservient to our every wish? This must not be. Free allies, free nations must be expected to have independent judgment, and that judgment must be respected for what it is.

KOREA

I fully realize the tragedy, bloodshed, and destruction that has come with our resistance of aggression in Korea. The attack of the North Koreans and the entrance of Communist China into the Korean conflict is clear and unadulterated aggression. Were we to let this aggression go unchecked, we would again see the pattern of conquest unfold itself with ever-increasing greed and power. Our struggle in Korea is a struggle for freedom, for independence, and for a world based on law and order. Like yourself, I am disappointed that the other members of the United Nations have not felt free to give us greater support. But those valiant men who have sacrificed their lives in Korea and those who are yet battling against tremendous odds, may well save this world from an all-out catastrophic World War III. While the battle is far away from our homeland, the aggressive attack of the Communists in the Korean area is a dagger pointed at our heart. Those who have given their lives in the Korean conflict have done as much to preserve and protect the freedom of America and the rest of the free world as the patriots at Valley Forge, the Argonne, and the Battle of the Bulge. They are fighting the fire of communism to prevent the conflagration from sweeping over our own homeland.

Aggression on the part of any nation against another is banditry and lawlessness. It needs to be challenged just as we in a local community take effective action against those who commit assault and battery or trespass against the private property of others. There isn't a shadow of a doubt that the North Korean action was a part of the over-all program of the Cominform and its aggressive tactics. I repeat, the fact that we met this aggression, despite the risks involved and despite the great sacrifice that it meant, has done a great deal to check the possibility of World War III.

I, for one, am convinced that if this attack had not been challenged, it would have been the "go ahead" signal for any nation in the world to move its troops against another. We know what happened in the Berlin air lift when Russia decided to blockade Berlin. We know that by firm and determined action on the part of our Government and that of Great Britain, the Soviets finally appealed for a settlement and the blockade was lifted. I think the facts of the last few years reveal conclusively that wherever nations refuse to resist Communist pressure, communism moves ahead, conquers, and controls. I think the facts reveal that wherever nations do resist Communist pressure, communism takes another look, sizes up the situation, and comes to an agreement that preserves the peace.

I know there has been a great deal of criticism about what has transpired in Korea. I am not prepared to defend every action that we have taken, but I do defend the moral validity—the righteous purpose of our resistance of aggression.

CHINESE RELATIONS

We Americans are worried and concerned over what has transpired in China. But let us get the record clear. Our Government has been generous with the Chiang Kai-shek Government of the Republic of China. Our Government extended to Chiang's Nationalist Government of China a grand total of $3,598,200 in economic and military aid. Our Government sent one of its most able public officials, Gen. George Marshall, to China in a desperate effort to save the situation. I do not know all of the reasons why the Chinese Communist movement conquered China and defeated the Nationalist Government. But I do know that it was through no fault of ours. The propaganda that has been let loose in America against our policy in China would lead many to believe that it was our responsibility, and ours alone, to save China. But no nation can be saved from the menace of communism if it refuses to save itself. Communism triumphed in Russia because corruption, exploitation, and injustice was rampant under the Czars, because the legitimate government ignored the social, economic, and political needs of the people. I am led to believe that communism triumphed in China, not because of what happened on the battlefields alone, but because of what did not happen in constructive action in the villages, on the farms, in the cities, and throughout the entire society.

The tragic conquest of China by the forces of communism threatens our own security and the security of the free world. There is no doubt but what this was a part of the master plan of the Kremlin. China, a historical friend of the United States, has been turned against us by the Communist leadership and the Communist propaganda. The attack of the Red Chinese armies upon the forces of the United Nations in Korea has clearly demonstrated the true intentions and purposes of Soviet imperialism. The Chinese Communist aggression has brought into sharp focus a fundamental issue of American foreign policy. This was recently dramatized by the President's dismissal of General MacArthur.

DISMISSAL OF GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

The real issue involved in the President's dismissal of General MacArthur is one basic to American Constitutional Government. The President, under the mandate of our Constitution, is Commander in Chief. The President, under the political tradition of our Republic, is responsible for foreign policy. It has been a basic principle of representative government that the military is subordinate to the civilian. The military officers and services are the servants of the Republic, not the master. The action of the President is within the tradition of American Constitutional Government.

The issue is: Shall military commanders dictate and formulate American policy or shall they carry out that policy. In this instance the issue was even more broad because the military action in Korea was not only an American action but one under the over-all supervision of the United Nations. President Truman, as all Presidents before him, demanded that foreign policy be established by the elected representatives of the people, not by any one or a few generals, able as they may be. Once we lose civilian control over foreign and military policy, then we lose the fabric of our democracy.

In dismissing General MacArthur President Truman had no other choice. The general—a brilliant and able military leader, a great man in his own right and by his own record—openly disagreed with our Government's policy and with that of the United Nations. He disagreed with the recommendations of the Secretary of Defense, General Marshall, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. No government can exist so divided in policy since no government can be guided by two inconsistent foreign programs.

General MacArthur, as an individual, has a perfect right to disagree with our Government's foreign policy, but as a general subordinate to his Commander in Chief, he has neither the right nor the prerogative to formulate and attempt to carry out his own program and to disregard the program established by the Government. While I have a high regard for General MacArthur and his abilities, I am not prepared to accept his judgment over that of the President, the Secretary of State, the overwhelming majority of the representatives in the United Nations, the majority in the Congress, the Secretary of Defense, and the combined Chiefs of Staff. It should be clearly recognized that the bold statements of General MacArthur were causing great concern in other nations and among our allies.

THE NEED OF ALLIES

While it is true that we as a Nation have been bearing the major burden of the war in Korea, we do have allies there, and those allies stand with us in Western Europe. They are the only allies that we have. It is impossible to keep allies and to maintain a solid defense against Communist aggression if we as a Nation and a Government act in opposition to our allies and disregard their wishes, their policies, and their program. To put it quite bluntly, faced as we are by the Soviet Union and its satellites, with a total population of over 800,000,000, we cannot afford to stand alone. The Soviet Union is doing everything in its power to break us away from our allies. The old tactic of divide and conquer is again being utilized. We must not fall prey to this tactic. We must stand together and work together.

THE ISSUE AND THE RISKS

The issue of foreign policy which divides us today is primarily related to our country's relations with Red China. The issue, simply put, is whether or not, first, our Armed Forces should attack military bases on the Chinese mainland; and secondly, whether or not we should use and assist Chinese Nationalist troops in an attack on the Chinese mainland. This inevitably means extending and expanding the war in Korea.

It is the policy of our Government to do everything possible to limit the present Korean war to the Korean battlefield. It is the firm determination of our Government and our allies not to extend and expand the conflict to the mainland of Asia by any action of ours. The risk involved in a further expansion of the conflict is a possibility of World War III and the full-scale intervention of the Soviet Union. It should be remembered that the Soviet Union has a treaty of alliance and assistance with the Red Chinese Government. This treaty calls for Soviet military assistance in case China is attacked by Japan or any power associated with Japan. Today we are the prime occupiers of Japan. We are associated with Japan. We are now preparing to conclude a treaty with Japan. It is entirely possible that the Soviet Union, under the obligations of her treaty with Communist China, would take direct military action were we to advance to the Chinese mainland. The political policy of the United States Government and its allies is to bring the Korean War to a conclusion and to negotiate an honorable peace.

The position of General MacArthur was clearly and brilliantly stated in his address to the joint session of the Congress. Not only did he recommend economic sanctions against China and a blockade of the Chinese coast by our Navy, but also the use of Chinese Nationalist troops from the island of Formosa and the strategic bombing of Manchurian bases by our Air Force. As I have stated, we must take into consideration were this program to be adopted, the possibility of open Russian intervention and its consequent effect upon our military position both in the Far East and in Western Europe. We must take into consideration the present military strength of the United States and its allies as compared with the Soviet Union and its satellites. Our mobilization program is just getting under way. Our total military strength is approximately 3,000,000 men. We as yet have not been able to send the additional four divisions to Western Europe. We have had to call up reservists in order to meet the commitments in Korea.

Is it not possible that the strategy of the Soviet is to trick us into a major war in Asia so that an all-out attack can be launched in Western Europe? It is Western Europe that Russia needs. It is Western Europe that has the industrial production, the skilled manpower and the strategic positions that are needed to round out the Soviet military machine. Russia and her satellites have an overabundance of population. They lack in supplies and productive machinery.

Those who support General MacArthur's position state quite confidently that the Soviet Union would not intervene were we to attack the Chinese mainland. Of course, no one really knows what the Soviet will do. But, I call to your attention that General MacArthur clearly stated to the President on the occasion of the President's conference on Wake Island in October 1950, that the Red Chinese armies would not intervene in Korea. I call this to your attention because then as now a risk was being contemplated and a military decision was being made. The military decision was that of advancing to the Yalu River in order to destroy the North Koreans. The risk involved was whether or not the Chinese Communist armies would move into the Korean war. History now tells us the answer. The Chinese armies did come into the war and momentarily the forces of the United Nations suffered tragic losses. It is reasonable to expect that an attack upon the Chinese mainland could and would provoke open Soviet intervention. The questions that we must ask ourselves then are simply these: Do we wish to take that risk? Are we prepared at this time by military strength and mobilization to meet all-out attack by the Soviet? What would be the effect upon our Armed Forces in the area of such a Soviet attack? What would be the effect of a Soviet attack in Western Europe at this time?

It is not divulging any secret when we openly recognize that we are presently weaker in terms of military strength than our adversary. This position will change within a year but today the Soviet Union and its satellites have a much larger army and air force than the United States and its allies. It appears to me that Soviet strategy is based on trapping us into a war on the Asiatic mainland only to strike in Western Europe, destroy our allies, and overrun the Western European countries. If this should happen, we would lose the only allies we have. We would lose the productive power of European industry. We would lose the critical raw materials and the strategic bases that are now under the control and possession of our allies. We would find ourselves without friends or allies and without vitally needed raw materials.

INCONSISTENCIES IN CONGRESS

We must seriously consider the consequences involved in extending and expanding the present conflict when we know what a difficult assignment we now have in Korea alone. It seems contradictory and confusing that the very same Members of the Congress who did everything in their power to either defeat or weaken the North Atlantic Pact and the Marshall plan, to prevent shipment of arms to our allies in Western Europe, and finally to prevent sending American troops for the common defense of Western Europe are now advocating the extension and expansion of hostilities in the Asiatic area. Only a few months ago this same group in Congress was advocating that we get out of Korea; now they are advocating that we go into China. Some Members of the Congress, while advocating an expansion of the war in Asia, have only recently voted to limit our Armed Forces and to weaken the program for selective service and universal military training.

I point out these inconsistencies because they need to be understood. It is clear that you cannot expand a war from Korea to China without taking the risk of World War III. You cannot expand hostilities from Korea to China without having more manpower and a far greater military force. You cannot expand hostilities from Korea to China without risking loss of Western Europe by a Soviet attack. It is imperative that we face up to the facts of our present military strength and that we clearly understand that the Soviet threat is worldwide and not localized.

The logical and consistent outcome of the policy of extending military action to the Chinese mainland was pointedly brought to light by a recent resolution introduced in the Congress by Senator CAIN, of the State of Washington, who proposed that the Government of the United States declare war on Communist China. If this conflict is to grow, if it is to be extended, let it come only by the aggressive designs and tactics of the Soviet Union. If the Chinese Communist forces are assisted by Soviet air power, if our troops in Korea are attacked by concentrated air power—then we have but one choice, and that is to retaliate. This means that our efforts to limit this war in Korea have been checkmated by Soviet interference. The very survival and safety of our troops will demand that we attack the air bases and destroy this air power lest it destroy us. Let it be clear, however, that we would do this in defense. Up to now the Communists and North Korean forces have not had any major air power. Therefore, it has not been militarily necessary to attack the Manchurian air bases. If this new Communist offensive in Korea brings with it waves of airplanes, then we must attack the nests and the bases from whence these planes take off. Let us hope and pray that we can limit the conflict and bring this tragic Korean action to a speedy conclusion on the terms of a just and honorable peace.

International communism now fully understands that we will resist aggression. The policy of our Government has been one of firm and resolute resistance to Communist aggression and subversion. No partisan debate nor any beclouding of the issues can remove from the annals of history the clear and unmistakable fact that President Truman, the Secretary of State, and the Congress in the development of our foreign policy have delivered hammer blows against Communist imperialism.

I welcome General MacArthur's arrival in the United States and his address to the Congress. The debate over foreign policy in the Far East will serve to reaffirm our Far Eastern program and to make it clear and understandable to the American people. It is only fair and honorable that one should await the outcome of the congressional hearings before dogmatic conclusions are made. It is my hope that a basic sense of fair play will continue to permeate our attitude as we discuss and debate our foreign policy. Above all, we must be united as a Nation, for the dangers that we face are great.

PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE AND AMERICAN POLICY

The desire of our Government is to get out of Korea, but only when aggression has been stopped. We are not fighting the Chinese people. The Chinese people have been victims of corruption on one hand and now of a Communist police state on the other. It is the official policy of our Government, and it surely is my personal view, that at all times we should extend the hand of friendship and fellowship to the Chinese people, but to do this does not mean to embrace their masters or their dictators. In fact, if we have true affection for the Chinese people, we will not only want them free from Western domination, but also from Communist dictation. If one has real affection for the people of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, and other countries, he should want, above all else, these people to be liberated from those who have defiled their government and their nation.

Recently I joined with several other Senators in offering a Senate resolution expressing friendship for the Russian people. It is the policy of our Government to disassociate the people from their Communist masters. Our whole program of information and truth must make it clear that our desire is for peace. We must appeal to the people of Russia and her satellites. That appeal must be directed over and beyond the government. There are many evidences of restlessness and of tension within the Soviet empire. It is thoroughly possible that one of the reasons that Russia has not precipitated conflict in Europe is because of the fear that the Communist leaders have of their own people and, particularly, of the people in the conquered countries. Our intelligence agencies report that the Communist leadership is having a difficult time keeping order in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and other countries. The people of Poland and Czechoslovakia are a freedom-loving people. They are proud of their national history. We must appeal to them. We must give them assurance of our support when and if they attempt to throw off the yoke of Communist oppression. This is what is called psychological warfare, an area in which we have been very weak.

SUMMARY

Therefore, our foreign policy must have many parts: in some areas economic assistance, in other areas such as Western Europe, economic assistance plus a political and military alliance. Our policy toward the nations taken over by Russia should be that of encouraging their breaking away, such as happened in Yugoslavia. Once they have broken away, we should offer them whatever assistance is within our means.

Another part of our foreign policy is and must be military and economic strength here at home in the United States. It is for this reason that we are mobilizing our forces, expanding our production, and strengthening our economy. The real secret weapon that America has is the strength of its people, the strength of its government, the power of its industry, the over-all health of its economy. Whatever we do, we must constantly keep in mind that we, the people of the United States, have a great responsibility of leadership. The whole world looks to us for guidance, for inspiration—yes, for economic aid and military assistance. This is a tremendous burden for our people to bear, but, I submit, it is a burden much less crushing than war.

There are no easy answers to these difficult problems that face us today. There is no short cut to peace. We must be prepared for years of earnest endeavor and sacrifice. We must develop a sense of poise and strength that comes through understanding and a realization of the righteousness of our cause. I believe that Almighty God will crown our efforts with success. I join with you in seeking Divine guidance and inspiration, for there are some things man cannot do alone.

Foreign Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the foreign policy of the United States, delivered by me yesterday before the Virginia Federation of Women's Clubs at their convention in the Shoreham Hotel in this city.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHALLENGE TO AMERICA IN WORLD AFFAIRS

(By Senator ALEXANDER WILEY)

I am profoundly grateful for the opportunity to appear before this fine convention of women leaders of the great State of Virginia.

I was tremendously impressed in learning that the theme of your convention was "Enlarge the Place of Thy Tent—Lengthen Thy Cords, Strengthen Thy Stakes." Surely, these words from Isaiah could not have had great applicability today, than at any previous time in American history.

In the great tempest of our times, in the storm that has engulfed the world, it is up to each of us to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of this constitutional Repu'blic—the leader of nations. We can do that by sound thinking, not synthetic thinking, by rational action rather than by emotionalism and hysteria.

OUR PRAYERS GO OUT TO OUR FIGHTING SONS

At this very moment, as I speak to you this evening, thousands of miles away American boys and other United Nations troops are gripped in a life-and-death struggle with the onrushing Chinese Communist hordes. To a considerable extent, the outcome of that vast struggle in the bloody rice paddies and the rugged mountains—that outcome will serve more to determine the future of American foreign policy than virtually anything that is said or done here in Washington.

God bless our fighting sons and their allies. May they withstand the tremendous shock of that onrushing offensive. Though holes may open in the line, may the bulwark of liberty not be breached.

WOMEN AS LEADERS IN THOUGHT AND ACTION

To this fine audience tonight, I do want to express my congraulations for your taking the time out from your busy affairs as housewives, mothers, white collar workers and in every other task—in order to consider the problems of our Nation—yours and mine. When I see a splendid gathering of women leaders such as this, I wish that all of the women who so nobly dedicated their lives to securing the franchise for womankind—I wish that they might have lived to have witnessed inspiring occasions like this. They would be thrilled to see the extent to which women have emerged as leaders in all phases of public life—leaders in thought and action.

You will recall that great American humorist, Will Rogers. Once, he was speaking of the nineteenth amendment which gave the women the right to vote. Will Rogers said, facetiously, "Oh, yes, the nineteenth amendment, that was the law that made women human by act of Congress."

Well, in the years that have passed since women emerged to voting equality, they have proven anew that the deep humanity within every woman, within every mother, every sweetheart, every wife, can be expressed in constructive action in national and international affairs.

VIRGINIA IN THE VANGUARD OF STATES

It is most fitting at this solemn occasion in history that the women of Virginia should be playing so prominent a role. Virginia, the mother of Presidents, has contributed so much to the birth and development of this Republic that this Nation is eternally in its debt.

You will recall the words of a geat Virginian, a great President of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence:

"The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time."

Virginia has contributed more than her share of martyrs and champions of liberty. In the spirit of Jefferson, in the spirit of Madison, in the spirit of Washington, let us consider the ways of maintaining the liberty for which so many sons and yes, daughters of Virginia throughout our history have given so much for so long a period of time.

THE THREE BASIC DOMESTIC CHALLENGES

If you and I were to ask ourselves what are the three great challenges of this day insofar as domestic affairs are concerned, we would answer:

1. Maintaining this constitutional Republic with its system of checks and balances between three equal and coordinate branches of Government.

2. Maintaining the American dollar which has already been badly depreciated by inflation's ravages.

3. Maintaining the American economic system, the system of private initiative and private profit, as contrasted with the alien concept of statism, of Government ownership of the means of production and distribution.

These, then, are the three basic challenges insofar as domestic affairs are concerned.

I need hardly tell you that the basic challenge on the foreign scene is that of seeking the path which will best give us peace and preserve the freedom of the world.

THE INSPIRATION OF ARTHUR VANDENBERG

Last week end, friends, there came to my colleagues and myself the sad duty of journeying to Grand Rapids, Mich., to pay our final respects to a great son of Michigan, the Honorable Arthur H. Vandenberg. It had been my pleasure to serve as highest ranking Republican with Arthur Vandenberg in 1947 and 1948 when he was chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during the Republican Eightieth Congress.

Then, in 1949, when the fortunes of politics were reversed, it had been my privilege to serve with him as his next ranking colleague on the minority on that committee. Now that he has gone—gone from the physical scene, but certainly not gone from our hearts and minds—I hope that all of us who have been his associates will carry on in the spirit that he so nobly displayed.

FOREIGN DEBATE SHOULD NOT DEGENERATE

I need not tell you that the American people are seriously divided today on many aspects of our foreign policy.

It is my earnest hope and prayer that this controversey will not, however, completely degenerate into a base partisan quarrel between the two political parties, each seeking partisan advantage over the other, irrespective of the consequences to our country. I know that the responsible elements in the Republican Party do not want to see the present situation of disunity intensified and aggravated. Rather, we want to find the common elements of understanding and agreement, so that to the greatest extent possible, we can heal the wounds in the body politic.

That does not mean, however, that the Republicans are willing to sacrifice certain basic principles, certain basic concepts with which you and I are familiar. We are not willing for example, to tolerate appeasement in the false name of "unity" and the sham name of "peace." We are willing and eager, however, to reason out differences in a spirit of judgment, in a spirit of calmness, and in a spirit of goodwill.

In turn, I trust that the Democratic Party—the majority party—will not misinterpret the Republicans' well-justified desire for a thorough investigation of foreign policy.

Whether the present administration were Democratic or Republican, I would speak forth very frankly and say that it has pursued a course of reckless conduct which has dealt severe blows to national unity.

For example, the arbitrary way in which Gen. Douglas MacArthur, a great hero, a great son of Wisconsin, was handled, has produced the largest flood of letter protests in my personal recollection and I believe in the recollection of any living member of the Congress. Why? Because the Administration violated the inherent sense of fair play, of righteous dealing, the inherent sense of gratitude for services well done—these inherent feelings of the American people.

PUBLIC WANTS STATE DEPARTMENT TO BE MORE FRANK

In addition, there is a solemn conviction of the American people that the administration has not been frank with it in presenting the full facts of the diplomatic and military situation, either in Asia or in Europe. There is the constant feeling among Members of Congress and among the American people that there is a covering up of crucial facts, that the administration only grudgingly reveals facts to the American public and then, only after the most intensive pressure has been put on it. There is the feeling that the American public is not taken into the confidence of the administration, but rather that it is spoon-fed single facts one at a time by the administration when it autocratically chooses to reveal such facts, rather than when the American people could use the facts to come to sound decisions.

It was a Virginian from Staunton, a great Democratic President—Woodrow Wilson—who pleaded for "open covenants openly arrived at." Well, let the present administration champion a policy of open agreement, openly arrived at. Let us be done with the cloud of false secrecy, the phony cloud of "I can't tell you because everything is strictly hush-hush."

Now, none of us want to bridge security regulations on certain necessary data which is necessarily confidential. But the words "security," "confidential," "top-secret" have been so abused by the present Administration as to make a complete farce of affairs. It seems that the administration rubberstamps everything "confidential," "top-secret," "super-hush-hush," whether or not it has the slightest justification to do so. What is it afraid of? Is it afraid of the common sense and intelligence of the American people?

FOREIGN, DOMESTIC POLICY COMPLETELY INTERTWINED

We all recognize that no longer is foreign policy a matter separate from domestic policy. Virtually every single action of major consequence in home affairs has repercussions—favorable or unfavorable—in most of the capitals of the world. Therefore the Congress has a tremendous role to play in foreign affairs. We recognize and respect the constitutional principle as stated by the Supreme Court in 1936 in the famous Curtis-Wright case that it is the Executive Branch which is charged with initiating, formulating and spear-heading of foreign policy. But there also must be recognized these facts: (a) Congress' rightful control over the purse;

(b) the Senate's advice-and-consent feature in the Constitution and (c) the interplay between foreign and domestic affairs. Because of all of these factors, the Administration must view the Congress as a partner, rather than as an inferior and a subordinate.

Now, my friends, what are some of the basic propositions of international affairs on which most, if not all of us can agree. Here they are as I see them:

AMERICA MUST BE A LEADER AMONG NATIONS

1. America is and must remain a leader among the nations of the earth, economically, politically, and morally. Whether she likes it or not, this is her role; this is her destiny at this crucial stage in the affairs of western civilization. She cannot retreat, she cannot shirk her duties, she cannot crawl into a shell. The earth has been contracted. Time and space have been virtually annihilated by man's inventiveness and ingenuity.

We believe that we have been precipitated to leadership in order that the great freedoms of which this Nation is the exponent may radiate to all the peoples of earth, and that from these shores, may flow that understanding that will eventuate in world peace. It is not our function to suppress or oppress; it is our function to inspire and enlighten.

We must ever bear in mind that as the leader, it is not our function to meddle in the minutest problems with which we have no legitimate relation, nor is it our intent to enforce our way of life upon those peoples who are not yet ready for it or who do not desire it. We are, however, ready to bring light that the other peoples may find their own way. Later, I shall mention some of our other positive obligations.

WE MUST MOVE ON A GLOBAL CHESSBOARD

2. America must recognize that the whole world is our chessboard and as in a good chess game, we must carefully move all of the figures on it, bearing in mind the total result. The Russians are master chess players. Every single move which they make is integrated into a total pattern. They are masters at creating diversions, masters at feinting, masters at taking our eyes off the point where they will next take the aggressive. Let us match their skills in this global chess game.

THE MAJOR DANGER SPOTS

I particularly point out these danger spots:

(a) Iran, where Russian provocators, spies, and agents are fanning the flames of nationalism into a fury which gravely threatens western oil supplies and which may imperil the whole troubled Near East.

(b) Yugoslavia, where Red and Red satellite divisions maneuver at the borders. They await but the Moscow green light which will signal an invasion for the complete destruction of what has been called in Marxist lingo the heresy of Titoist deviationism.

(c) Eastern Germany, where well-trained Communist police units and other semimilitary and full military forces engage in maneuvers and in a war of nerves against virtually defenseless Western Germany.

And, of course, there are many other danger spots in addition to the Korean battlefront.

3. Now, before I leave the subject of Europe, let me point out that America must and will live up to her obligations under the United Nations Charter and the North Atlantic Pact. America must and will continue to set the example of keeping faith, but we must insist that keeping faith is a two-way street. We must provide the moral leadership that will bring about in those nations that we deal with a strengthening of will and purpose so as to carry out the policies—economic, military, political—mutually agreed upon. Let that be borne in mind when the omnibus aid bill comes to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month.

WE WANT NO MORE HISSES AND NO MORE YALTAS

American foreign policy must ever be based upon sound judgment. But there can be no sound judgment without consideration of all the facts, including facts as to the character and responsibility of those nations with which we deal.

The American representatives who shape our foreign policy must be sound—not wild—in their basic thinking and must not be inoculated with foreign isms. They must not be so foreign-minded that they have lost all sense of their basic American responsibility. We want no more Alger Hisses and no more Yaltas.

WE MUST IMPARTIALLY ANALYZE MAC ARTHUR SUGGESTIONS

4. Now, what about the Far East? Well, my friends, we on the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees must pursue our comprehensive and impartial investigation of the background of General MacArthur's dismissal. We must explore all the controversial points of the MacArthur program which, as you will recall, includes the following:

(a) Bombing of Manchurian bases, the nests where the rats propagate.

(b) Intensification of the economic blockade of Red China.

(c) Imposition of a full naval blockade of the Red Chinese coast.

(d) Removal of restrictions on air reconnaissance of the Chinese and Manchurian coasts.

(e) Removal of the restrictions on the arming and use of Chiang Kai-shek's troops.

GOP IS NOT A WAR PARTY

5. Let me at this point state that I resent the slurs which have been cast against the Republican Party to the effect that it is allegedly a war party. I know that every patriotic Republican and for that matter, every patriotic Democrat, recognizes that American diplomats must move heaven and earth, so to speak, so as to prevent our involvement in a third world war.

You mothers, wives, and sweethearts know whereof I speak when I say that war will settle nothing, will solve nothing, will only bring on an endless train of more misery, more disease, more famine, more hatred which can only lead to more statism and still further war.

MOSCOW NOT PEIPING IS OUR REAL FOE

I believe that all segments of American society are agreed on the proposition that under no circumstances must we become involved in a perpetual land war on the Chinese mainland. We would be bled white by such a useless war but for that matter our life blood is being already drained right now in the Korean rice paddies—with no end to the bloodletting in sight.

Whether or not we can utilize Chinese Nationalist troops on the Korean Peninsula or on the mainland proper without further widening the war is the $64 question—the 154,000,000 American-life question.

We must never forget that Red China is not our basic foe; the Kremlin is our real antagonist. Let us keep our eye on the real ball.

I personally am very definitely inclined to feel, as does MacArthur, that Communist Russia will strike when she is good and ready; that is, when she is definitely convinced that victory lies within her grasp and not sooner.

Nevertheless, it is a fact that Russia's trigger finger may be "itching," as the old saying goes, and we certainly don't want the trigger to be pulled so as to explode into a third world war.

AMERICANS DISLIKE SMEARING OF MAC ARTHUR

Before I leave this general point on Asia, I want to say that the American people will tolerate no further smears of Douglas MacArthur. The American people resent the unjustified personal attacks which have been made upon this great hero. But at the same time the American people feel that this whole matter of indulging in personalities is unworthy of our position of leadership. MacArthur himself brilliantly set us an example of restraint and high principle.

Smearing of individuals may make headlines, but it doesn't make common sense and patriotism in a critical time like this or at any time.

SENATOR WILEY'S PROGRAM FOR A COUNTER-OFFENSIVE

One of the most important points of the MacArthur speech to the Congress was his thrilling appeal against a policy of defeatism. Basi in his whole approach was the concept that America cannot passively drift in the stormy seas of Asia. We must boldly seize the helm and direct the ship of state into a harbor of ultimate peace.

I should like to propose to you at this point elements in a program designed as a world-wide counteroffensive. You and I know that the best defense is still a strong offense. We recall the words of a legendary general in World War I who said in effect that his right flank was bending, his left flank was routed, and so he was advancing in the center.

No, my friends, I am not urging a war counteroffensive. I am urging a counteroffensive for peace. Let me therefore suggest the following points:

UNITED STATES SHOULD TAKE UP WITH UN PROPOSED OFFENSIVE AGAINST MANCHURIA

(a) I urge the diplomats of our country to seize the offensive and boldly present to the United Nations, and in particular to our British ally, the reasons why so many of us feel that America cannot allow Manchuria to remain a "privileged sanctuary" which reinforces the Red offensive but which is immune to attack. Now, I do not feel that America can by herself initiate all of the policies which General MacArthur recommended. We went into Korea as but 1 of over 50 United Nations. The strategy which we adopt in Korea should be based on concurrence of those nations.

That definitely does not mean, however, that we should merely accept the doctrine of stalemate, which seems to be recommended by some of our allies—allies which incidentally have hardly done a proportionate share of the bleeding and the dying in Korea. On the contrary, let us boldly urge these hesitant allies to consider the need for strong action to bring the Korean fighting to a successful conclusion.

LET US FOSTER CHAOS BEHIND IRON CURTAIN

(b) I urge that we seize the counter offensive by boldly stirring up the peoples in Soviet Russia and back of the iron curtain. I urge that we utilize every instrumentality, from hand grenades to "silver bullets" (that is, money), in order to create such a diversion in Joe Stalin's own bailiwick that his fears as to home front trouble will make him hesitate to engage in foreign combat.

We all recognize that Russia is an amalgamation of many diverse nationalities, cultures, and tongues, which unlike our own, have not been assimilated successfully. So, she offers a golden opportunity for us to apply the old Hitlerian technique of "divide and conquer" behind the iron curtain. There are in Russia tens of millions of sullen, restless, strongly nationalist peoples eager to create trouble for their enslavers. I am not urging that we arm them for immediate revolution. But it is, however, time that we gave the Russians some of their own vile medicine.

Let us ship behind the iron curtain quantities of bullets, guns, shells, so that we can cause sporadic outbursts which tie down Soviet and satellite divisions, so that when and if the time comes, there can be widespread guerrilla warfare behind the iron curtain.

LET US SELL THE AMERICAN WAY

(c) Perhaps the greatest single front on which we must seize the counteroffensive is the psychological, the spiritual front. For some reason, we Americans who have the greatest doctrine, the greatest product in the world, have become the poorest salesmen. The world cannot match our merchandising of soap, perfume, or mousetraps but when it comes to selling values which practically all of the two and a half billion of earth could recognize as the highest in the world, somehow we seem to shrink back. And so, I urge that the Congress step up the Voice of America and related information programs. I personally am not one to seek the dissipation of the taxpayers' funds but I am firmly convinced that by sound investment of our appropriations in the overseas information and presentation programs, we can reap a tremendous harvest of good will for our way of life.

POINT 4 HOLDS GREAT CONSTRUCTIVE POSSIBILITIES

One of the greatest points in our counteroffensive is to be found in the point 4 program for aid to underdeveloped areas. But my concept of that program differs considerably from that which has been implied by some administration spokesmen. Some of them have conceived of it as a universal "do good" plan which ends up by giving milk for hottentots whether they like or want milk or not and which pours billions into foreign dams, plants, etc. I say, however, that what we must basically export is the American private enterprise genius which has given us the greatest living standards of the world. We must seek to inject into the politics of foreign peoples the private enterprise "virus" in contrast to the state socialistic concepts which prevail in so many lands.

Now, my friends, I am not recommending that we export the American system of private enterprise intact to every foreign country. Obviously, these various lands are in different stages of development. Obviously, they have different cultural backgrounds, different geographic and economic needs. Let them adapt our system, but basically let them grasp the concept of freedom of enterprise, the concept of profit and loss. Let them understand the dangers of state confiscation.

Our diplomats must sell to foreign governments and peoples the concept that if nationals of America are going to invest their hard-earned money in another nation, they must have equality of protection for their investment. Our nationals must not be harassed or deprived of their life, liberty, or property abroad. We are not, of course, seeking to exploit any people. As Douglas MacArthur pointed out, the day of colonial imperialism is gone, and we say good riddance to it.

CONCLUSION

These then, are a few of the positive planks in a counteroffensive.

Well, I want again to express to you, my friends, my appreciation for your courteous attention and my congratulations on your splendid civic spirit. Good luck and good-by.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Plain Talk Wins People," from the Harrisburg (Pa.) Evening News of April 21, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAIN TALK WINS PEOPLE

Everywhere Douglas MacArthur goes, the people, by their attendance and their cheers underscore the colossal error Mr. Truman made in his abrupt treatment of the general.

This cavalier dismissal has been followed by speeches and statements by Mr. Truman and many of his advisers. The net effect is that every time one of the administration steps up to undo MacArthur, the administration suffers another setback.

The people are just not interested in having MacArthur smeared. It would be a good thing if the administration could appreciate as much. Then it would be less likely to make silly mistakes of the kind it has been making.

Another thing the administration might take into consideration is that the people are not falling for double talk about MacArthur. The announcement that the Joint Chiefs of Staffs concurred in MacArthur's dismissal is not an answer to his statement that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were agreed on the military principles he followed in Korea.

In short, the old-fashioned Washington gobbledy-gook has about run its course. The people liked that plain exposition of facts General MacArthur gave them. Anyone who wants to discuss foreign policy now will have to use facts and use them honestly. The people are just not interested in listening to a smear campaign.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials, one from the Commonweal for April 20, 1951, and the other from America, the National Catholic Weekly Review, for April 20, 1951, on the subject of the MacArthur controversy.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Commonweal of April 20, 1951]

IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

In March 1945, a few days before the death of President Roosevelt, Robert Sherwood returned to this country from the Pacific theater of operations where he had made an inspection tour for the President, having been especially instructed to get General MacArthur's views on our future Pacific policy. When Sherwood, who said he was "enormously impressed" with the range of MacArthur's views on the Orient, made his report to Roosevelt, the President remarked: "I wish that he [MacArthur] would sometimes tell some of these things to me." So deeply suspicious of the democratic administration were MacArthur and his staff, that Sherwood said he found the unmistakable signs of "a persecution complex at work" in the MacArthur entourage.

In recent months General MacArthur chose to impose his private views on his Commander in Chief by means of a message to a veterans' convention, an unauthorized message and implied challenge to the Chinese commander in Korea, and a letter to the minority leader of the House. All told, one can only judge these actions to have been the behavior pattern of a man who put himself above the laws of courtesy and country.

MacArthur's opinion on Pacific policy—which is, that Asia is the decisive battlefield to be defended against the Communists and that therefore we should extend and not limit the Korean war—is an opinion totally in opposition to American foreign policy; in holding this opinion, MacArthur was defying the judgment of the President, the State Department, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Eisenhower, the majority of the United Nations, and the majority of the Congress. One may, if he is an admirer of the general believe that the general was acting in a democratic manner, in deference to the will of the majority and in the best interests of the principle we fight for, the principle of the "democratic way of life." But the burden of the proof is on him. This, it seems to us, was the behavior of a man in defiance of the majority, a man with a will-to-power that was contemptuous of the prevailing reason of the majority; this, in short, was the behavior of the self-appointed genius who always thinks he knows what is best for the ignorant masses and whose actions are in the pattern of history's long chronicle of dictators.

Maybe MacArthur was right; maybe he was of those rare and enlightened leaders destined to show mankind the way. Certainly he had reason to be restive, since he had been in a most difficult military position ever since the United Nations was forced to defend itself on the distant and disadvantageous Korean Peninsula.

But in our judgment MacArthur was disastrously wrong and we are of the opinion that the mystique of his enlightened leadership was a cult too jealously guarded by a selected group of admirers to be genuine. We consider MacArthur's policy to have been wrong for the following reasons:

First, we believe that in order to wage war now against the west, the Soviets must have the steel-making capacity of the Ruhr, or Japan, or both. Therefore western policy should be to prohibit Russia from the Ruhr and Japan by building up a defensive position in the free world with all haste, in the hope of stalemating the threat of a world war.

Second, we believe that in order to give us time to build these defenses, every effort should be made to limit the Korean war to Korea, because to bomb Manchuria means to bomb the rest of China eventually, and this in turn means that Russia will be forced to come to the direct aid of Mao Tse-tung. Since the United States cannot hope to defeat the Communists through nonatomic air power alone (we could not destroy the North Korean Army with air power, nor can we destroy the Chinese Armies now, even though we have had absolute control of the air), we would, then, following MacArthur's strategy, have to send our armies into the futile and bloody trap of a land war in Asia. Were this to happen, Russia would have accomplished her desire to spread and thin out our nonatomic air and land forces around the world to a point of such overextension that it is doubtful whether western arms could be supreme in any one theater of war.

Third, since it is possible that under such circumstances the great powers will resort to atomic warfare (especially if the rumored atomic artillery shells are a reality), we believe that it is the moral obligation of Christians first to exhaust every possible means of averting this unspeakable massacre, and one of those means right now is to limit the war to Korea, making every effort to discharge our moral obligation to defend the United Nations there without provoking further conflict.

Fourth, we believe that the present foreign policy of the Administration is essentially correct in its European emphasis and in its combined objective of defense and negotiation. This policy is by far a better hope for an honorable peace than the swaggering belligerency of MacArthur.

In his last attempts to dictate the far eastern foreign policy of this country and of the United Nations, General MacArthur clearly exceeded his authority and, in defying the normal processes of the democratic code, he placed himself outside the cause and the ideology we are trying to defend; he in fact brought on his own dismissal. Surely the President acted with sincere regret, as he has said. But certainly his decision was for the common good; it was, we believe, the only decision he could have taken in the interests of discharging his responsibility to the country and to all those throughout the world who look to us now for a reasonable example of leadership.

In a very real sense Mr. Truman could only afford to make this decision trusting in the ability of his countrymen to weigh the facts impartially; if the MacArthur partisans choose to attack Mr. Truman as wildly as we anticipate they will, then we believe that those who support the President in this matter have every good reason to stand by him now and thus vindicate the high trust he has placed in them.

[From the National Catholic Weekly Review of April 20, 1951]

THE MACARTHUR OUSTER

From almost any angle you look at it, the storm now swirling around General MacArthur is deplorable. What remains of our national unity is in danger of being destroyed by the supercharged lightning flashes of emotion generated by personal and political partisanship. We discern but one hopeful ray in the lightning-riven clouds: if the controversy can be brought under control and carried on calmly on the basis of the issues involved, it may become the last great debate on United States foreign policy.

The one Herbert Hoover touched off 6 months ago, apparently settled by the Senate's troops-to-Europe resolution of April 4, dealt largely with our policy for Europe. Our far-eastern policy, or lack of it, was not formally debated in the Senate. The MacArthur incident, for better or worse, has made such a discussion inevitable. We can only hope that it will be productive of a renewed national unity.

Already, as Walter Lippmann observed in the curious case of Senator TAFT, there is confusion as to what General MacArthur meant in his now celebrated letter to Congressman MARTIN. The general, as the columnist pointed out, wanted more than permission to bomb Red China's Manchurian bases and to use the Formosa forces of Chiang Kai-shek against the Chinese mainland. The General wanted permission to wage all-out war against China. Contending that the global conflict with communism has already begun, the general argued that it could be won by defeating Red China. The way to save Europe, he wrote in effect, is to defeat communism in Asia.

That involves an almost complete reversal of our present policy. The United States and its allies have long since decided to concentrate on Europe while diverting the necessary minimum to prevent a Communist sweep in Asia. The fundamental issue is therefore clear-cut. Shall the United States abandon its present efforts to safeguard Europe and devote its resources chiefly to a full-scale war with Red China?

Those who join General MacArthur in an affirmative answer to this fateful question should not overlook these considerations:

1. If we decide to join the issue in Asia, we shall have to go it alone—our Atlantic allies, the Asian-Arab nations and the Latin-Americans will not support us.

2. Attacking China in the belief that the U. S. S. R. will not come to her aid is not a calculated risk—it is the wildest sort of gamble.

3. Our big strategic bombers, on which we now rely to deter Russia in the west, will be relatively ineffective in China. If we contemplate using them for atomic bombing, let us reflect that such bombing would have little military value, would infuriate all Asia and might invite Russian retaliation. Thus there is no hope of a short and cheap war.

4. Our long-neglected tactical Air Force is still woefully unready for a major conflict.

5. Even if Russia did not intervene in China, she would be powerfully tempted to take over an almost defenseless Europe, including Britain, acquiring thereby tremendous war-making potential.

6. If we tempt Russia into a war for which we are still unprepared offensively, we shall expose our people to destruction, since our home defense system, both military and civil, is pitifully incomplete.

7. As the President emphasized in his address to the Nation on April 11, our present policy is designed to avoid world war III. Though it may fail, it furnishes a hope lacking in the MacArthur approach.

If these considerations are put forcibly to the American people, we believe that the last great debate will not be prolonged as its predecessor was, and that our people, finally satisfied that we are on the only course open to us, will then settle down to the supreme task of insuring their security.

Why Dispersal Was Shelved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Why Dispersal Was Shelved," published in the Washington Evening Star of April 24, 1951. The editorial gives a clear answer to why many Senators voted against the dispersal bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY DISPERSAL WAS SHELVED

Defeat of the dispersal-decentralization program in the Senate cannot fairly be attributed to a head-in-the-sand attitude toward the atomic bomb on the part of opponents of the plan. If there was confusion in Congress over the real purpose of the bill, the blame rests largely on those who sponsored it. There was good cause for suspicion at the Capitol that the whole dispersal idea was related only indirectly to atomic security—that the primary object was to provide more space for new Government employees and agencies rather than to save the Government from destruction if A-bombs started to fall.

The suspicion was fed by the nature of the dispersal plan itself. It is true that several defense offices were scheduled to be moved to the satellite Federal office centers skirting the National Capital, but so were a number of agencies which would have little or no part in taking over the Government in event of an atomic catastrophe. And, as some senatorial critics of the plan pointed out, placing some Federal offices only 20 miles from the zero milestone would not guarantee safety—especially if the Russians should succeed in developing a hydrogen bomb. Moreover, the main centers of Federal activity, the really vital spots of the executive establishment, were to remain right inside the target zone in Washington.

Testimony during the hearings indicated that some Federal officials were more concerned with making room in the District of Columbia for the expanding Government than with preparing defenses against atomic attacks. One way of relieving the growing congestion, of course, would be to launch a genuine retrenchment program for nonessential activities, as Senator BYRD, the Hoover Commission, and others have urged. But that alternative does not seem to have been given very serious thought by Federal authorities.

Decentralization—the removal of some agencies to distant cities—was plainly at variance with the fundamental plan for establishing the seat of Government in the District of Columbia. Decentralization, as proposed in the shelved bill, was almost wholly a space-making expedient, not a security project. Decentralization for such a purpose should be a last resort. As the Star has said before, there are still Federal-owned sites within the District where new offices could be built.

The prospect of spending more than $100,000,000 on a program which would offer little assurance of security in event of all-out atomic warfare was not appealing at a time when the need for drastic economy is as urgent as it is today. This prospect, coupled with the understandable reluctance of nearby areas to having the Federal Government take more land off the tax rolls, had much to do with the scuttling of the plan by the Senate yesterday. Until the administration comes forward with more convincing evidence of the urgent need for dispersal and decentralization, and more proof of the defense value of so costly an enterprise, Congress may be excused for failing to show any enthusiasm for the program.

Statement by Erle Cocke, Jr., on the Sixth Anniversary of the Meeting of the Russian and United States Troops at the Elbe River, April 25, 1945

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Erle Cocke, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, on the sixth anniversary of the meeting of the Russian and United States troops at the River Elbe on April 25, 1945.

I may add that this statement is being broadcast by the Voice of America in 87 different languages today. It seems a most excellent statement on the friendship of the people of America for the people of Russia.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. By a strange coincidence, and one which has some significance, it is also the anniversary of the adoption of the United Nations charter at San Francisco.

Mr. BREWSTER. A very happy coincidence.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY ERLE COCKE, JR., NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, ON THE SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MEETING OF THE RUSSIAN AND UNITED STATES TROOPS AT THE ELBE RIVER, APRIL 25, 1945

SIX years ago today two brave armies met at the Elbe River in Germany and in common cause, grasped hands in friendship.

Russian soldiers and American soldiers defeated nazism—the common enemy of 1945—but the high hopes of peace have been dashed since that memorable day.

In six short years the Stalinist regime, by its military and political aggression, has extended its control to the point where today, 37 out of every 100 people in the world are under the domination of the Soviet Politburo. The regime that rules one-fifth of the earth's surface controls one third of its living.

But the cause for which the Russian soldier fought—the extinction of Nazi-Fascism—has turned upon him, and today a cynical leadership would have him believe that western democracy and American ideals of freedom are even worse than Hitlerism.

Surely 6 years do not change the common man. Only the despot can twist facts to fit his warped mind.

The Russian soldier who clasped the hand of his American comrade-in-arms on the Elbe is, fundamentally the same soldier today.

The American soldier who returned that firm handclasp of friendship has not changed.

The ideology of the United States has not changed. It still calls for a free man in a free world.

But the Kremlin, having tasted victory—a victory that was won not by despotism, but by men who valued freedom, would now have those same friends turn about and declare that handclasp on the Elbe was an empty gesture.

Today in the United States, the friends of fighters for Russian freedom has dedicated itself to friendship for the Russian people in their long struggle against Stalinist slavery.

The American Legion welcomes this group and endorses its anti-Stalinist crusade.

The friends of fighters for Russian freedom has undertaken to tell the Russian people that we make a clear distinction between them and their slave-masters. They, like the American Legion, would have the truth permeate beyond the iron curtain and reach the minds of ordinary Russians.

Let no one think this cannot be done. It is part of Stalin's invincibility myth to say that one cannot reach the Russian people.

We know that the American people are, as they have been in the past, the steadfast friends of the Russian people. Our fight is with the despotic rulers now directing Soviet policy. That, too, is the aim of the friends of fighters for Russian freedom.

On behalf of millions of American veterans, the American Legion reaffirms its solidarity with former comrades-in-arms of the Soviet army who still look forward to the achievement in Russia of those basic freedoms and human rights without which there can be no peace and for which Americans and Russians died.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, to the Daughters of the American Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered before the Sixtieth Continental Congress of the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, in Constitution Hall in this city on April 18, last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your great patriotic organization, during all its history, has exerted a powerful influence for sound Americanism.

You have always combated the godless ideologies which would destroy our country.

You have proudly proclaimed the glories of the flag and the greatness of our Republic.

You have been an unconquered bulwark in defense of the letter and the spirit of the Constitution.

While others slept, the Daughters of the American Revolution have kept the watch over the ramparts of freedom.

America has never been a country for an easy way of life. It is a land of opportunity, but it calls upon its sons and daughters for courage, self-reliance, hard work, and sacrifice.

Fortunately, those who settled America were sturdy, self-reliant men and women. They had stout hearts and deep convictions. They braved the perils and the hardships of the New World because they loved liberty.

They wanted freedom to worship in the manner which would bring them closest to God. They wanted the right to speak freely and without fear. They wanted the right to take part in their Government.

They didn't look to the Government for security. They did not demand grants, loans, subsidies, or hand-outs. All they asked was freedom and opportunity.

With faith founded upon deep religious convictions, they started to carve out of the wilderness the outlines of advancing civilization on the American Continent.

Their tools were the ax, the rifle, and the Bible—each a true symbol of the elements which have contributed to the greatness of our country.

The ax represents hard work and thrift.

The rifle symbolizes courage and sacrifice in the defense of our high ideals.

The Bible is the truth, the foundation of our Government, the inspiration and guide to justice, righteousness, and peace.

It is not necessary to go into the history of our growth and progress before this splendid audience.

You know the story of our colonial development, of the rising resistance to tyranny, culminating in the ringing declaration that these Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States.

You have followed the fortunes of the patriots of our independence from Lexington and Concord to the discouragement and cruel suffering at Valley Forge and the final triumph at Yorktown.

The sacred ideals for which our forefathers fought were given expression in the Constitution of the United States, the oldest written Constitution in the world. The far-sighted statesmen who gathered in Independence Hall in the summer of 1787 wanted a form of government that recognized freedom of the individual as God's greatest gift to mankind.

Their whole plan of government was to give men opportunity. Under that system we have made marvelous progress in less than 200 years.

A trackless wilderness has been converted into fertile lands and splendid cities. Great transportation systems and giant industries have been created. Thousands of small businesses have been established, forming the strong backbone of our economy.

Hospitals, educational institutions, research foundations and centers of art and music have been established. More than 266,000 churches, cathedrals, synagogues, and temples have been erected, with a membership exceeding 77,000,000, free to worship as their conscience dictates.

In 200 years we have developed our skills and resources until we enjoy more of the good things of life than any other people on earth.

We have attained the highest cultural level and the highest living standards of any nation in the world.

We are now without question, because of our know-how and our mastery of science, the greatest Nation of all history.

Yet in spite of all these blessings we have reached a time of desperate challenge.

As you well know, our country is confronted, at this moment, with dangers that could destroy our system of free government and the American way of life.

I have no fear that destruction will be brought upon us at the hands of Communist aggressors. I do not fear that the power of a foreign foe will ever destroy this great Republic.

No, my fellow Americans, that is not the greatest danger.

I am convinced that the greatest danger is within our own borders. It lurks among our own people. It is the danger that Lincoln warned against when he said:

At what point then is the danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a Nation of free men we must live through all time or die by suicide.

Today we are confronted with the danger of unsound fiscal policies, unbalanced budgets, excessive taxation and a staggering burden of debt, produced by the waste and extravagance at all levels of government.

These are the real causes of inflation which has robbed the American dollar of its purchasing power.

They point the way to national bankruptcy, which means the destruction of all freedom of the individual.

We are threatened by Government paternalism, which would concentrate complete authority under the dictatorship of an all-powerful socialistic state.

We have the danger from the insidious infiltration of Communists and other subversive elements in our schools and colleges, labor organizations and churches and even into high places in the Government.

Yes, these are dangers that we must guard against, but in my humble opinion, the most pressing danger we face is the weakening of the moral fiber of our people.

That condition grows out of a lack of understanding that a strong moral and spiritual America is the source and foundation of all our national strength.

It has come upon us because too many of our people have neglected or ignored the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. They have forgotten that as Americans we share obligations as well as rights and privileges.

The result has been greatly increased law evasion, tax dodging, and racketeering. It has brought about corrupt partnerships between public officials and the criminal underworld.

The Kefauver committee has disclosed that organized gambling syndicates take $20,000,000,000 a year from the American people by their illegal operations. That is four times as much as we spend for education. It is seven times as much as we give to our churches.

That is a terrible situation. But a greater evil is the political power gained by racketeers and gangsters by corrupting public officials, sworn to support and enforce the law.

In some communities they have built up such powerful strength in both political parties, that they have become an invisible government in city halls and courthouses.

These are the termites that are undermining the foundations of free government.

The soldier cannot move forward effectively, the pilot cannot maneuver his plane as skillfully and the gunner on his ship cannot aim as well if they realize that men back home are evading the law, living easy lives through dishonesty and corruption.

Neither can the mechanic or the farmer produce as much if he knows that a part of his production goes to the listless, the profiteer, the grafter, and the traitor to our country.

In all the sordid story of crime and corruption the most shocking chapter reveals that men in high places in the Government have betrayed the responsibilities entrusted to them.

It tells of men who were morally blinded by selfishness and greed in their desire for quick riches. It describes how they abandoned all honorable standards and pursued a course dictated by political influence, favoritism, and bribery.

And most shameful of all, in my opinion, is the refusal of President Truman to drive out of the Government those whose questionable, if not illegal conduct, has shaken public confidence in his administration.

Perhaps the explanation can be found in the statement of former Democratic Governor M. E. Thompson, of Georgia, when he resigned a week ago as consultant in the Office of Price Stabilization.

Former Governor Thompson resigned in disgust because he had been on the payroll for 12 weeks at $53.48 a day, without having anything to do.

During that time he had plenty of opportunity to observe what was going on. Listen to what he said, and I quote:

"I refuse to be a parasite on the American taxpayers.

"Thousands of loyal Americans," he continued, "are giving unselfishly of their time to defense work, but their efforts are being nullified by the indecision, bungling, and interference of scheming politicians who are motivated solely by their desire to stay in power. The American people are being victimized by a national conspiracy of mediocrity.

"Conditions existing in the national administration are so deplorable today that loyalty to party and patriotism to country constitute a conflict."

Let me say now that when such conditions are created, whether by Republicans or Democrats, our Government is in danger. Party loyalty should cease and real Americanism should assert itself.

Yes, I repeat, the most pressing danger we face is the weakening of the moral fiber of our people.

What is responsible for the critical international situation facing the United States today?

Fundamentally it can be traced to the lack of moral leadership in our appeasement of Communist Russia.

The first fatal step was taken in 1933 when we recognized the Soviet gangster government.

In a speech at Chicago in 1941 ex-President Hoover denounced that action in the words which I now quote:

"Four American Presidents and four Secretaries of State, beginning with Woodrow Wilson, refused to have anything to do with Soviet Russia on the ground of morals and democratic ideals.

"They refused diplomatic recognition. They did so because here is one of the bloodiest tyrannies and terrors ever erected in history. It destroyed every semblance of human rights and human liberty; it is a militant destroyer of the worship of God. It brutally executes millions of innocent people without the semblance of justice. It has enslaved the rest. Moreover it has violated every international covenant, it has carried on a world conspiracy against all democracies, including the United States."

Following World War II the leaders of our Nation sat down with the cut-throats of Moscow and entered into secret conspiracies that enslaved millions of freedom-loving people who looked to the United States for liberty, justice, and the right of self-government.

One by one the small nations of Europe were swallowed up behind the iron curtain—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, and part of Finland.

Then came the betrayal of China, loyal friend of the United States for a hundred years, who relied upon us to maintain her independence and national integrity.

Yes; it was the lack of moral leadership that permitted us to enter into these unholy agreements to betray the freedom-loving people of these countries. We abandoned the traditional and time-honored American principles of justice, freedom, and decency under the influence of such traitors as Alger Hiss.

The confused and irresponsible actions of the present administration have spread doubt and anxiety among the American people.

They are worried about the conflict in Korea, where we have already suffered nearly 60,000 casualties.

They are worried because we seem to have no plan.

They have no confidence in the judgment and the integrity of some of the men who have grave responsibilities and exercise great influence and power in our Government.

They have no confidence in the hasty midnight decision which ordered our soldiers into the so-called "police action" in Korea.

And the events of the past week have clearly demonstrated that they have no confidence in the hasty, midnight decision which dismissed that great soldier and patriotic American, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Again I say it all stems from a lack of moral leadership at the head of our Government.

Regardless of whatever justification the President may have thought he had—it was a brutal, irresponsible and uncalled for procedure against one of the greatest Americans who has given a lifetime of distinguished, heroic, and patriotic service to his country.

When the history of our time is recorded General MacArthur will be remembered as more than a great soldier. He will be honored as much more than one of our most brilliant military leaders.

His fame will rest equally upon his greatness as a statesman and as a diplomat.

The highest praise will be accorded his wisdom and keen understanding which won the respect and confidence of a conquered people and was winning millions of people in the Far East to the American way of life.

The most ardent hope that fills the hearts of men and women today is the hope for peace in the world, with honor, justice, and freedom.

To achieve peace we must be strong—financially, militarily, industrially—and most important we must set an example to the world of clean, decent, honest living, based on the highest moral and spiritual standards.

We must obey the laws of God and man.

Each of us must do his or her share to make the world of tomorrow a better world, but we must begin by making ourselves better people.

If we put our own house in order we can overcome the forces of evil.

We can achieve victory if we stamp out selfishness and greed and return to the moral principles, the patriotism, the courage and the faith in God that guided your ancestors in their struggle for American independence.

The Age of Government Benevolence and Handouts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. KEM

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The 'Gimme' Age," published in the Meaford Express, of Meaford, Ontario, November 23, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "GIMME" AGE

(By Joseph Lister Rutledge)

This has become the age of "gimme," in which most issues are subordinated to the overwhelming importance of the hand-out. It has come to be that right and justice and integrity and intelligence must give way before the expanding demands of this group and that. Bit by bit, we are watching the deterioration of peoples whose great traditions have been independence and self-respect. But sadder than that is the fact that we are all active participants in the change. We must say "yes" to every insistent demand; offering in return for political advantage generous slices of that mythical pie from the sky. Anyone who stands up to protest that there is an end to all benevolence, and that end is where benevolence paralyzes the abilities and integrities of a people, is derided as a reactionary. But, thinking soberly, we know that we can't all have everything we want. We know we can't provide cradle to grave security, minimum work hours, soaring wages, and endless featherbedding, both political and social. Still we promise it, hoping that some miracle will save us. What happened to some of the promises already made? Nothing. They did not materialize, that is all. The advantage gained, they were forgotten, or the failure was blamed on someone else.

The sad point of all this is not so much that we have failed in some impossible benefactions. It is that we have come to believe that the great man, the great organization, the great government, is the one that would promise the most. Years ago the soldiers who gathered about the Italian patriot Garibaldi shouted at him: "What will you give us if we follow you?" The great leader faced them sternly. "I'll give you wounds and sickness and suffering and death. But I'll give you, with them, the freedom of Italy." But we—we offer nothing but the full stomach, the lax muscles, the stifled heart. We have nothing to offer to the mind and the spirit that once led men to achievement; nothing to support the belief that any sacrifice is worth while that leaves us free, standing on our own feet, thinking our own thoughts and obligated to no one but ourselves. We talk of "the good life." But what we mean is the ample life—more free benefits, more free time, more free protection. And for what? That there may be better men and women, better education, better hearts, better homes? Nothing of the kind. Just material things. Not a word about wounds and suffering and the achievement of freedom. Only the slow attrition of hunger satisfied without effort, of security achieved without sacrifice, of production at the sweat of no man's brow. That was not the way that this or any country was born. That is not the way any free country survives.

Improvement in Business Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch entitled "Buying Spree Ended in March, Department of Commerce Reports." It calls attention to the fact that because of our large production and because of lessened consumer buying, conditions in the various industries of the country are much better.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUYING SPREE ENDED IN MARCH, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE REPORTS

The big consumer buying spree of early 1951 halted in March, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. But the Department warned that this "moderation of the inflationary movement" was offset by a rising threat of inflation from another quarter—business firms, plans to invest record sums in new plant and equipment this year.

The threat of a business spending spree was pictured by the agency as making further Government controls or other counter-inflationary action necessary, although some makers of autos and other consumer goods are now cutting output and laying off workers.

In its April Survey of Current Business, the Department commented:

"It is clear that further action—whether this takes the form of direct controls or monetary and fiscal measures, or both—will be required to insure the channeling of sufficient resources for defense purposes and to avoid inflationary excesses."

"In such a period," the Department publication continued, "Government policy must be directed toward curtailing that part of investment (by business in new buildings and machines) as well as consumption not essential to the mobilization effort."

Discussing the slow-down in consumer buying, the Department said March retail sales dropped 5 percent below the preceding month after allowance for seasonable factors. The decline centered in used cars, television sets, household appliances, clothing, and general merchandise.

Compared with March 1950, last month's sales were up 11 percent in dollar volume at a total of $12,620,000,000 but the Department declared the 11-percent rise was "practically all" accounted for by higher prices.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY P. CAIN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, on Sunday, April 15, 1951, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] and the junior Senator from Washington were guests of the Columbia Broadcasting System on its People's Platform program. This program was broadcast nationally, and apparently aroused a considerable amount of interest among those who listened. Many citizens from different areas in the Nation have written to me to say they heard some or all of the program. It was on this program that I suggested that consideration should be given by the Congress to legitimatizing the undeclared war in Korea by declaring war on those enemies who have been fighting against our free forces since June of 1950. A number of persons have written and wanted to know exactly what was said by the Senator from Connecticut and myself on the subject of war. In order to satisfy these requests, and in order that other Members of the Congress may have available to them what was said by the Senator from Connecticut and myself, I ask unanimous consent that a transcript of the program be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

ANNOUNCER. Once again the Columbia Broadcasting System presents the People's Platform with Dwight Cooke. "Is the President or General MacArthur right? Is our policy in China sound?" These are the provocative questions highlighting the discussion between two national leaders today on the People's Platform. They are United States Senator WILLIAM BENTON, Democrat, of Connecticut, and United States Senator HARRY P. CAIN, Republican, of Washington. Now for the informal debate on the Korean crisis, here is Chairman Dwight Cooke. Mr. Cooke.

Mr. COOKE. Usually on the People's Platform I start out by giving a slight summary and reiteration of the events which have led up to the subject we're going to discuss on given day. Certainly this is one day when there's no need to do any looking back; everybody remembers the dismissal of General MacArthur, the statement of the President in his speech to the country, various statements coming out of Tokyo, MacArthur's headquarters, and the President's political speech last night. So, sitting on my right and left here on the People's Platform, are two eminent Senators of the two parties, so we will get to work.

Senator BENTON, also a former assistant Secretary of State, I think I'll start with you. What is you opinion on the MacArthur controversy?

Senator BENTON. I'd like to take that question first on a highly personal standpoint. I learned yesterday that General MacArthur is going to become a resident of my State, Connecticut, he's going to settle in Stamford. I think I can safely say he becomes our most famous import. Indeed, Senator, he rivals in fame our most famous export, Secretary Acheson, or even Katherine Hepburn or Gene Tierney. In fact I think he can be said to rival the export of Fuller brushes for which my State is known throughout the country. Could you give me any information, because this will be important to me personally, on whether you think the Republican Party is going to view General MacArthur as an outstanding Presidential candidate.

Senator CAIN. BILL BENTON, I shall always, sir, like to help you personally——

Senator BENTON. Well, thank you.

Senator CAIN. With reference to General MacArthur. He is coming back not to talk politics but to talk with his country about what has and has not taken place in recent months in Korea

Senator BENTON. It is wholly possible that this brilliant, able man against his great career however may interest himself, if not immediately in the question of politics; that the politicians of both parties will be exceedingly interested in hearing. You know, I'm running next year for the Senate in my State. The Republicans haven't selected a candidate yet to run against me. If you don't think he may loom and emerge as a Presidential candidate, my personal interest could be great; he might emerge as a candidate for the Senate and he would be a great ornament to the Senate.

Senator CAIN. Again, William, we have not come to New York today to talk about the personal fortunes of a personal friend of mine. Both parties will be interested in Gen. Douglas MacArthur. And the President of the United States has recently made of General MacArthur a free citizen to do as he wishes.

Senator BENTON. I welcome this distinguished new acquisition to Stamford, Conn. I think perhaps I will answer your question at a different level, Mr. Cooke. Perhaps the difference between Senator CAIN and me on this controversy can be best expressed after reading Senator CAIN's able speech on the floor of the Senate on Friday by my stating that I disagree with him and with General MacArthur on the proposed China policy. It seems to me that General MacArthur wants to get us in what he hopes will be a nice easy war with China and then perhaps into a quick war with Russia, which is a grave risk involved, in order to end the war in Korea.

Senator CAIN. Dwight Cooke, I deny that Gen. Douglas MacArthur has any interest whatsoever in getting this great Nation of ours and our allies into a larger war. Let us not forget that 9 months ago in June of 1950, 53 so-called free nations resolved to make of Korea a free, united, and self-controlled nation. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, first on November 28, following the avalanche of the Red hordes from the north, and secondly on March 7, 1951, merely said to America, to all of our allies and to the world that as yet the free nations of this world have not joined collectively together with power sufficient to carry out the mission which was imposed upon Gen. Douglas MacArthur in June of last year. As I read and listened and thought about our President's speech of Wednesday of last week, he was saying for all the world to hear, and we in this country must make up our minds to agree or disagree, that America's mission and the mission of the United Nations in Korea has changed tremendously and completely from what it was 9 months ago.

Senator BENTON. Senator CAIN, the big thing that we were after in Korea, it seems to me, has been achieved short of military victory. The first big thing we were after was to make out of the United Nations a strong, active, vital potential force in world affairs. If we had not moved into Korea as we did last June, I think the United Nations would have been relegated and in all possibility permanently into a kind of polite debating society or merely a platform for the Russian propaganda attacks upon us. Our action in Korea has demonstrated to the Russians and their allies or satellites the potential resistance any place in the world where aggression breaks out. That's the big thing that has so far been achieved in Korea. That in itself is a psychological victory.

Senator CAIN. Senator BENTON, that is not what we said we were going to Korea to attempt to accomplish. We were going to Korea to repel and chase out the enemy. We have done no such thing. The President of the United States, on Wednesday last, said that power sufficient to undertake and accomplish our mission are not to be given, first to General MacArthur, and now to his successor, Lt. Gen. Matthew Bunker Ridgway. Instead of repelling the aggressor as was our determination 9 months ago, we, through the words of the President, have decided to resist the aggressor, and it's this American's point of view that if all the collective forces of free men everywhere can only resist an aggressor in Korea, they are foredoomed to annihilation and to defeat and to just being wiped off this earth when it comes to a larger war against communism in other and large battle areas.

Senator BENTON. Senator CAIN, let me break in right there. I don't believe we're going to settle these grave and difficult problems and these grave political questions by military conquest alone. The military conquest——

Senator CAIN. I agree.

Senator BENTON. What we're after in Korea is a means to a larger end, which is the collective peace and security not only of the people of the United States but of the free nations of the world. Now you have an element of political judgment on General MacArthur's recommendations on the naval operation—the Chiang Kai-shek operation, the air bombing of the China coast. That is an important political decision as well as a military decision.

Senator CAIN. I agree.

Senator BENTON. Now, you have the four Joint Chiefs of Staff, who seem to differ with General MacArthur, you have the President, you have the leaders in England, in France, in other countries of the world. With all respect to the general's great military talent, at the political level the potential consequences of this Chinese action I would like to suggest that it looks as if everybody's out of step except General MacArthur, Senator CAIN, and Senator TAFT.

Senator CAIN. Senator BENTON, I think that is not a correct thing for you to say. What General MacArthur did on two occasions or more occasions in Korea was to raise some questions—he merely asked the United Nations to make some firm decisions either, to use a slang expression, to "put up" the forces they said last June they would put up or to "shut up" against their own inferred intention of doing nothing further in Korea to expel and repel the invader. I think that Gen. Douglas MacArthur did his Nation and the free world a great favor in asking all of us, Where are we headed? The President of the United States the other night said we are headed this way: "We are going to negotiate a peace in due time with the enemy." The presumption is on the enemy's terms. Korea, which we set out to make free, united, and self-controlled is to continue to be a battleground of frustration and futility because the great forces of freedom have decided they do not have strength sufficient to their undertaking.

Senator BENTON. There's nothing in the record of the evidence anywhere to indicate any thought of any negotiation making peace on the enemy's terms. You couldn't. It is that fear, it is that thought in the hearts of many of our fellow countrymen that lie at the root of part of our grave and deep disagreement——

Senator CAIN. That's quite right.

Senator BENTON. Today in the field of foreign policy.

Senator CAIN. Well, Senator——

Senator BENTON. And on behalf of the President and our leaders in the State Department and on behalf of our British allies, I would deny that thought. Now, to carry that a step further, we have got to reach a point when we try to get a general settlement with the Communists. There's no doubt. Churchill puts it by telling us, as you on the Military Affairs Committee know, to get strong and then negotiate. But there must be a time when we will negotiate if we're going to avoid this world war III.

Senator CAIN. Senator BILL BENTON, permit me to disagree with you for this fundamental reason: For approximately 9 months the mission of the United Nations was to repel and chase out the aggressor if they could while giving evidence always of a desire to sit down and negotiate a reasonable peace. On Wednesday of last week the President of the United States said we are only going to attempt to resist from now on. And against that new characterization or definition of what we're going to do in Korea, the enemy need be in no hurry; he knows our forces aren't going to attempt to go anywhere and the presumption is that we're not going to get enough power to go anywhere, and so that enemy can sit back, continue to fight a war of attrition, keep on nibbling at the peace table until we free powers are required to accept terms that we wouldn't have thought tenable or possible nine short months ago.

Senator BENTON. These are very complicated questions. Your high praise of General Ridgway on the floor of the Senate, Friday afternoon, and the great confidence you had in him, seem to me to be inconsistent with the certainty with which you now prophesy what his military movements are going to be in Korea.

Senator CAIN. Senator BENTON, there is no connection between the two. Gen. Matthew Bunker Ridgway, like his predecessor, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, are two of the great fighting generals this world has ever known. But Matthew Bunker Ridgway will have imposed upon him the same decisions of frustration and futility which led to the removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Senator BENTON. So your answer for that is, Let us start the big war right now.

Senator CAIN. I've said no such thing.

Mr. COOKE. Let's get this clear both ways, gentlemen. Senator CAIN, first what is your proposal from here on in the Korean War?

Senator CAIN. I think it is nothing short of this—the President of the United States, the large political leaders of all the free nations of the world collected as they are now at Lake Success, talk constantly and insistently about collective security. Fifty-three nations started out to win first the police action in Korea, and now the war—for the President called it a war the other day—but after 9 months of war 14 nations out of 53 nations have contributed as many as 1 foot soldier to that contest. Now we're not going anywhere for freedom, we're not going anywhere in the direction of victory unless we make collective security what it implies, a "large sacrifice and participation from each and every one of the 53 free nations of the world." That's my answer to the President's speech of the other night—let us do what we say and mean what we intended to do 9 months ago.

Mr. COOKE. And, in the meantime, Senator CAIN, when would you bomb in Manchuria or in China?

Senator CAIN. I would have given to the Supreme Commander—months ago, in November—the authority to bomb the enemy supply lines wherever he thought that tactically and strategically necessary in order to save American lives. I would place in the hands, were I the authority and I'm not, of General Ridgway that same authority. But I in part think the question is academic because if the President's prophecy of the other night comes true that the mass offensive, which the President said was being mobilized north of the Yalu River, is launched on our limited forces, then in self-defense General Ridgway and his men of all these nations must retaliate with everything they've got if they wish to live, and that can only come through bombing the supply and communication lines of the enemy in Manchuria.

Mr. COOKE. There, Senator BENTON, is one side of a foreign policy, what would be your proposal instead.

Senator BENTON. I share wholly Senator CAIN's desire to create a world where we can have collective—what he calls collective security; that, of course, is what we're after in our Korean action. The Korean action symbolizes the effort and hope of the United Nations to take a vast step forward toward collective security.

Now, I'm going to—this is very serious and difficult material we're discussing here. Most of our allies in the United Nations, most of our allies in Europe, disagree with the course of action advocated by General MacArthur and Senator CAIN; these are people not without experience with China and the Orient. I would like at the risk of perhaps some of our listeners thinking I am treating a serious, desperate subject where lives are at stake and where our boys are right today this very minute being killed in Korea, but even at the risk of some people thinking I'm treating it with levity, I would like to tell you and Senator CAIN a little story that perhaps illustrates why I think my policy is the policy of hope, why General MacArthur and Senator CAIN's policy is a policy that may precipitate us into the third war, which otherwise we can hope to avoid.

Senator CAIN. Please give us the story, William.

Mr. COOKE. May I interrupt. Before you give us the story, Senator BENTON, your policy—just a little more clarity on that; instead of an augumentation of the war in the Far East the center of your policy would be what?

Senator BENTON. Well, we have three other approaches to foreign policy as Senator CAIN knows full well out of his membership of the Armed Services Committee over and above military force. Mr. Paul Hoffman, recently retired as the head of the ECA, has written a very brilliant and able book, which is now running in the newspapers of the country, in installments, dealing in large part with these other approaches other than force to foreign policy. Mr. Hoffman's book points out that force alone cannot conquer, or when we have conquered, can't do the job for us. We must have strong economic policy, a good illustration of that is the Marshall plan and point 4; we must have a far stronger information and propaganda policy than ever created or conceived thus far by the State Department. And, of course, we must continue our diplomatic efforts and pressure at the highest level to strengthen the United Nations to achieve collective security.

Senator CAIN. Will you permit me to interject, Senator BILL BENTON, you just said something very interesting—"We must continue our pressures at the highest level." What we, who are concerned with men who die now in Korea, want to do are to exert some powers at the foot of the ladder through men who were fighting. And let me draw to his attention, Senator BENTON's attention, and everybody else who is concerned—that, look, BILL BENTON——

Senator BENTON. Well, let me tell you my story——

Senator CAIN. I will. Your story comes next—on Korea—that after 9 months of war 52 free nations in terms of collective security about which you hope we're going to have some day, have not collectively contributed as many foot soldiers to the mud and the misery and the bloodshed of Korea as America has lost in casualties. That's why my eye is on that Yalu River in anticipation of the great tragedy which is likely to result from this mass offensive the President told us about the other night and for which, sir, we are not only not prepared today, we are giving no intention of becoming prepared, and I think it a great pity.

Senator BENTON. Senator CAIN, you may have been on the floor of the Senate at the time of the outbreak of the Korean invasion when I was the first to demand that soldiers from other nations be immediately sent into Korea to join our own boys in Korea. * * * that we do not have at this time greater forces but we've got to remember we sent General Eisenhower to Europe to build up the forces there.

Senator CAIN. Is there a war going on in Europe today?

Senator BENTON. We've got to remember that the British, in the Straits Settlements—you know the figures better than I do—the French in Indochina do have detachments of soldiers and the French fighting in Indochina as we are in Korea roughly comparable to our own detachments in Korea.

Senator CAIN. That's right.

Senator BENTON. Now, in other words, that again illustrates the fact that we are in an area where progress is not coming as rapidly as we want it to come and on that you and I agree.

I may say, Senator CAIN, in line with your suggestion and before your suggested approach to the China question and General MacArthur's before I tell my story, which I'm afraid I'm over-building, I wonder why you or some other distinguished Republican leader in the Senate doesn't introduce a resolution unto the floor of the Senate calling for this war against China instead of more or less keeping ourselves behind the brass or the leadership or the ideas of General MacArthur. We've been saying on the floor of the Senate that we in Congress have the power to declare war.

Senator CAIN. Right.

Senator BENTON. And not the President.

Senator CAIN. All right.

Senator BENTON. Well, if we want war with China, why don't you get it out in the open and put in a resolution and call for the declaration of war on China instead of going at it in this backward way through General MacArthur.

Senator CAIN. Look, nobody is going at anything in a backward way. It was only on Wednesday, a couple of nights ago, in the middle of last week, that the President of the United States for the first time ever said that the United States and the United Nations were involved in a war in Korea. After 60,000 Americans had been killed, injured, or lost in action, the President of the United States continued to characterize that amazingly large conflict as being a police action.

Now, this Senator, is giving thought to a question and he is not acting with the speed and the rapidity and without the authority with which the President acted last June. I think because of what the President said last week that there is good and sound reason on Tuesday of next week, which is after the week end is over and a lot of people have thought about it, for a resolution to be offered in the Senate of the United States declaring war in Korea against all of the enemies of the United Nations fighting either in Korea or using contiguous and adjacent territories from which to launch attacks against men who, because we've done nothing in 9 months to destroy the build-up of those attacks, are too defenseless—I intend to make such a resolution to move to focus again public opinion on this question to find out not only where we are, BILL BENTON, but where in God's name are we going.

Senator BENTON. In line with your view, Senator CAIN, that's the frank, courageous, candid approach and it gets it out in the open on the floor of the Senate. And if it means the big war and starting a big war now—I, of course, will oppose your resolution.

Now I'm going to tell you my story.

Senator CAIN. Ah, but before you do that——

Senator BENTON. No, no, no, no, * * * that I postponed this story too long, this is the story——

Senator CAIN. Well, keep this story on Korea and we're for it. All of us.

Senator BENTON. This is the story that illustrates why I think there is more hope in my policy than in General MacArthur's policy. It's a story about an Oriental despot. This Oriental despot, some hundreds of years ago, sentenced one of his courtiers to death. The courtier said to him, "O king."—he said—"O king, before you kill me, give me a 30-day reprieve and in that 30 days I shall teach your favorite ass how to talk." So the king settled back and said, "Well," he said, "all right, what's 30 days?" and he sent the man to his jail and sent him his favorite ass and, of course, the courtier's friends came around and said, "Well, now, what are you up to anyway? What's the idea of this gag of yours?" And the courtier looked at him, and there's much Oriental wisdom now in what the courtier said——

Senator CAIN. We're dealing with the Orient.

Senator BENTON. Yes; we are. And the courtier said, "Well," he said, "you know in the next 30 days, a lot can happen." He said, "In the first place I might die. In the next place, the king might die. But in the third place, there's a bare chance that ass may learn how to talk."

Senator CAIN. Well, BILL, I found your story very interesting. Now through the point of the story, are you asking for patience in Korea? Is that what you're driving at?

Senator BENTON. The American people lack patience on these great issues—that's exactly the point I'm making; it is a characteristic and a grave handicap to us in the difficult problem of the conduct of our foreign policy. We do lack patience. That's precisely the point of the story.

Senator CAIN. Senator BENTON, I agree with you that I think many times we do not have the patience we ought to have, but the patience in this case goes back 9 months, for on the 27th day of June 1950 the President of the United States—without consultation or advice from anybody so far as I know and with totally no patience of any kind—started us off on a collective security effort which has not come to pass.

Senator BENTON. I disagree.

Senator CAIN. So we now are suggesting that in view of this build-up and this mass offensive, which we can anticipate, we must provide our fighting men and our allied friends with that authority sufficient to take care of themselves—that's a calculated risk, if it leads to greater danger in the future that to my way of thinking is a risk we must take or we ought to remove ourselves from Korea at the earliest possible minute.

Senator BENTON. Well, it wasn't the President who precipitated this problem last June, it was the invasion of the North Koreans: it was the Communist policy; it was the naked appearance of Communist policy of invasion which we could all then see and understand.

Senator CAIN. The Orient must have had some patience admittedly before they started the attack. But as soon as they started it, the President exercised none of the patience to which you refer and which got us into this business; some of us want to get us out of it.

Senator BENTON. Well, if I haul off right now and hit you as hard as I can you're not going to be very patient about it—that's what we were up against.

Senator CAIN. And that's what we're up against right now.

Senator BENTON. That's what we were up against in Korea last June. Even the slightest delay last June and those troops would have swept right down and taken over that peninsula if we'd been a week or two later, you know that would have——

Senator CAIN. After 9 months of war it looks as though that same thing is too likely to happen again if we sit in our box in Southern Korea and refuse to give our men, because they do not have power enough, the power to go ahead as free men always ought to do or they ought to back away, lick their wounds, and prepare for a greater conflict on a larger field.

Senator BENTON. I don't see that we have any choice but to put our confidence in the Joint Chiefs of Staff and in the talented General Ridgway on these questions. We certainly can't settle them day to day in debates on the floor of the Congress.

Mr. COOKE. That's one area in this MacArthur controversy we haven't taken up, gentlemen, and fascinating as this all is, I would like to ask this kind of a double-barreled question. First you, Senator CAIN. Propriety and the purpose of the MacArthur statements which led up to his dismissal?

Senator CAIN. I have never met General MacArthur. I have never seen him outside of his pictures. He not only is the commanding general of our American forces in Korea, he has been our supreme commander of all allied forces representing the United Nations, which made of him not only a general in a fighting sense but a diplomat in a very high political sense and I conceive that Gen. Douglas MacArthur feeling as he did had no other course to pursue than to place his case as he did before those for whom he worked and by whom he was employed and for the good of civilization everywhere.

Mr. COOKE. Senator BENTON, what do you think Mr. MacArthur—General MacArthur's—purpose was?

Senator BENTON. Well, General MacArthur is one of our most brilliant, experienced and talented leaders has a high duty to the Constitution and to the American people. And I would not pass judgment against him in those high loyalties. Nor did the President. Over a long long period of time. But it is my opinion that finally at the end of this road, at the end of this sequence of decisions, interviews, statements of General MacArthur he knew perfectly well himself the end of the road was the inevitable choice of the President which I think he was seeking and wanted of his dismissal and recall. He gave the President and the joint chiefs of staff no choice. General MacArthur with his brilliance and background must have understood that perfectly well.

Senator CAIN. In October of 1950, 6 months ago, the President of the United States, in an effort to understand the conflict in Korea, where he admitted that Gen. Douglas MacArthur knew more militarily and politically than any man on the face of the earth, went half way around the world to Wake Island to confer with the general.

Six short months——

Senator BENTON. That certainly shows he was trying to do his best——

Senator CAIN. And the President at that time had some patience. Six months later because the same man whom he characterized—the President did—as a "great military, political figure" because he raised some figures and because the President had no patience, removed from office a man whose prestige is immeasurable in the eyes of the Orient and whose advice, I think should have been calmly considered before any such fantastic action was taken by the President.

Senator BENTON. Now, HARRY CAIN, you saw the telegram released by the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time of General MacArthur's dismissal—they had wired General MacArthur proposing negotiations with the Chinese leaders—the Communist leaders—General MacArthur instead of answering that wire himself personally in the field went ahead and made his proposal.

Mr. COOKE. Gentleman, I'm afraid we will have to stop going ahead here and let our audience go ahead from here with the facts and with the very strong and frankly put convictions which each of you have put in front of our audience. Thank you very much for your service and clarity and understanding of the MacArthur controversy and our foreign policy.

ANNOUNCER. That was Dwight Cooke, concluding today's People's Platform discussion of General MacArthur and the Korean crisis.

Mr. Cooke's guests were—United States Senator WILLIAM BENTON, Democrat, of Connecticut, and United States Senator HARRY P. CAIN, of Washington.

Appeasement in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. ALLEN FREAR, JR.
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No Appeaser, No Firebrand," published in the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening of April 23, 1951, discussing appeasement in Korea.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO APPEASER, NO FIREBRAND

"Appeasement" is a word that is being thrown around carelessly these days. (Its original meaning has been lost since Neville Chamberlain used it at Munich, and we use it here in its new sense—making dishonorable concessions to an aggressor instead of fighting him.) It is nonsense to speak of appeasement in Korea, where America is fighting a war that has already cost 60,000 casualties; but some congressional critics charge that killing Communists without bombing Manchuria or signing a demand note for the politically and militarily bankrupt Chinese Nationalists is appeasement.

These same critics say—or imply—that to end the fighting in Korea on the basis of the status quo by mutual agreement would be appeasement. Others suggest that any and all efforts to avoid world war III without fighting are appeasement. They simply don't know the meaning of the word.

Nobody calls Winston Churchill an appeaser, and they hadn't better, within his hearing. His long, stern opposition to Communist totalitarianism is well known. It was he who shocked so many Americans in his prophetic Fulton, Mo., speech of March 1946. But since then he has written, in the Gathering Storm:

"Those who are prone by temperament and character to seek sharp and clear-cut solutions of difficult and obscure problems, who are ready to fight whenever some challenge comes from a foreign power, have not always been right. On the other hand, those whose inclination is to bow their heads, to seek patiently and faithfully for peaceful compromise, are not always wrong. On the contrary, in the majority of instances they may be right, not only morally but from a practical standpoint. How many wars have been averted by patience and persisting good will. Religion and virtue alike lend their sanctions to meekness and humility, not only between men but between nations. How many wars have been precipitated by firebrands."

Sentiments like these are now called "appeasement" in some quarters. They are nothing of the kind. They are, as Churchill says, one horn of the "tormenting dilemma" that national leaders must face in times of great crisis.

United States Financial Assistance to Foreign Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Come One, Come All," published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat on December 5, 1949.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COME ONE, COME ALL

Uncle Sam's Export-Import Bank has announced a loan of $21,000,000 will be made to Afghanistan for a dam development. A bank spokesman consider this might be called a point-4 project, which will increase food production. He added it would help the country improve its international financial position. That makes sense. The sum of $21,000,000 should improve anyone's finances.

We are also about to bolster the finances of Iran and India, from all accounts. Afghanistan is right in between. If we are all out for a chain of protective friendship clear across Europe, why chance a weak link for a paltry few millions?

Washington, the hand-out mecca, seems to be the world's sole contender for honors at the top of the hit-the-jack-pot parade. The stream of friendly dollar fanciers mills through the Capital like a stampede. It started with a sound desire to aid such war-battered allies as Britain and France. Now it is blossoming into a procession of devout adherents of western democracy, willing to have their national treasuries sugared in the anti-Communist campaign. They like the currency of American woo.

France, Britain, and Belgium, as might be expected, have not gone away empty handed. There have been emissaries from Italy, Brazil, other South American states; from India, Greece, Iran, even Tibet. We may confidently expect the trek to include Germany, Spain, Portugal, Turkey. So far we have not heard from Lapland or Tanganyika territory. But there is still time.

Some of the diplomatic visitors frankly say they intend to remain neutral in the cold war, pledging troth neither to Russia nor the west. They suggest loans while carrying water on both shoulders. And Uncle Sam holds the bag with both hands. Ah, well, the Croesus fixation was never niggardly or too acute.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, as dramatic evidence of the necessity to always maintain the integrity of the constitutional principle of the control of the military forces by the civilian authority of our Government, I ask that a paragraph appearing in the Annual Report of Chief of Staff Douglas MacArthur for the fiscal year 1932 be reprinted here, and I earnestly invite the attention of every American to this pertinent report on the national strategy of any war.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The national strategy of any war—that is, the selection of national objectives and the determination of the general means and methods to be applied in attaining them, as well as the development of the broad policies applicable to the prosecution of war—are decisions that must be made by the head of the State, acting in conformity with the expressed will of the Congress. No single departmental head, no matter what his particular function or title, could or should be responsible for the formulation of such decisions. For example, in every war the United States has waged, the national objective to be attained has involved the Army in land attacks against areas held by the enemy. In every instance missions have been prescribed for the Navy that had in view the assisting and facilitating of the Army's efforts. Yet in no case could these missions and objectives have been properly prescribed by the Secretaries of War and Navy acting in unison or by a single supersecretary acting for both. The issues involved were so far-reaching in their effects, and so vital to the life of the Nation, that this phase of coordinating Army and Navy effort could not be delegated by the Commander in Chief to any subordinate authority. Any such attempt would not constitute delegation, but rather abdication.

Mr. KERR. Next, Mr. President, I wish to include a statement released by me to the press on Thursday, April 19, 1951, outlining the reasons for my stand on the MacArthur controversy.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 19.—In the MacArthur controversy, we are confronted with two basic questions:

Do the American people want to risk an all-out war now, or do they want to combat aggression only and continue to push for peace? Do the American people want to preserve their constitutional democracy, or submit to military dictatorship?

For me, as a Senator and a citizen, a veteran of World War I, the obvious answers can point to only one general course, but it was my deep concern for the immediate safety and welfare of Oklahoma's 45th Division which directly led to my first outspoken opposition to the MacArthur policies.

General MacArthur has made it plain, in defiance of our Government and all our allies, that he wants to risk all-out war against Red China which has a binding mutual aid pact with Russia. Without question, this could plunge our Nation into a terrible tragic world war III in distant Asia, and even worse, it could thus expose our own cities to atomic bombs.

I could not stand by in silence. That is why I stepped out in front on the criticism of General MacArthur.

Many people have inquired as to the background for my action. I will say this:

I had no advance indication concerning the dramatic order which came so soon thereafter from the White House. Neither was there any suggestion from any source in the administration that I speak out.

I made my own decision based on what I believed to be the best interests and the real desires of my own constituents and the rest of my country.

I know that the people of Oklahoma do not want a tragic and futile war in Red China. We know it would swallow up the 45th Division and cost many, many more precious American lives than are being lost in Korea.

The assignment of the 45th Division to Japan has brought the far eastern theater very close to home and given us all added concern for what is happening out there. I have received many sober messages from the relatives and friends of the men in the 45th.

In line with their urgent appeals and requests, I again had obtained assurance from the Secretary of the Army that "there is still no plan to use the 45th for other than occupational purposes in Japan," but he confirmed my belief that any plan is subject to change upon the decision of the theater commander.

I was dictating the announcement to my office secretary when this reference to the theater commander aroused my fears and touched off my original critical statement.

The issue was plain: to strive to prevent more war or to provoke more war—whether we wanted to permit General MacArthur to take risks which could easily plunge our Oklahoma and other American boys into the mire and jungle of Red China, or whether we wanted to try to restrict Korean action and continue to work for a peaceful settlement if it could possibly be achieved.

During the great debate in the Senate last week, Senator KNOWLAND from California, apparently without concern about the fate of his own boys in the 40th Division or those of my State, tauntingly asked me if I wanted a sanctuary for them in Japan.

I replied: "The sons of Oklahoma and California are in the Armed Forces of America. I do not seek any special favors for Oklahoma fighting men wherever they may be; neither would I permit, if I could prevent it, their being uselessly thrown into an incinerator which would result in destroying them and helping no one else."

All of us regretted the climactic developments which necessitated the removal of General MacArthur.

In my original statement, I did not call for the immediate ouster of MacArthur. I still hoped he would respond to reason and be persuaded to accept established procedure and policy. However, despite a personal appeal from Secretary of the Army Pace, General MacArthur again defied his own Government and the combined policies of all our allies.

Naturally, the sudden removal of a public figure has its dramatic impact. General MacArthur has many personal admirers in this country. However, the welfare of our country is bigger than any one man, and this is not a decision to be made on the basis of personalities.

America stands at the crossroads. This is a grave hour in the history of our country. We are in a life-and-death struggle with the godless forces of communism.

The action of the President is restoring unity among the United Nations. It has achieved unity in our Armed Forces in the Far East. Our country needs unity today as much as at any time in her history, and I believe that we can, must, and will find it.

We must face up to the issues that confront us. I think the Congress should engage in a full and free debate, and then, in the democratic way, we should make a decision, close ranks, and forge full speed ahead.

If MacArthur's supporters in Congress want to follow his policies, let them introduce specific legislation. He has urged our bombing of Manchurian bases. He has called for sufficient additional forces to take the troops of Chiang Kai-shek onto the mainland of China.

If their outcry for MacArthur is sincere, let his champions stand up and be counted. Let them support a resolution carrying out General MacArthur's two major proposals which would amount to a declaration of war on China.

At this writing, they have shown no inclination to take any such positive action. They know that the American people do not want an all-out war with Red China. They know that the American people do not want to set off an atomic war with Russia.

The American people want to avoid world war III, either with China or Russia or both, if it is humanly and honorably possible to do so—and I hope and pray that it is.

Mr. KERR. Following that statement, I wish to insert in the RECORD a statement issued by the senior Senator from Oklahoma concerning his reaction to the remarks of General MacArthur before a joint meeting of the Congress on April 19, 1951.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I listened earnestly and carefully to General MacArthur's speech. I looked for unity. I didn't find it. I watched for an acknowledgment of the necessity to maintain the integrity of civilian control of the military power. It was not there. I searched for language that would give hope of a limited conflict and a purpose to prevent the spread into world-wide conflagration. He did not provide it.

I listened for words which would promote cooperation between this Nation and our allies for collective security. Those words were not spoken. I expected him who had been in command of the United Nations forces to acknowledge and report on his stewardship and tell how to strengthen the common front. He did not even mention the United Nations or a single ally.

I hoped he would show the way to promote peace and prevent more or larger war. He was not looking in that direction.

Instead, if I understood him, he sounded a call for an expanded war, a second front for sure, and a third front, if it came. The general spoke sadly, but I was much sadder because I was convinced that his plan would not lead us upward to the goal of peace, but would hurl us downward to the awful road of total war.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, as the result of the position taken by me on this issue, I received many communications from the people of Oklahoma expressing their reaction to the President's action in the case. I wish now to have inserted at this point another release by me, dated April 26, 1951, referring to this public opinion and expression.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 26.—Most of the MacArthur mail, at first, was in favor of the General, but the pro's and con's have been approaching a balance pretty fast. I firmly believe that the weight of public opinion soon will swing against the general's militant policies.

I have always known that "the folks" are just as good as "the people." Together, they have more sense than most anybody and when they think something through, they come up about 9 times out of 10 with the right answer.

I didn't get into the MacArthur fracas to win any popularity contest. I knew it would be hotter than a depot stove, and that it would get more so all the time. However, I figured somebody had to try to stop the flames of war from being spread even if he got a little singed in doing it.

I may wake up dead, but I know I'm right. So, anyway you look at it, that makes me "dead right." (And, I would a lot rather be dead right, than dead wrong.)

I know, the quicker the folks understand that MacArthur's policies would result in a second and far more terrible war in Asia, and an almost certain total war with Russia, the happier they will be that he was relieved of his command in time. Everybody knows the Chinese Reds may force a bigger war on us. If they do, we will meet them and beat them, but we will never be guilty of starting it, nor lacking in an all-out effort to prevent it, if possible.

A burst of mail in the last few days from Oklahoma folks confirms my expectations as to ultimate reaction, and it shows that the people of Oklahoma already are coming to grips with the vital issues. They are reasoning out their opposition to military dictatorship and the MacArthur program to expand the war.

These varied letters and telegrams represent all walks of life and almost every community in the State. But they follow the same general pattern of thought, assuring me that when emotions cool and feeling settles, the people will see the MacArthur policies for what they really are.

In my stand against these policies, I am most grateful to my friends for their confidence and good wishes. I will be eternally grateful to them for giving me so much comfort when the going was tough.

New York Times editorial of April 20, conclusion, keynotes my own position: "General MacArthur, himself, agrees that his proposals are based on two assumptions—namely, that the actions he advocates will crush Communist China, and that Soviet Russia will not necessarily join in the war. But, the general, himself, seems to have doubts about the latter all-important point. And if his assumptions should prove wrong, as they did in the case of Communist China, the actions he advocates could not only lead to the catastrophe of a new world war, they would also put the onus for that war upon us, even in the eyes of our friends. That would mean the destruction of the United Nations and the North Atlantic alliance, which would leave us to fight the war alone. That risk must be avoided, even at the cost of prolonging the war in Korea."

Mr. KERR. Finally, Mr. President, I should like to have printed an editorial from the Frederick (Okla.) Leader, captioned "The stand of Senator KERR."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STAND OF SENATOR KERR

The tirade loosed upon Senator ROBERT S. KERR by the Daily Oklahoman—a publication whose commitment to the old guard Republican Party has long been a matter of common knowledge—has so carefully obscured the real facts that some people are being grossly misled as to KERR's purposes.

Words flow easily from the pens of those who would mislead, and the beauty of adjectives can easily be used to distort.

Senator KERR, with full realization of gravity of the world situation, has fought selective service from one end of Washington to the other from the time Oklahoma's Forty-fifth Division Thunderbirds were federalized into active duty—seeking to get credit for the men so inducted against Oklahoma's draft quota. He seeks this in fairness and equity to prevent a double drain on Oklahoma's own, and his position deserves the praise and commendation of every Sooner citizen. Senator Bob's fight has been so strong, and so sustained in its effort, that he is about to win a victory on the basis of simple mathematical calculations to which selective service officials can find no further defensive answer. He has had assistance from Senator MIKE MONRONEY and others of the Oklahoma delegation.

Senator KERR, with a broad and first-hand knowledge of all the facts of international turmoil, finds Oklahoma's own Forty-fifth Division at sea, bound for the Far East, even before its divisional training was completed and before all its unit complements were properly filled. And this situation arose at a time when General of the Army Douglas MacArthur was increasing daily the tempo and tone of his one-man demand that the United States enter immediately on an aggressive pattern against continental China, more glibly described as preventive warfare.

Because of the size of the Forty-fifth and the naturally patriotic fervor of our citizens, no State in the Union has more at stake on a per capita basis in the present conflict in Korea than has Oklahoma. We have given our Thunderbird Division, and the flower of its manhood, and at the same time have met the full draft quota specified. We were already near top of the list on volunteers and reservists called.

Senator KERR has no objection, if it is the will of Congress, the State Department, the Secretary for Defense, Chiefs of Staff, and the people of the United States, to plunge this Nation into the first phases of a so-called preventive war against the Chinese mainland. Such a decision would be based upon unity of action by all our civilian and service people, upon proper preparation of the Military Establishment, and upon a squaring of the manpower situation to the end that those States with mustered National Guard units will not be asked to bear the brunt of an international engagement that could grow into great magnitude.

But Senator KERR does object—and strenuously—to such action being taken solely on the willful desire of one military leader, even if that person happens to be a man of the high caliber and distinguished ability of General MacArthur.

And regardless of the pressure to the contrary, the Nation will continue to hear his objections until more conclusive action is taken to achieve a balancing of contributions by States of manpower exposed to the dangers of conflict in the Far East.

When it dawns upon the people that Senator KERR's aim is cautious service to the people of Oklahoma, who he represents, and to the Nation as a whole, at a time when every step it takes must be morally right and physically possible, the caustic criticism now being heaped upon him in some quarters will sear the fingers of those who write for purpose instead of principle, for demagogery instead of democracy and for profits instead of peace.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The 'Firing' of General MacArthur," published in the Allentown (Pa.) Evening Chronicle of April 10, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE WAKE OF THE NEWS—THE "FIRING" OF GENERAL MACARTHUR

The one thing Mr. Truman and his administration cannot stand is the truth.

He has not been able to stand it in connection with the sorry state of our Military Establishment at the outbreak of the Korean War, despite the expenditure of more than $50,000,000,000 the taxpayers thought were being used for defense purposes.

Facts revealed by a Senate committee in connection with the shameful operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have made the White House and its close associates squirm uncomfortably.

Disclosures of the Kefauver crime investigating committee have reflected the worst kind of discredit on Truman appointees and Truman supporters.

The conviction of Alger Hiss, despite Truman calling the charges against him a "red herring" and Dean Acheson's protestations of friendship were but one of many instances in which the administration has tried to impede the truth in exposure of Communists who have infiltrated into the Government.

And, finally, we now have the summary dismissal of General MacArthur, one of the great soldier statesmen in American history, because he also chose to tell what he believed to be the truth to the embarrassment of Mr. Truman and our weak-kneed allies and the Communist-coddling State Department.

General MacArthur's only offense, as we see it was to speak out when the rules say a soldier must only do and die, but not talk. We think he did it in the best interests of his country and that he has been fully aware of the possible consequences. Soldier that he is, he refused to take the easy way out by keeping quiet.

Let us remember always that it was not General MacArthur, but Mr. Truman and the State Department who created the Korean situation in the first place by splitting the little country with Russia and then letting the Republic of South Korea shift for itself with only token assistance, while the Soviets were training a massive army across the border for many months.

Let us remember, too that it was Mr. Truman and the State Department and General Marshall who, by their insistence on admission of Communists into the Chinese Government and then their repudiation of Chiang Kai-shek, made it possible for the Reds to conquer all China.

And let us remember that General MacArthur has been right over the years while his superiors have been so wrong. While the Communists have been overrunning Europe and China, he has made his occupation of Japan an example for all time. He alone has refused to coddle Moscow and for that reason the island empire today constitutes one of our important bastions of defense.

What, then, has been his great offense? Simply to say that he thinks he is fighting a war without an objective so long as the United Nations refuses to permit him to bomb Communist concentrations in Manchuria; because he has advocated use of Nationalist Chinese troops on Formosa to create a diversionary attack against the Chinese mainland, just as the Russians are using their Chinese allies to tie down hundreds of thousands of American boys, and because he has expressed the opinion that the war against Communism must be won on the continent of Asia if it is to be won at all.

Who has he offended? Well, he has offended Messrs. Truman and Acheson and General Marshall who want to concentrate our strength in Europe. He has offended our vascillating allies in the United Nations who are perfectly willing to see American boys die in the mud of Korea without lifting any effective hand of their own to help. He has offended Great Britain whose Socialist government Mr. Truman has been keeping in business with American dollars because Britain wants to remain friendly with Communist China so that she can do business as usual with a people who are killing Americans every hour of the day and night.

And so a great soldier and a great American has been "fired" with about as much tact and diplomacy as would ordinarily be used in getting rid of an office boy who broke the rules once too often; "fired" with only a scant word of praise of one of the outstanding public careers in our history.

But, strangely enough, the outrageous incident has the effect of raising MacArthur's stature and diminishing that of his so-called superiors.

Perhaps he can now return to this country and speak his mind as a free citizen. That should be his right and the American people are entitled to know what he knows and thinks.

Meanwhile it will be a long time before this disgrace of this day is forgotten.

Waste in the Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I herewith submit a letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs showing an average of over 300 employees at two hospitals for nearly 6 months with no doctors and no patients. This waste is why there is not money to properly care for the veterans.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
San Francisco, Calif., April 21, 1951.

Hon. JOHN TABER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TABER: This will acknowledge your letter of April 5, 1951 concerning the new Veterans Administration Hospitals located at Beckley and Clarksburg, W. Va.

The Beckley Hospital was accepted from the contractors on October 6, 1950, and the Clarksburg Hospital was accepted on October 24, 1950. Since the date of acceptance of these two hospitals the following employees have been on duty month by month as follows:

	Beckley	Clarksburg
Oct. 31, 1950	71	54
Nov. 30, 1950	144	113
Dec. 31, 1950	162	134
Jan. 31, 1951	160	144
Feb. 28, 1951	163	176
Mar. 31, 1951	181	195

The hospital at Beckley, W. Va., was opened and accepted its first patient on March 1, 1951, and the Clarksburg Hospital accepted its first patient on March 12, 1951. It was impossible to open these two hospitals earlier because of our inability to recruit the necessary professional staff.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, Jr., Administrator.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "The Palace Guards Win—Or Do They?" published in the New Castle (Pa.) News of April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PALACE GUARDS WIN—OR DO THEY?

There must be merriment in Moscow today.

And somehow we imagine we can hear a sly British chuckle coming out of Number 10 Downing Street.

While in our own State Department Acheson and his boys are marking across the record of conspiracy against MacArthur "Mission Accomplished."

For after 6 years of sniping at Gen. Douglas MacArthur they have his scalp. But his scalp dangles from the chandeliers like the sword of Damocles.

For Douglas MacArthur, America's No. 1 soldier, if not indeed it's No. 1 citizen, has been fired ignominiously, fired just like a ditch digger might be fired by a straw boss.

Fired because he gave voice to the wonderings of millions of American minds, "If we have to fight the Communist why stop at some geographic line?"

MacArthur's crime was that he believed the lives of American boys should not be poured out on foreign lands unless there was some reason in logic at the end of the trail.

He believed that if the Communists were permitted to mass and group over the North Korean border, and strike again and again at the Americans then those nests of vipers should be wiped out. He believed the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa should be turned loose to fight against the Communists for their homeland. He believed it a futile thing to keep fighting within a restricted area in Korea unless a political peace could be consummated.

And so, because MacArthur is a great American, because his soldierly heart had a great sympathy for the fate of his men, because like Billy Mitchell he told the truth, he was fired.

This war, which Truman called a police action, has 250,000 American men in the field. Our casualties are over 60,000.

Great Britain has 13,000 men in the field. Great Britain continues to sell to the Communists. Great Britain wants to hold on to Hong Kong. Britain, therefore, had a reason to undermine MacArthur, a reason rooted in its own national selfishness. Ergo, our American policy must be cut according to the British design and if Dean Acheson is to remain in good standing with the Downing Street brand of diplomacy then MacArthur has to be fired.

And he was.

Acheson engineered the deal which got us out of China. MacArthur protested against such diplomacy. The blunders of Acheson brought on the Korean war and MacArthur was called on once more to lead troops against an enemy.

Because he could not stomach such back-alley diplomacy as we have been getting, because he was outraged at the further slaughter of American boys, he spoke his mind.

Here is the soldier who carved victory out of defeat in the Pacific, who went into Japan as a conquerer and became the Japanese friend through his wise administration.

Here is a man whose record of Americanism shines with a golden glow for over 40 years. "The path of glory leads but to the grave."

As for President Truman's excuse for firing MacArthur—made last night—little can be said for it. The voice was the voice of Truman but the words were the words of Acheson.

Ship Named "O'Higgins"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article taken from the New York Times of April 22, 1951, entitled "Topics of the Times."

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

SHIP NAMED "O'HIGGINS"

Down at the Philadelphia Navy Yard a United States light cruiser, the Brooklyn, has been undergoing more than a sea change. She is 16 years old, 10,000 tons, and carries fifteen 6-inch guns. During the last war she helped with various amphibious landings in the Mediterranean. She has been a fighting ship, one for the sons of Brooklyn to be proud of.

Now she has been sold to Chile and is about to take off, staffed by a crew of Chilean sailors, for lands far from the Gowanus. She goes not as the Brooklyn but as the General O'Higgins. And let no one along Flatbush Avenue or around Borough Hall think that that name does not fit a ship once named the Brooklyn. For Bernardo O'Higgins was as fighting a man as ever Sands Street saw. He is the great Chilean national figure, the country's George Washington.

FROM COUNTY MEATH

Just how a fine broth of a boy with the old Irish name of O'Higgins could wind up as the scrappiest and best beloved man in Chilean history is something that only the sons of the Irish could explain fully. The O'Higgins story in Chile begins with Ambrose O'Higgins, from County Meath. An uncle, a Spanish priest, sent him to South America in the middle of the eighteenth century. For some years he was a trader and peddler in Buenos Aires. His Spanish, spoken with an Irish lilt, must have charmed many a customer. Later he went over the Andes to Chile. Frontier wars against the Indians were being fought and Ambrose, now Ambrosio, entered the Spanish Army. By 1788 he was Captain General of Chile.

THE BOY BERNARDO

His son, Bernardo, was born of a Chilean mother on August 20, 1776. From his father Bernardo inherited whatever it is that the sons of the Irish inherit. From his mother he got the charm that attracted everyone who met him and the compassion that he showed all whom he met. He was sent to England for his education. Radical ideas, nurtured by the French Revolution, were in the air. A young man who knew the misery of Spanish rule back home, the state-nurtured ignorance, the power and the selfishness of the privileged, could dream of a better world and of leading men toward it. The sons of the Irish have often dreamed that dream.

RETURN TO CHILE

He returned to Chile in 1802. The long-expected and long-overdue revolt against Spain broke out in 1810. In the front line of the rebels was Bernardo O'Higgins. In 1813 he took supreme command of the rebel army, but in his first attempt to beat the Spanish troops he met defeat. The sons of the Irish have often known that. He saw the Spanish rule restored, with its medieval ignorance and cruelty and disregard for any except the wealthy. In 1816 the great South American revolutionary San Martín was ready to come to the aid of Chile. O'Higgins went to Argentina to join him. They came back over the Andes in January 1817 with 3,000 infantry and 1,000 cavalry. They met the Spanish twice and beat them twice. The revolution in Chile was a reality. The Spanish were out forever and O'Higgins knew what a victory was. The sons of the Irish have sometimes known that, too.

AHEAD OF HIS TIME

Bernardo became the first director of the new state. He wrote the first constitution and aimed it right at the evils that had sickened him. He wanted land taken from the large estates and he advocated popular education. The people supported him; for the first time the nation had one of its own sons as ruler. But the forces against him, even among the Chileans, were strong and he underestimated their strength. The sons of the Irish have sometimes done that. The wealthy and the privileged were glad to be rid of Spanish rule but wanted no change in their traditional power and perquisites. Like other South American revolutionaries, O'Higgins was ahead of his time. The forces against him grew stronger and Bernardo's hopes for a decent world could not withstand them. He was forced to abdicate in 1823. Thereafter each ambitious man in the land tried to be his own political party; 10 different governments followed in quick order.

O'Higgins never again held power. He died in 1842.

AND FAIR SAILING

The General O'Higgins will sail shortly from Philadelphia. She is a fine ship. The sons of Brooklyn can wish her fair sailing. The sons of the Irish will take that for granted.

Emphasis on a Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. DURHAM
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, April 25, 1951:

EMPHASIS ON A STATESMAN

The death of Senator Arthur Vandenberg, which under normal conditions would have attracted great national attention and brought to the dead statesman the full tribute and the evaluation which he so richly deserved, came at a moment, however, when another great American held the center of the stage. The accolade was for the living rather than for the dead; an elder statesman simply faded out in the garish demonstrations.

The irony which the turn of events took must be recognized, however, in calmer and more thoughtful retrospect. Senator Vandenberg had given the final years of his public life to the initiation and development of a bipartisan foreign policy, to the cause of unity among his fellow citizens and understanding among nations, to the strengthening and undergirding of democracy and its defenders wherever they might be. To him as much as to any other man should go credit for the North Atlantic Pact and for those cooperative measures which halted communism in its westward march and breathed economic life and a fighting spirit into Europe. There is unquestioned testimony that the effort which the Michigan statesman put into this cause contributed substantially to his ill health and even chopped many years from his life. Had he submitted to the operation from which he never recovered earlier, there is strong belief that he would be alive and perhaps back in the Senate today. He was told that he should have this operation before the Paris conference, but he insisted upon attending, regardless of the consequences, and then became involved in the congressional fight over approval of the peace and security structure of which he was a chief architect. His badly needed operation was indefinitely delayed, and the ultimate result has now been written by the cold hand of Death.

It was as this man faded away last week that disunity, partisanship, bitterness, an isolationism which strangely shifted to the side of a bigger war, reached a new crescendo in the National Capital where he so long served and spread out over the Nation. Quietly he slipped from this mortal scene while the outcry was for the forces, the influences and the policies which he sought to restrain and to recast. There was dramatics in the ensuing activities; but the Vandenberg drama was enacted in the silence of the wings. The center of the stage held and overflowed with the demolition crew of that which he gave his life to construct.

In our humble opinion, however, the final tribute, the final evaluation as statesman, the final record as architect and builder of a more secure and peaceful world will accrue to the dead Senator. When sober reason returns, when Americans look beneath the surface, when parades give way to meditation and reflection, when decisions are left to the mind rather than to the emotions, and when statesmanship, pray Heaven, supersedes partisanship, the genuine stature of the late Senator from Michigan will be fully recognized, his sacrificial effort justified, and his influence and his spirit will go marching on.

A great soldier has his day; a great statesman has his eternity.

How to Fight Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, how to fight inflation and to raise money needed for the defense program are two subjects in which all of us are interested.

The Wage Earner Forum survey published by McFadden Publications, Inc., directed by Edward Smith, has just published a survey made among 1,500 wage-earner families across the United States.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD the following article bearing on these subjects from the Wage Earner Forum, which I believe carries worth-while information:

DEFINITE OPINIONS ON VITAL MATTERS

How to fight inflation, and how to raise money needed for this country's armament program, are two subjects on which the wage earner husbands and wives have definite opinions.

While better than 8 in 10 suggest a freeze on prices as one effective means of fighting inflation, more than half as many also suggest a freeze on wages. Although husbands and wives agree rather closely on a freeze on prices, considerably fewer of the wives are in favor of a freeze on wages. Restrictions on buying are recommended by more than one-fourth of the panel.

Nonessential Government expenditures can be reduced and that is the best means of raising money for our armament program, in the opinion of 8 in 10 of the wage earners and their wives. Two-thirds of them, more husbands than wives, suggest increased corporation taxes. Suggestions of a national tax on the things we buy and an increased personal income tax, as other means of raising the needed money, were checked by about one-fourth in each case.

FAVOR PRICE AND WAGE FREEZES

A freeze on wages, as a means of fighting inflation, is favored by slightly more than half of the men. Union members are more in favor of a freeze on wages (52.9 percent) than those who are not union members. About two out of five of the wives disagree with the men on this point, and it is much less favored in the far West.

There is little variation by age or region (except for the far West) on a freeze on prices, favored by over 80 percent. More of the older men approve restriction on buying. While the percentage of men who favor increased personal income tax is small, it is larger among union men.

Failure to respond to this question was as little as 2.1 for men and women combined, and 0.9 for the men alone.

Of the voluntary comments made by the men and women of the panel, roll-back of prices was most frequent, except that among the men alone a slightly greater number suggested Government restrictions and controls.

In the tabulations which follow, the opinions of wives are not shown separately, but are indicated by comparison of the combined opinions of men and women with those of men alone.

Question. Which of the following do you approve as a means of fighting inflation, or further inflation? (Check one or more, as you see fit.)

Percent of total panel—men, women combined

Freeze on wages	43.5
Freeze on prices	84.8
Restrictions on buying (enforced savings)	28.6
Increased personal income taxes (less spendable income)	3.5
Voluntary comment:
Roll back prices	2.3
Stop farm aid	.2
Government restriction, control, action (outward)	1.7
Government economy, restriction (within Government)	.6
Miscellaneous	1.0

CUT GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

While 81.2 percent of the men favor reduction of nonessential governmental expenditures as a means of raising money for armament, this is somewhat lower among the union members (78.6 percent) and consequently higher among those not members of a union. It is also lower in the Northeastern States.

Next in number checked was to increase corporation taxes; the union men are a little stronger for that (73.2 percent), but it is less favored in the far West.

It will be noted that fewer of the wives checked any of the four most frequently mentioned means for raising money, except in the case of reduction of Government expenditures.

A tax on luxuries and unessentials, and elimination of subsidies were voluntary comments most frequently made. Elimination of subsidies and reduction of aid to Europe were suggested by a total of 4.6 percent of the men.

Of the means of armament financing, the wives checked fewer of the alternatives and made fewer voluntary comments.

Question. "Which of the following ways do you approve as a means of raising the money for the Nation's armament program?" (Check as many as necessary to give your complete opinion.)

Percent of total panel—men and women combined

Increased personal income taxes	19.9
Increased corporation taxes	64.0
A national tax on the things you buy	24.7
Reduction of nonessential Government expenditures	80.2
None; don't think we should arm	1.2
Voluntary comment:
Tax on luxuries, unessentials	3.2
Cut down on Government employees	.5
Legalize lotteries	.6
Eliminate subsidies, etc	2.9
Cut down aid to Europe, etc	.7
Miscellaneous	.7

Failure to respond to the above question was 0.3 percent of the total panel for the men alone, and 0.9 percent for men and women combined.

DRAFT 18-YEAR-OLDS

The wives are somewhat less in favor of the plan to draft and train 18-year-olds, although nearly two-thirds of them are in favor of it. Among the men the strongest approval and least disapproval is in the age group of those under 30, many of whom have done their turn of duty in the recent war. Again, the far West is the one region which differs, markedly, from the country as a whole.

While slightly more than half oppose deferment of college students with special ability, this is slightly lower among the wives than the husbands, and also in the Midwest.

Percent of total panel, men, women combined

Question. Do you approve of the current plan to draft and train 18-year-olds?

Yes	67.8
No	29.6
Don't know	.5
Not reported	2.1

Percent of total panel, men, women combined

Question. Do you feel there is any justification for the plan which was proposed for deferment of college students with special ability so as to save them for training in other important fields, science, etc.?

Yes	42.8
No	53.0
Not reported	4.2

VOLUNTARY COMMENTS

Percent of total panel, men and women combined

Against deferment:
Didn't in War II, why now?
Can be trained in the Army just as well	1.8
Can resume study after service	.6
Favoring deferment:
Don't eat all the grain—save some for seed	8.8
If it isn't taken advantage of; too much chance for conniving	5.1
If student was in War II, let him finish college	.2
Difficult getting back to study after war service	.2
Other miscellaneous pro and con	5.2

STAY IN KOREA

A majority of wage earners feel that the United Nations should stay in Korea and keep fighting as long as attack and aggression continue. There are nearly as many who feel they are unable to express an opinion (19.2 percent), as of those who think we should get out now (23.2 percent).

Again, the attitudes show a difference in the far West, where more feel that we should get out of Korea. But of the panel as a whole, considerably more of the men feel that we should stay and fight than do their wives, among whom is also a larger percentage who do not feel that they have a definite opinion to express.

Question. "There seems to be two schools of thought as to whether the United Nations should stay in Korea and keep fighting so long as there is attack and aggression there; or whether they should get out, now. What say you?"

Percent of total panel, men, women combined

Should stay and fight	55.3
Should get out now	23.2
Don't know	19.2
Not reported	2.3

Old-Age Assistance in West Virginia

With all the talk about employing elderly people instead of providing for pensions, why not look at the above tables. They clearly show the hopelessness of such projects so far as most of the aged are concerned. See column No. 3.

Out of 286 new cases, 83 were due to loss of employment.

Out of 453 closed cases, only 10 resulted from employment of recipient.

Note that death accounted for nearly one-half of the closed cases, while employment accounted for less than 1 out of 45. In other words, there is only 1 chance in 22 of an old-age assistance recipient getting any job before he dies—to say nothing of earning a decent living.

General MacArthur's Address to Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the address delivered by Gen. Douglas MacArthur on Thursday, April 19, last, was the most outstanding address I have heard delivered before Congress in my many years of service in the House. Words cannot express the deep impression it made upon all who heard it. Its clarity, logic, and sincerity made for it a place among the historic speeches of our country that will not be erased by the passing of time. Never have I seen any assemblage so deeply touched, nor where the deeper emotions were so plainly visible by moistened eyes.

The newspapers of the Nation have given unstinted praise to this memorable speech. The Courier-Post, of Camden, N. J., in its issue of Friday, April 20, 1951, has given its tribute in an analytical editorial entitled "MacArthur States His Case." I include it as part of my remarks in accordance with the unanimous consent granted. It reads as follows:

MACARTHUR STATES HIS CASE

General MacArthur's great speech before Congress was a masterpiece of clearness and logical reasoning.

He spoke, as had been predicted, in general terms. He did not seek to aggravate the controversy over Asiatic policies that his removal has inflamed.

On the other hand, he did not seek to duck controversial issues. He stated what they were, he gave his views on them in a clear and lucid manner, he stressed the fact that the issues are fundamental and global, and that they cannot be avoided. We must face them.

With "but one purpose in mind—to serve my country," the general expressed the opinion that communism is unappeasable. What is more, it cannot be appeased in one place, separately from another. To appease it in Asia is indirectly—and not too indirectly—appeasing it also in Europe.

The general has faith in America and in America's strength. In his opinion, there can be no greater expression of defeatism than to say that we cannot defend ourselves on both the Asiatic and European fronts.

As to the Asiatic front, the Pacific Ocean and the chain of islands we and the other free nations now hold make it a protective moat to America as long as we provide the necessary defenses for that moat. Sea and air power, he asserts, can defend the line from Vladivostok to Singapore.

But a breach of the line at one point opens the whole line to other breaches and collapse. That is why Formosa must not fall to the Reds. The fall of Formosa would instantly threaten the Philippines and Japan, and almost immediately would threaten our own Pacific coast.

We can and should hold the Pacific moat, MacArthur believes, against the aggressive imperialism of both Soviet Russia and a China newly alive with the spirit of nationalism, a new power in Asia now temporarily allied with Russia, but perhaps only temporarily so allied and perhaps only temporarily communistic.

To hold the moat, however, we must not let down the friends who help us hold it—a regenerated Japan which will not again fail the free world; the Philippines, and Chiang's forces on Formosa.

The decision to intervene in Korea, MacArthur feels, was sound from the military standpoint. Our victory there was complete when Red China suddenly intervened. This created a new war and a new situation not contemplated previously.

It called for new diplomatic decisions which have not, right up to this moment, been made.

MacArthur denounces as libel the reports that he favored a full-scale ground invasion of Red China. No one in his right mind could advocate such a thing, he says.

He did want a stronger economic and naval blockade of China. He wanted the removal of restrictions which tied his hands behind his back in Korea. He wanted the right to make air reconnaissance of the enemy bases behind Korea; the right to make air attacks beyond the Yalu River on enemy bases, to disrupt the enemy's logistics, and to make a real military decision possible.

He wanted and still wants these things, because under present restrictions we are fighting what can never be more than an indecisive campaign, one of terrible and constant attrition, one that the enemy can draw out indefinitely even though we may be able to hold a defensible line in Korea indefinitely.

"War's very object is victory, not prolonged indecision," as MacArthur says.

"In war there is no substitute for victory."

But as we are fighting the Korean war now, he believes, like many others, there can be no victory.

The general says that criticism of his views comes largely from lay circles abroad.

He says that our own Joint Chiefs of Staff concur—at least largely—in his views. He is convinced that from the military standpoint they are right, and that if we now pursue a course of appeasement toward Red China it will only fail as appeasement has always failed.

He does not believe that the measures he proposes would backfire against us. Red China, he asserts, is already engaging its maximum power in Korea. He implies that our fear of "extending the war" if we follow his proposals is, in reality, a fear of winning it, ridiculous as that may sound.

And while we allow our fears to rule our actions, we are betraying the very people we took up arms to save—the Koreans who, alone of all the nations engaged in the war, are giving everything they have to preserve their own liberty and the cause of liberty throughout the world; who are risking and suffering death rather than enslavement.

They deserve better of us than that.

MacArthur has stated his case.

The decisions are up to others.

He retires from the stage after 52 years of service to his country with a prayer on his lips that mankind may soon find a better and more equitable system of settling its quarrels than war, whose increasing destructiveness to friend and foe alike has rendered it useless as a solution to them, if it ever was.

But till such a system is devised there will be wars.

And "war's very object is victory."

Have we lost sight of that object in Korea?

Will we realize that defeat, stalemate, or appeasement in Korea mean global defeat, stalemate, or appeasement?

Now holding a western frontier in the far Pacific, are we willing to surrender it; to withdraw to a frontier in California and the rest of our continent's western coast?

These are questions of the greatest importance and magnitude.

MacArthur has shown us what he thinks are the answers.

With a speech that is one of the most powerful and compelling of modern times, he probably has convinced many who were not previously aware of the facts and did not agree with him.

The opposition will offer its rebuttal.

It had better be good.

A Humiliating Spectacle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BROWNSON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted unanimously on Monday, April 16, by the Service Club of Indianapolis, an organization of 253 members, all of whom are veterans of either World War I or World War II, and sent to me by Frank K. Levinson, president, the Service Club of Indianapolis:

A HUMILIATING SPECTACLE

"And in every province, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, there was great mourning among the people, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing; and many lay in sackcloth and ashes."

We would speak of General MacArthur. His head is turning silver with age, and long experience has made him sage. But that did not save him from the arrows of men who strut in pride and vaunt their empty claims. One who but for accident would today be a nameless man amidst the crowd, has allowed his perverse and stubborn will to cause him to strike at one of the greatest military leaders of all time.

Why are we in Korea? Our President told us we were there to preserve our own freedom by thwarting the advance of communism in the free world; and to prove to evil, willful men that aggressive war does not pay. MacArthur was told to lead. Fearlessly he organized his campaign, and began boldly to resist the powers of evil. To him the office and duties of a general were to bring victory to his arms and to preserve his men from needless slaughter and suffering.

Then confusion in our Nation's councils began to show itself. MacArthur was told to fight Communists but only up to an imaginary line. Beyond that line the Reds of China and the Kremlin were to be allowed to gather their strength and from these bases, in a privileged sanctuary, to move out to slaughter our soldiers and then return in safety to those bases for relaxation.

We had an air force that could in any period of 24 hours destroy those bases and choke off all supplies to our enemy then reaching them from Red China. One of our allies on Formosa had 500,000 excellently trained soldiers who were anxious to relieve the pressure on our own fighting men. Another ally had 100,000 men in addition to the great number it already had in the field, who were ready to fight with us if we would but equip them. Our Navy could have blockaded the ports of China and North Korea at any time and thus brought the "agrarian philosophers" of that area promptly to their knees. But these things must not be. Greedy men in Britain, where hope of gain allures, would save Hongkong and continue to deliver for a great profit war materials to our Red enemies. The Kremlin might be irritated; as if he who is bent on doing evil will ever be unable to find his own occasion for doing it.

These considerations were of the most vital military importance. MacArthur discussed them publicly. He had been expressly told he had a right to discuss all military matters which concerned the war he had been told to wage, and that he might discuss them publicly. He would have been negligent had he not attempted to arouse the nations he was supposed to be leading to the dangers involved in such an excess of stupidity.

But he is now returning to us straight from a faithful, unselfish, patient fight and the love and gratitude of a whole Nation go out to him; while men of low degree smugly smile and proudly cling to their faults and wither in their pride. If our forces are not in the Orient to conquer our enemies; if we are now to approve the aggressions of the "agrarian reformers" of Red China and the Kremlin, and allow them to retain all their material gains in China and Korea, let us in the name of God bring our soldiers home at the earliest possible moment consistent with their safety. Then, possibly, at some distant time the Kremlin will allow us to return long enough to care for the graves of our sons who have fallen there, so that future generations may know that they have not been entirely forgotten but that we do honor them who offered up their lives at their Nation's call to suffer needless, useless slaughter.

Mr. President, I move that this declaration be adopted by the Service Club of Indianapolis and that copies be sent to our two Senators, to our Congressman, and to the daily papers of Indianapolis.

WILLIAM P. EVANS.

Mr. Acheson Said Chinese Communists Would Not Enter Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the White House has alleged that Mr. Truman was misled by General MacArthur's statement at Wake Island that the Chinese Communists would not enter the Korean war. It is implied that the President believed this statement to his great regret. In a cablegram to the editors of the Freeman magazine General MacArthur was asked to confirm or deny the statement that he had so advised the President. The reply was as follows:

The statement quoted in your message of the 13th is entirely without foundation in fact.

MACARTHUR,
Tokyo, Japan.

Mr. Speaker, it seems, however, that the President was getting the kind of information he charges to MacArthur from the very man who has sabotaged the United States in Asia, Dean Acheson, Secretary of State. Members of this House will be interested in a news story that appeared in the New York Times on September 11, 1950, and which relates to the matter under discussion. At this point I am including part of that article. Once again the man who refused to turn his back on Alger Hiss was wrong:

ACHESON DOUBTS PEIPING WAR ENTRY—HOLDS MOVE IN KOREA WOULD BE MADNESS—ASSERTS MODERN WEAPONS WILL BEAT HORDES

(By Jay Walz)

WASHINGTON, September 10.—Secretary of State Acheson declared in a television broadcast tonight that numbers do not necessarily mean strength and offered "modern weapons and ingenuity" as opposition to "all sorts of hordes." He was alluding to hordes of Communist forces.

He also said it would be "sheer madness" for the Chinese Communist Government to enter the Korean war on the side opposing the "free nations of the world."

"The greater part of China to the north, which is made up of Sinkiang, Outer Mongolia, and Manchuria, is Chinese at the present moment only nominally," Mr. Acheson said. "That is where the great cloud from the north, Russian penetration, is operating and it is quite obvious that the plan is to absorb those northern areas of China under Soviet domination.

OWN DISMEMBERMENT

"I give the people in Peiping credit for being intelligent enough to see what is happening to them. Why they should want to further their own dismemberment and destruction by getting at cross purposes with all the free nations of the world who are inherently their friends and have always been friends of the Chinese as against this imperialism coming down from the Soviet Union I cannot see.

"And since there is nothing in it for them, I don't see why they should yield to what is undoubtedly pressures from the Communist movement to get into this Korean row."

The MacArthur Removal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Frankford (Pa.) Gazette of April 19, 1951:

A LETTER FROM YOUR CONGRESSMAN, WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR., OF PENNSYLVANIA

If there is anything the MacArthur removal proves all over again, it is that professional military men should confine their ambitions to the armed services. Unbiased historians will agree that Grant was one of the top United States generals in the field and a sorry spectacle as President of the United States. Professional military men for generations have taken a lesson from this. Black Jack Pershing could have had the Presidential nomination on a silver platter but he was almost rude to people who urged it.

A colorful and ofttimes brilliant military figure of high personal courage, MacArthur has much more than his share of the ham actor and exhibitionist about him. It is this very yen to sing tenor on all possible occasions that creates the compulsion to forever seek the Presidency. It impelled him to produce one of the most pathetic pictures of our time. The scene was the Republican national convention in our city on a stifling hot early morning in July 1948. Almost alone in the all but empty hall, emaciated loyal General Wainwright, hero of Bataan, was given this poor opportunity to place MacArthur's name in nomination. What makes his thirst for office particularly unfortunate is that MacArthur is probably the most disliked member of the brass among the rank and file, in our time. It is extremely unlikely that he could be elected to any national office in spite of the appreciation many of our people feel for some of his accomplishments.

It has been said that he has earned the right to disobey orders or to take violent conflict with them. Funny, he so agreeably followed the Hoover order to gas-bomb the Bonus Army out of Anacostia flats. This was made up of his buddies from World War I and their wives and kids. So MacArthur has had a mixed career which includes military brilliance, ever so much personal courage, a lot of play acting and some very sad decisions. It is ironic that a soldier who once served under him (and did not derive happiness from the connection) could have the very nomination that MacArthur craves. I refer to Dwight Eisenhower. It is unfortunate that some men do not quit their careers at the right time. All of us would have been gladdened if MacArthur had terminated his services before issuing that promise to have the boys back from Korea by Christmas. Too bad a once great pitcher has to be relieved. Good that the defense team has such a fine relief man.

Cordially yours,
WILLIAM J. GREEN, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

Where Does Dean Acheson Stand?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT P. MORANO

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am inserting an editorial which appeared in the Bridgeport Post on April 24, 1951, reflecting a question being asked, I believe, by an overwhelming majority of the American people:

WHERE DOES ACHESON STAND?

Dean Acheson has reached such a degree of disfavor with the people, one cannot help wonder why it is that President Truman continues to back him up on major issues, as he does.

No matter what the Secretary of State does today, the people will still mistrust him. Almost everyone you talk with expresses strong opposition to him.

The repercussions of the MacArthur dismissal may, of course, make it even more difficult for Mr. Truman to retain him, for if ever there was a voice of opinion expressed in the Nation, it was done in the MacArthur case. And somehow or other, people are of the opinion that Acheson had a big hand in the summary dismissal of MacArthur, even though Mr. Truman would have us believe it was all his own idea.

Congressmen of both parties, from many States, are asking each other about Acheson. If MacArthur was a liability in our foreign policy, and was fired because of his proposals, how about Acheson? Many newspapers throughout the country which approved of the President's ouster of MacArthur, at the same time have urged the Executive to get a new Secretary of State. It sounds more than reasonable to us.

Mr. Acheson has been Secretary of State for a little more than 2 years. It is not a long time, and he has done nothing in that period to distinguish himself to such an extent that he should be retained.

Mr. Truman has set a record in making Cabinet changes, considering the length of respective administrations. Mr. Roosevelt made an average of 1.2 changes per year; Hoover made 0.8; Coolidge, 1.4; and back in the day of "Teddy" Roosevelt, the changes per year were 2.3. Changes under President Truman have been on the average of 3.2 per year. So, he would be right in form if he asked Mr. Acheson to return to his law books.

During the Acheson term we went to war in Korea, but that also is said to have been a Truman decision solely. As for opposition to Red China in the UN, Acheson has said that the United States would not try to use its veto power to bar such an admission. Acheson cannot take any credit for the Atlantic Pact, even though it was ratified while he was Secretary. The credit for that goes to the late distinguished Senator Vandenberg. It was proposed by Mr. Truman before Acheson was sworn in.

Many of his predecessors have been strong men, and distinctive policies still bear their names, such as Hay's "Open Door"; Knox's "Dollar Diplomacy"; Lansing's Japanese agreement; Hughes' naval limitation; Kellogg's treaty renouncing war; and, of course, the Marshall plan, developed by General Marshall.

Try to think of one great policy enunciated and perfected by Dean Acheson. Yes, there was one, when he said he would not turn his back on Alger Hiss. That was enunciated, but not perfected in the manner which he expected. It is indeed time for Mr. Truman to add to his box score by naming a broad-minded, vigorous, clear-thinking, unselfish, wholly American Secretary of State.

Positive Catholic Action in the Life of the High School Student

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include in the RECORD an address given by Mary Anne Green, of St. Paul's Academy, Washington, D. C., in the twentieth annual oratorical contest sponsored by the Catholic University Conference of Clerics and Religious held at the Catholic University Gymnasium on April 15:

POSITIVE CATHOLIC ACTION IN THE LIFE OF THE HIGH SCHOOL STUDENT

(By Mary Anne Green, St. Paul's Academy, Washington, D. C.)

We as students of the Catholic Mission Crusade are faced this afternoon with a problem. In fact, the primary purpose for our assembly here is to determine who can best convince the average high-school student that he can change the world in which he is living through a positive, through a determining, and through a practical Catholic action.

If the world in which we live is in need of change, then something must be at fault with the conditions under which we live.

If the Catholic high-school student is being called upon to change this world through positive Catholic action, then he must be aware of the need for change. But even more, if the Catholic high-school student must do this job himself, he must not only be aware of the need for change, but he must also have an absolute, a living conviction that he must roll up his sleeves and get to work.

To this end, I conducted a poll, became an inquiring photographer, so to speak, and I asked 100 teenagers the following questions:

1. Are you satisfied with the conditions of the teen-age world in which you live?

2. Do you think that Catholic youth in general are outstanding in their efforts to influence toward good?

3. Do you actually believe that you are doing your part, or do you think you are indifferent?

4. Of the following obvious faults of modern youth, which do you think is the root of the greatest evil: Greed for money, love of ease and pleasure, disregard for authority, or laxity of morals in company-keeping?

The resuls were enlightening, assuring us that if Catholic youth must do this task of changing the world, he does have an absolute conviction that his world needs change. Only 16 percent were satisfied, proving that Catholic youth does realize the necessity for positive Catholic action. Now the percentage of those who considered Catholic students outstanding in their efforts to do good was greater, 30 percent, but 60 percent believed themselves to be indifferent on this score. Disregard for authority was considered by far the root of the greatest evil with 47 percent; love of ease and pleasure taking second place with 30 percent. Think of it. Sixty-seven percent admitted that they did not say the daily rosary, and 30 percent never made the first Saturdays for peace.

Further, I asked these same youths, whom I questioned at basketball games, at St. Martin's Sunday night dances, at the drug store, and even at a girls' slumber party: "What do you suggest that we can do?" And it was here that the virile quality that makes youth so attractive to those of every age came forth. Straightforwardly, courageously, recklessly (for they indicted themselves), the answers poured from the recreation rooms, from the Boys' Club rooms, down the bowling alleys, across the dance halls, and even from our living rooms like this:

Catholic youth does not pray enough. Catholic teen-agers do not frequent the sacraments enough. Catholic teen-agers could do better jobs of being missionaries in their own homes. Catholic teen-agers follow rather than lead. Catholic teen-agers are apologetic for their faith, instead of being proud, puffed up, that they are signed and sealed as the children whose father is a God, and whose birthright is not transient, but eternal happiness.

Catholic youth does not pray enough. His life is unbalanced. Finding time only for the so-called good times, his prayer life slips woefully into the background. There are many teen-agers here who fill every spare moment of the day with the latest disks, who cannot think, unless they have their favorite station turned on, drooling out the latest blues or be-bop. If only we could not think without tuning in with a short prayer, dedicating our actions to God, instead of to self. How often a day do your thoughts turn to God? Or are you one of the more than 50 percent of Catholic students who admit that they say no prayers but night prayers, unless they are said in school?

Catholic teen-agers do not frequent the sacraments enough. Just as the physical side of man cannot subsist without food, neither can his spiritual nature go without spiritual food. Are you one of the 47 percent who confess that they substitute the good times of Saturday nights for the reception of holy communion on Sunday mornings? Would you dare to start this Saturday night, and drop the A-bomb in your crowd? No Hot Shoppes for us, boys, we're going to communion tomorrow.

Catholic teen-agers could do better jobs of being missionaries in their own homes. Persuade a wayward member to make a mission, and make it with him. Remind the lukewarm of approaching fast days, and no meat sandwiches, yourself. Shock them all, when you ask naively, "Well, who's going to daily mass with me during May?" Sometimes at a meal, a comment like this sets others thinking. "You know what I learned in school today, Pop, that I never knew before? Our capacity for happiness in heaven depends upon the supernatural life we live on earth, and that is determined by the graces we receive through prayer and the sacraments. You know, Pop, for me, that's a greater incentive to pray more."

Catholic teen-agers follow rather than lead. What a tragedy that this is so. Will you say "No," when your date suggests an objectionable movie? Will you refuse to listen to a conversation that is ruining another's good name? Or will you like a weak straw blown hither and thither in the wind, follow the crowd? If one-fifth of the United States is Catholic, out of every five leaders, is one a Catholic? Why not? How many potential leaders should there not be among our ranks—but where are they? Step up, Catholic youth, before it is too late. Take up the standard of catholicism. Cherish it, protect it. But above all, accept the challenge that rings from pole to pole. Be not hearers of the word, Catholic youth, but doers, also.

Time for the President to Recognize MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I insert an editorial which appeared in the Bridgeport Post on April 23, 1951, containing a clear-headed and thoughtful analysis of the conflict between President Truman and Gen. Douglas MacArthur:

TIME FOR ACTION COMING

Now that his magnificent New York reception is over and General MacArthur is resting, it is about time for the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the secretaries and congressional leaders to get down to the business of deciding once and for all where we are going with the Korean war. They've had plenty of time for resting, up to now at least.

The outpouring of affection for the general has come spontaneously from the hearts of the American people. The tribute was one due a great man, a hero in every sense of the word. Eventually the cheers of the greatest throng in history will subside, and the political and military leaders of the Nation will have to be concerned with the practical aspects of the MacArthur proposals.

The general didn't make his historic address for glory or for fun. It was one of the most serious patriotic statements ever made by any man, and what he said must be so considered by Mr. Truman and all those who give him advice on policy matters.

If this group delays and fiddles, there will be another roar from the public demanding action. The Korean war, the Asian problem, the strategy to be applied in the war on communism, must be discussed and the answers given frankly and promptly to the American people. General MacArthur must not be excluded from those conferences because of the petty opposition of small and stubborn men.

MacArthur has at least given to the American people through his talk to Congress an aggressive positive program. For nearly a year President Truman's program has been negative and drifting, lacking any earmark of strong leadership.

It is impossible at the moment for any individual to say definitely who is right and who is wrong in the conflict of opinion between the man in the White House and the commander who passed the last 14 years in the field.

But it is possible to develop the right policy for us and the free world if the politicians and the military men will sit down together with the general and work long and hard until they can formulate a definite plan and agree to pursue it to the end. There is no sense in delaying any longer, until they become stalemated and bitter. Action for the good of the country is what the people want.

The next move, as we see it, is up to President Truman. Dinners and parties ought to be canceled, random speeches, sniping, and loose talk should be banned by Executive order, and nothing should be allowed to interfere with an honest, full-time endeavor to get this critical problem settled.

Has he the courage and the good sense to make such a strong move? Or maybe he didn't hear the people's demand for action which accompanied their cheers for the great general. We shall see.

Real Statesmanship Can Repair Blunders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest editorials on the subject of the dismissal of General MacArthur appeared in the Seattle Times on April 20, 1951. I insert it in the RECORD in order to bring it to the attention of the Members:

REAL STATESMANSHIP CAN REPAIR BLUNDERS

Now the American people have heard, from the mind and heart of a great soldier and a great statesman, the full story of the Truman administration's blunderings in the Far East.

When Gen. Douglas MacArthur was stripped of his commands last week, the Times counseled calm thinking and urged its readers to wait until all the facts were in before passing final judgment on this dramatic episode in American annals.

Since then, we have heard President Truman's defense of his action. Now we have General MacArthur's statesmanlike analysis of the military problems posed by Communist aggression in Asia and across the globe. We are convinced that the dismissal of General MacArthur was the latest of a series of monumental mistakes.

MacArthur is right. The President and his advisers are wrong. Calm thinking, however, must still be the order of the day as the people of the United States insist that the Ship of State be squared once more upon the right course.

In his magnificent and convincing address before the Congress yesterday, MacArthur showed us clearly how far off that course the national administration has veered.

When Red China intervened in Korea, a new situation was created which called for new political and diplomatic decisions. These decisions have never been made. That was wrong.

It was wrong to ignore MacArthur's plea for intensified economic and naval blockade of the China coast. It was wrong to restrict air reconnaissance on that coast. It was wrong to prohibit MacArthur's air forces from crossing the Yalu River, thus providing sanctuary for Red planes.

It has been wrong to make no use of Chiang Kai-shek's idle army locked up on Formosa. It has been wrong to subordinate Asia to Europe in American defense plans.

It would be wrong to give Formosa to Red China, if President Truman is thinking of any such acquiescence in British demands. It would be wrong to join in any other form of appeasement of Communist aggressors in Asia, in Europe, or anywhere else.

Last of all, it was wrong to dismiss General MacArthur, and wrong not to summon him home before that step was taken for consultation. It will be wrong if he is not immediately restored to full authority in Korea and Japan.

Whether the Truman administration, after all this record of wrong judgment and ineptitude, can summon the courage and wisdom to repair such great damage is the question of the hour. Frankly, it seems too much to hope for. But Congress, by resolution, should at once point the way.

Now Let's Get Down to Debating Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BYRON G. ROGERS
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Denver Post of April 20, 1951:

NOW LET'S GET DOWN TO DEBATING AGAIN

Gen. Douglas MacArthur received a tremendous ovation, one richly deserved, when he spoke before the Congress of the United States Thursday. He is a great soldier and a great orator. He made a great address.

The general ably reviewed the case for a stronger effort in the Korean war. He reiterated his previous call for blockade of the China coast, bombardment of Manchurian bases and use of Nationalist troops to start a second front in China proper.

General MacArthur gave Congress a great deal of ammunition for this Pacific phase of the great debate over foreign policy. He did not, however, make clear a number of issues of the utmost importance.

He did not say whether he wanted this action taken by the United Nations, or, failing that, if the action should be taken by the United States alone. He did say that all military commanders whom he knew, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, favor such action as the best military method of achieving victory in the Korean war. He did not say whether or not all military commanders favor this action in light of known and unknown political circumstances regarding Korea.

Neither did the general say at what stage he believed such actions should be taken. Should they be taken all together? Is the invasion of China by Chinese Nationalists, loosed, supplied, and perhaps transported by America, to be done first or last? If the Chinese Nationalists are routed and defeated, is the United States to send troops to succor them? Are we to supply them with guns? Are we to maintain a beachhead on the China coast to assure them of supplies?

These, of course, are vital questions. They determine the degree of involvement that the United States would accept in a new war of this kind.

General MacArthur is an advocate of the purely military viewpoint on the Korean War. He presented a convincing case. He lent great weight to the cause of those who would strengthen the effort in Korea at all costs.

Not living in a purely military world, the rest of us must pause for a moment to catch our breaths and consider the question from other aspects.

The Denver Post agrees with nearly all the principles laid down by General MacArthur. The editors of this newspaper believe China should be blockaded, Manchurian bases bombed, and even, in case of general war with Russia, that troops of Nationalist China or any other faction should be used to fight for our cause.

Yet there are more important matters in the world than these. If it meant break-up of the United Nations, this newspaper would oppose bombing of Manchurian bases and blockade of the China coast. Above all, we believe the fighting members of the United Nations must remain united.

If General MacArthur meant his measures should become United States policy to be pressed before the United Nations, we agree with him in all but the issue of Nationalist China's troops. We are even inclined to accept his judgment, though we know it lessens the possibility of political settlement, that Formosa must never fall into Communist hands—under any conditions now known.

But if General MacArthur meant that we, the people of the United States, should press the Korea war to this extent at the cost of losing support of our allies, then the Denver Post, for one, must disagree.

Assuming, for a moment, that the United Nations will agree to these measures, let us consider the dangers they pose.

Blockade of the China coast seems to pose little additional danger. It would have some good effect, notably on stopping trade in the area of Hong Kong and Macao.

Bombing of Manchurian bases poses more danger. Red China might well call for Russian entrance into the war, under the terms of the Sino-Soviet mutual assistance treaty.

Would Soviet Russia respond to that call? We do not know. That is a chance we would have to take.

One cannot say emphatically enough how foolish it would be for us to examine any of the measures for a stronger war without examining the possible consequences of them. Of all the measures, the use of Nationalist troops bears the most danger of bringing general war. To us it seems to lead directly into general war and it does not seem to be the best answer for victory in Korea.

On the other side, we must again examine the possible consequences of our present policy. Following that policy, it is hard to see how we can achieve better than military stalemate in Korea. Is there any reason to believe we can achieve a political settlement, without appeasing aggression, under present conditions? The chance seems small. We should take stronger action. General MacArthur has proposed strong action. Except for his proposal that we become involved in a Chinese civil war, this newspaper agrees with him. We would even go further in one way and advocate use of the A-bomb in Korea.

These are knotty problems General MacArthur has posed for the second half of the great debate. Let the gentlemen of Congress debate them now for us all to hear. Finally, let Congress, the people, and the administration decide what policy we will pursue in the United Nations, but let the decision be made on the ground of honest opinion, and not be guided by the expediency of party politics.

The Jennie Reed School

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Jennie Reed is one of the best-known and most highly regarded educators in my home city of Tacoma, Wash. She has merited her enviable reputation in the field of education by her unselfish and outstanding service to the people of our community in the public-school system. The Tacoma school directors and members of the educational staff paid just tribute to her in naming a new school the Jennie Reed School. She richly deserves this honor. Knowing her personally, I take pleasure in including with my remarks an editorial appearing in the Tacoma News-Tribune on April 13, 1951:

THE JENNIE REED SCHOOL

Friday night Tacoma school directors and members of the educational staff pay a great tribute to an associate. They are honoring a living educator at the dedication ceremonies for the Jennie Reed School. This is one of Tacoma's newest and most modern school buildings. Its designation is the greatest of compliments to a distinguished Tacoma woman.

Dr. Jennie Reed came to Tacoma in 1910. She was born in Corning, N. Y., and educated in New York and Pennsylvania. Until 1916 Dr. Reed taught at the Irving School, becoming principal of that institution in 1916. In turn, she served as principal of Jefferson School and Sheridan School. Then she was appointed director of the research and psychological clinic for the Tacoma public schools. Later she served as principal of the McCarver Junior High School and later as principal of the Mary Lyon School. She was then transferred to the central research department. The University of Washington honored her with a doctor's degree in 1933.

Her distinguished work for Tacoma schools is thus recognized by the school directors in the selection of the name. To her hundreds of friends in Tacoma and throughout the State this compliment to a living educator is approved as a tribute to an outstanding woman who has made a great reputation in the educational world.

Your Congressman Will Be There

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Citizens' Committee to Oppose Flood Control Dams in the Unadilla and Butternut Valleys:

SOUTH NEW BERLIN, N. Y., April 20, 1951.
Hon. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: On behalf of the citizens of our valley we wish to thank you for the letters we have received from your office. We also wish to express our appreciation for the stand you have taken regarding the matter.

While it is not our intention to advocate other measures, we wish you success in your flood wall bill.

It is our intention to hold a mass meeting during the latter part of May or early June and would like to have you as our principal speaker. Will you address the meeting? If so, would you pick a Saturday or Sunday afternoon during that time when you will be free and we will plan accordingly?

As you are also against the dams, perhaps you can advise other means that we could use to not only show the proper authorities that we are opposed to these projects but to secure assurance from them that the proposed area dams will not be built.

Very sincerely yours,
CITIZENS COMMITTEE,
WALTER BAGG,
President.

Pattern for Survival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, because Miss Margaret K. Patterson has so eloquently stated a pattern for survival, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of her remarks made to the Burrall Class, Calvary Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., Sunday morning, March 11, 1951. Miss Patterson is assistant teacher of Burrall Class and principal of the Lafayette School in the District of Columbia. I commend her lecture to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

PATTERN FOR SURVIVAL

I attended a meeting of school people recently where the film Pattern for Survival was shown. Perhaps some of you have seen it.

The film first showed in simple terms the nature of the atom bomb, and then showed through the experiences of a family living in a city apartment house the steps to follow in seeking safety in case an atom bomb struck. Included also, in graphic form, were suggestions as to what to do in any number of situations in which a person might find himself—at work, walking in the street, driving a car, riding on a public conveyance, etc.

Pattern for survival. We all are interested in that pattern, are we not? Never before, in our lives certainly, have we been so conscious of the imminent danger of wholesale destruction. Do you find yourself started now and then by some unusual sound or phenomenon which suddenly appears? Life has suddenly become very precious and we look upon each day, each hour, with new eyes—new appreciation.

Did you see the article in the Star recently telling of the young woman who lost her eyesight last November? She had to undergo an operation on her eye for detached retina. For several weeks she had to lie motionless with 25-pound sandbags on each side of her head. She returned to work February 5.

"I'll never cease to thank God every day that I live that I can see sunlight again," said Mrs. Hemp. "I didn't know it could be so beautiful."

Our fears today seem more real than ever before, more grounded on facts, as through all the modern media—press, radio, television—we see and hear the terrible things that may befall us. War of nerves, germ war, atom bomb, hydrogen bomb. Surely it would seem to us that our world—the one in which we live—could not survive.

I heard General Hershey speak a short time ago. He emphasized the fact that each generation had had to face its problems of survival. He cited Lincoln's time—we had been thinking particularly of Lincoln around the 12th of February—and he spoke of the hazards that then threatened life on every hand. Physical comforts were at such a premium that Lincoln's family and the neighbors felt themselves fortunate if they had four sides of a shelter rather than a three-sided lean-to. The mortality rate was high. Many could not survive the rigors of the cold winters and the deprivations they suffered. Lincoln's own mother and sister were among these. Along the frontier areas of our country a man's life was constantly in danger. An Indian might let fly an arrow at any unexpected moment.

"You're no more dead with an A-bomb than you were with an arrow and you're probably a lot more comfortable," said General Hershey.

Pattern for survival. On what are many people relying in their thoughts nowadays?

Some are relying on rationalization for one thing. "Perhaps Russia, after all, will not drop A-bombs on Washington. She is well aware of the fact that we are all set—poised for retaliation. The first move on her part to destroy our cities and our people would lead to immediate destruction of her own cities and people. Not even the leaders, who seem to regard human life lightly, want mass destruction." Yes: rationalization does reassure a bit and contribute somewhat to one's peace of mind.

There are people who are pinning their hopes for survival on information.

"Let's bring our fears out in the open and talk about them. Let's learn more about the nature of the A-bomb—how it works—what it does—what we do in case we are alerted." There are specific things to do, as we are all learning, which will contribute to our safety, wherever we may be when the crisis occurs—seek a bomb shelter, a basement, a wall, a heavy piece of furniture, cover all exposed parts of one's body, keep covered until the all-clear signal is given.

Soon an illustrated pamphlet of instructions will be put into every classroom in the city, and teachers and children will study and learn together how they can help themselves and others when and if the emergency comes. Yes; knowledge does help. I must admit that after viewing the film Pattern for Survival, I felt a little less afraid, a little more assured, that by taking definite safety measures, one's chances for survival are fairly good. The unknown presents one of our outstanding causes of fear.

But are rationalization and knowledge, important as they may prove to be, sufficient to give us that peace of mind, that calm and courage, that will see us through any crisis?

We must have something more. We know that the only thing on which we can really rely is that which lies within our spiritual world—that which lies deep within ourselves—inner resources—"The Kingdom of God within you."

We believe in a God and believe that He lives within our hearts and minds. Not long ago a survey was made of the people of the United States to ascertain their religious beliefs. More than 90 percent said they believed in God. But the survey went on to point out that only about 20 percent showed by their actions that their belief had any governing power in their lives.

Can we get a pattern for survival for ourselves that will help govern our hearts and minds for whatever disaster may come to us?

I should like to suggest three things that might contribute toward building within ourselves a pattern for survival.

1. The first thing I would suggest is to seek—seek spiritual growth.

"Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you."

And what are these things? They are freedom from anxieties about our material needs as clothing, food and shelter—freedom from doubts and fears which assail us—they are confidence and assurance and faith in the goodness of God.

Let us think of what is implied in that word "seek." We might substitute the word search or study.

"Study to show thyself approved unto God."

Spiritual growth does not just take place automatically because we wish it to do so.

We read the papers, listen to the radio, see television, attend lectures—following definite plants to keep ourselves enlightened about what is going on in the world—all of which is desirable and good but how much time do we give to enlightening ourselves on matters pertaining to the spiritual—to strengthening the spirit?

We know, not just because we have been told or have read about it, but cut of our personal experiences, that faith and prayer are creative forces for courage—and yet think of the minimum of time we give to strengthening these forces—we may crowd into a busy day perhaps a bare 5 minutes or so for study and meditation.

Through active seeking and study we grow into a realization of our inner resources—an identification of self with the God within—and only then can we come into a power that will build a pattern for ourselves capable of withstanding whatever may happen.

Back in Deuteronomy, Moses might well have been speaking to us when he said to his people:

"But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find Him, if thou seek Him with all thy heart and with all thy soul."

Through daily study, prayer for guidance, search for enlightment and for truth, joyful thanks for what we have, and now and then, an actual listing of one's assets, problems, and plans in an attempt at personal evaluation—we can build for ourselves a strength and a peace that passeth understanding.

Louis B. Mayer, of MGM, writing in Dr. Peale's little magazine Guideposts tells of the influence throughout his life of his mother, a woman of strength and power, the source of which lay in her daily study and practice of faith and prayer.

2. The second suggestion for building a pattern for survival has to do with self-direction or self-discipline. This is necessary to the accomplishment of anything really worth while. The things that come easy with little effort on our part have little meaning or value for us.

Self-denial or self-discipline just for its own sake is neither virtuous nor wholesome. Only when it is exercised as a constructive measure, as a means to a desirable end can it really be justified.

This matter of self-discipline means standing by convictions, by values which we have had cause to believe are good and right, sometimes at the cost of popularity. It takes courage and action.

The article in the Reader's Digest for March by I. A. R. Wylie entitled "Strength for These Days," speaks of this matter of spiritual exercise. These inner reserves or resources, she calls it the inner citadel, enabling us to meet dangerous and difficult times can only be reached when we stand on the firm ground of moral integrity. It is closed, automatically, she says to the cheat, the liar, the tyrant, the self-seeker. It is closed to us whenever we waver from an absolute code of honor and decency.

Self-discipline (direction) implies choice and in every moment of our lives we are confronted with choices. Someone has said that character is the sum total of all of the choices we have made up to date.

Referring to Mr. Mayer again: He tells of an incident when, as a small boy, he got into a fight with another boy. And while he says that he believes the outcome was a draw, he was still muttering and making ugly threats when he reached home.

His mother seemed to be paying no attention to him but the next day they were out in the country on a family picnic. She called Louis aside, saying that she wanted to show him something. They were in a beautiful valley in Canada and mountains towered on all sides, perfect for echoes.

She asked Louis to repeat what he had said the day before. He pretended not to remember. She reminded him that he said, "Damn you." She then had him say it and he was astonished at the volume of the echo which came back. Then she told him to shout it as loud as he could. He didn't want to do it, but knowing his gentle but firm mother, he shouted the words and they thundered back at him like a voice from heaven denouncing him. Then his mother had him substitute the words "Bless you." When he shouted that, the echo came back a benediction.

"Which do you prefer, my son, "my mother said. "It's entirely up to you. That is the way life is. It always returns to us what we say to it. If you shout at it and at your fellow man, 'damn you,' life and your fellow man will shout it right back at you. If you say to life, to humanity, 'bless you,' then your life will be an echo of those words, 'bless you.'

"Choose ye whom ye shall serve, Louis. You have that choice. As long as you live you will have your choice. Every day, almost every hour, in some way a choice will be presented to you. It says in the Bible, that before you this day is the choice, blessing or cursing. I tell you now, my son, that life will echo back to you what you say to it as surely as you just heard this echo here, and the choice is yours what you shall say for it to echo."

Louis Mayer concludes by saying that like every human being, he had sneaked up on life several times and tried to break the echo, but he had never succeeded, not once. Through every trial that has arisen he has seemed to hear his mother say, "You will have your choice as long as you live."

In this matter of choices civilized man is distinguished from the savage by his willingness to endure present pain for the sake of future satisfactions, even though they are rather far distant.

Finally, we need not only to seek and search for truth to strengthen our inner selves, not only to exercise self-discipline and make the right choices but we need more than ever to go outside ourselves—to lose and find ourselves in meaningful helpfulness to others.

"He that is greatest among you must be servant of all."

As we get older there is a tendency to withdraw more to ourselves—a tendency we have to face. We like our physical comforts—again this matter of self-discipline comes in. It is easier to perform services for ourselves rather than for others.

Miss Wylie cites an instance of World War I of a young American officer who went to the home of an English family to spend his last few days before going to join his regiment in France. They welcomed him like a son. They gave gay parties for him and tried to make his stay with them a delightful memory. Only later did he learn that on the eve of his arrival their only son had been killed in action. The writer says she is sure that by their selfless concern for this young soldier these people had surmounted death and that any feeling of bitterness had been driven from their grief.

The English people were outstanding in this last war. Miss Wylie says that she flew to England in 1944 and to her astonishment she found the people living in hourly danger of violent death, their homes in ruins and with many discomforts and privations—strangely enough, almost gaily happy. And to her surprise, she became happier than she had ever been as she lived among them.

She found women, gently nurtured, often elderly, who gave up sleep and rest night after night to fight fire and help rescue neighbors for whom they had assumed responsibility. They were living and dying at their highest level—all barriers between them had been broken down. Their individual resources of strength had been pooled and had become a mighty torrent. As Paul says, they were members one of another and were a whole, happy, integrated people. There was no question that they had developed a pattern of survival through meeting the hardest challenge they had ever known.

Concerning us, I believe with this writer, and I quote, "If that dire hour should ever come, we shall find, perhaps to our astonishment, that it is also our finest hour—the revelations of our true quality. In all men of good will—all free men—is the inner strength, do they but call upon it, to affirm with Emily Brontë, dying, young, forlorn, her genius half expressed but exultantly undefeated:

" 'No coward soul is mine,
No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere;
I see Heaven's glories shine,
And Faith shines equal, arming me from Fear.' "

Maiden Voyage of the "Finntrader"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I had the pleasure and privilege to be among those invited to attend a reception aboard the new 414-foot ship, the Finntrader, which was anchored in the Alexandria, Va., harbor after its maiden voyage to America. This ocean vessel is owned by Finnlines, Ltd., a subsidiary of Enso-Gutzeit, the largest producer of pulp paper and wallboard in Finland. I was certainly impressed by this ship—it is a modern, streamlined freighter of 6,400 tons, and has fine quarters for 12 passengers.

The appearance of the Finntrader is symbolic of the rebirth of the Finnish merchant marine, and the reestablishment of international trade by the Finnish Republic. This vessel was launched early this year in Holland, where she was built according to Finnish plans, and was fitted out inside in Finland. I am told her owners will in the next year be launching three more sister ships to sail the seven seas and the five oceans.

These new units in an expanding Finnish merchant marine bring to light again the distinguished history of the Finns in maritime annals. For years the Finnish sailing vessels were among the finest on the seas. Used in the wheat trade primarily, they were trim and speedy. Joseph Conrad and Alan Villiers wrote their vital stories around the tales of the Finnish windjammers. Thus the Finns were friendly rivals of the Norwegians in maritime annals, and Finnish sea captains approached the feats of the famous Leif Erickson.

We in America are proud of Finland, and as Congressman from Minnesota's Eighth District which has a large Finnish-American population, I can say with authority that the Finns who migrated to America are like their brethren in the old country—hardworking, conscientious, and patriotic people who have great contributions to the public welfare.

The Finnish Republic is a young republic—it got its start as an independent nation when it divorced itself from the crumbling empire of the Czars. It set up a constitutional government dedicated to democratic principles, which has met its international obligations at all times. In this connection, it was a worthwhile act on the part of the United States Congress to enact legislation 2 years ago to divert future payments on Finland's World War I debt to this country into a fund for the education and interchange of students between Finland and the United States in order to promote better relations between the two countries. This program is operating in a satisfactory manner, and I am proud to have been among those who helped write the proposal into law.

The launching of the Finntrader, and its appearance in American ports, is a testament to the Finnish tradition of industry and initiative. The Finnish Republic has, by its own efforts and without Marshall plan aid, repaired the damages of World War II, and is now making great enonomic progress toward raising the living standards and providing the good life for its people. I join with other Americans in wishing Finland well in this undertaking.

The Truman-MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in my home town paper, the Galveston News, there appeared on April 21, an exceptionally fine editorial on the subject of the Truman-MacArthur controversy.

It is an objective and level-headed approach and it provides some badly needed food for thought. Between the lines, it admonishes the reader to act without haste and certainly without passion and to consider the present controversy in the light of history.

I take pleasure in inserting the editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that its influence may not be limited to my own people but may be felt by the Congress and the Nation:

HISTORY AND THE FEUD

How history will judge the Truman-MacArthur controversy is a matter for speculation. When time mellows judgment, and gives perspective which we lack in our time, it is not impossible that both men will have increased stature because of what has happened. History has a way of dealing kindly with men who feel strongly about important matters and who act positively.

If President Truman can act with dignity and avoid making political capital of the issue, he may someday be judged as a President forced to defy public sentiment by replacing a national hero for reasons he believed to be essential to the safety of the world and the Nation he guided.

If General MacArthur rejects a mantle of martyrdom and refuses to allow himself to be a political tool, he may find a place in the history books as a soldier who felt a sense of a more urgent duty than the soldierly duty of obedience.

History will have an advantage that today we have not had. All the scores will be in and the results will be recorded. Abraham Lincoln is a folk hero and yet Gen. Robert E. Lee has a place of dignity in our history. The ideological conflict between Lincoln and Lee, and the moral beliefs which compelled the latter to resign as an officer in the army commanded by Lincoln to lead the army which fought it, has not dimmed the memory of either in the hearts of their countrymen.

Only little men show up as little after a long time.

Skirmish Won, But War May Go On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Times of Thursday, April 19, 1951:

SKIRMISH WON, BUT WAR MAY GO ON

The vote of the House Interior Committee killing (for the time being) the central Arizona project is a victory for California, but not a secure enough one so that we can afford to relax vigilance. The committee voted, 16 to 8, to discontinue further hearings until either the Supreme Court defines the respective water rights of California and Arizona or the two States agree on a division of the Colorado.

But this does not mean the project may not be taken up again for Arizona has not dropped her fight.

The court action cannot be obtained until an enabling resolution is passed by Congress. Such a resolution is pending in the Judiciary Committees of both Houses, but Arizona has blocked consideration. As for agreement, the two States have been disputing for 30 years over this question and seem to have made no progress toward agreement.

The bill which the committee tabled was a proposal to authorize construction of extensive dams, pump lifts, and canals for the purpose of irrigating central Arizona, at a cost estimated at very nearly $800,000,000, but which was regarded as certain to run very much higher.

The committee has been having hearings on the bill which already have run more than 6 weeks. The vote stops the hearings.

Victory climaxed a steady fight by two California Congressmen, Representative POULSON, of Los Angeles, and Representative ENGLE, of Red Bluff, supported by Representative YORTY, of Los Angeles.

They contended that the 1,200,000 acre-feet the project would take from the Colorado was far more than Arizona's just share and would endanger the established rights of California to water; also that the project was impractical in that it could not possibly repay any substantial part of its cost as reclamation projects are supposed to do.

Obviously the costs would have to be paid by the general taxpayers, including those of California.

As to the rights of the two States in the waters of the river, that obviously is a question for the courts, but Arizona has resisted all efforts to take the matter to court.

Arizona's ostensible objection that a suit would take too long is obviously invalid. The defense effort would force postponement of construction for several years in any event and it probably would not take more than a year to get a court decision.

The action of the committee is sound and sensible and the thanks of California are due to its Representatives who fought and won the battle.

General MacArthur's Address to Congress Will Not Be Forgotten

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, no one who heard the words of Gen. Douglas MacArthur when he spoke to the Congress of the United States will soon forget. His words spoken with deep conviction and restrained emotion made a profound impression upon those who listened.

General MacArthur reported on the situation in the Pacific Far East as he knows it from his long personal experience in that area as a soldier in the field and as an administrator in Japan. He outlined the history of the Far East, its culture and its aspirations against colonialism, and of the influence of this history upon present events.

And he warned in view of these facts that a defense line in the far Pacific—Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines—is essential to the defense of the western boundaries of the United States itself.

Here was a great American, a statesman and a soldier. As a man who has lived intimately with war and knows its degradation and horror, he deplored the use of war as a means of settling disputes. But he warned that a nation once in war cannot retreat, for "there is no substitute for victory."

General MacArthur received a deserved ovation upon the conclusion of his magnificent address. The following appraisal of his speech by David Lawrence high lights the essential points of the general's report to the Congress:

MAN FROM THE PAGES OF HISTORY—CONGRESS IMPRESSED BY GENERAL'S DRAMATIC APPEAL TO COUNTRYMEN FOR COURAGE AGAINST DEFEATISM

(By David Lawrence)

They came, they saw, and they heard. They—the Congress of the United States—went away profoundly impressed that here was no ordinary man, no ordinary soldier, no ordinary general. For here was a statesman speaking, a man from the pages of history whose dramatic appeal to his countrymen for courage against defeatism, for boldness, and resoluteness against softness and appeasement will be recorded for all time as the appeal magnificent. Here was Douglas MacArthur closing 52 years of military service to his country.

Those partisans who came expecting a political dynamic or a petty complaint against the fate that deprived him of his command in such humiliating manner found an entirely different spokesman. His speech was the voice of the soldier caught in a trap in Korea but serving his flag and not asking the reason why. His speech was the voice of the America of yesteryears when Americans did not prate of defeat and speak with fear and trembling to the enemy that had despoiled a weaker nation and tortured or killed prisoners.

Members of the Senate and House—Republicans and Democrats—listened as if transfixed. They heard a man of deep conviction, talking with an emotion restrained with difficulty as he told of Asia, the far-off continent where revolutionary changes are in progress. He told of Japan, beaten 6 years ago, but now on the way to democracy. He spoke feelingly of the desperate effort of the Korean people to save their independence. He spoke sympathetically of the slow but sure evolution of government in the Philippines.

But the speech was not one of mere sentiment. It was the well-mobilized argument of a man who for a quarter of a century or more has studied the Far East—its culture and its aspirations against colonialism. He spoke as a liberal about the hopes of peoples as against tyrants. He did not fail to speak also of the great hopes of the world for peace by means of collective security.

All the ideals of America General MacArthur articulated with the measured phrases of a statesman. All the hopes of the world for an end to war as a means of settling disputes he championed with wholehearted devotion. But, he warned, once a nation enters a war, there is no time for retreat or appeasement, no time for compromise. He said with an emphasis that shook the Chamber with applause: "There is no substitute for victory."

The general built up point by point the case for a defense line in the far Pacific—Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines. He said if that line was broken, our own Pacific coast would not be safe. And then he emphasized why it was important to hold Formosa.

The statement that came as the highest surprise was his flat declaration that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff in the past had agreed with this military strategy.

There will, of course, be controversy over various points in the speech. It will be debated and perhaps investigating committees of Congress will ask for the documents and evidence relating to it.

The general has notified Senator RUSSELL, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, that, while he does not want to get into a controversy or pursue these matters, he will willingly cooperate with the committee should it desire him to amplify his views. So Senator RUSSELL plans next week to fix a time, possibly for the following week, when the Armed Services Committee will go into details, with General MacArthur as a witness.

Meanwhile, the National Capital still is shocked by the whole affair. The reception given General MacArthur was so striking that it could not but overwhelm for the time being almost every other activity of the Government. The welcome to the general was, of course, a tribute to a great soldier as well as to a soldier-statesman.

But it was also a human reaction to the summary way in which a great general had been instantly relieved of his command without even being given the opportunity to say farewell to his troops. No similar case is on record in all the history of the United States. Generals have been ordered to relinquish their commands but on none has such a sentence been imposed—without trial—with so abrupt a detachment from his command without a real word of explanation of what orders or instructions he had violated, if any. The conclusion is inescapable—General MacArthur was made the victim of the petty political spirit of our times.

The stature of General MacArthur, after his address to Congress, looms larger and makes an even deeper imprint on the pages of history. He was magnificent in his words of farewell. It was an hour of triumph in which the people, in effect, repudiated the sad implications of government by petty politics and raised their eyes with hope as they heard the first words of real leadership that have come from the National Capital in many a long year.

What a Soldier Boy Thinks When He Leaves His Homeland for War Service Abroad—Dedicated to the Hope for Everlasting Peace and Good Will Among Men—By 19-Year-Old James A. Fenton, Fortieth Infantry Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish Dean Acheson and some of his wild-eyed boys would read this letter:

DEAR GRANDPA: When we left Camp Cooke at 4:30 in the morning, we did not get to San Francisco until 5 that night. We left the dock at 6. It was still light when we went under the Oakland Bay Bridge. When we got about 3,000 yards away (beyond) from it, the ship stopped. They did that so we could practice the fire and boat drill before the men got sick. Then we pulled up anchor to start our long, and what seemed to us our trip to death, across the sea.

As we came closer to the Golden Gate Bridge, we passed the "Rock" (Alcatraz). The men and myself talked about it—then we got closer to that mighty span of steel that went from one side of the bay to the other, which to me represented a line. When inside this line, you were in the land of the free and the happy, and when looking out over this line into the darkness of night, it represented the danger and the fear of the unknown you might encounter.

When we came within 200 yards before passing under this work of art, there came a silence over the ship: a silence that is only experienced when men from different States are thinking to themselves, and trying to believe it is all true, that they are being taken from their loved ones, their friends, their homes, mothers and fathers, aunts and uncles, and all the things they believe in.

When we did pass under it, we all looked back. I knew that each and every one of us was thinking the same thing as the city and harbor lights began to fade away. It is difficult to tell you how the men and myself felt as we watched those lights grow dim, many of us wondering if perhaps this was to be our last look at what we loved so dearly. The facial expressions were varied; some of the young ones with the expressions of youthful eagerness and adventure. The veterans and older ones with the attitude of "well here we go again," or "it seems to me I've seen this before."

Until you have left behind all the things you have lived for, or wanted to live for and watched them disappear with the shoreline into the vastness of the sea, you can hardly conceive what being an American can mean.

You may think the men cried aloud as they watched this unbelievable thing happen—not aloud, but deep down inside where it hurts more, and makes you want to cry aloud.

I dream during the daytime more than I do at night. I dream of only one thing—that is to again be on the side of that line, where there is love, hope and happiness.

Well, I am 19 now, as of the 4th (April) a birthday sailing the high seas.

This letter will be mailed from Japan.

Love,

JIMMIE.

Basic Korea Issue Befuddled

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence:

BASIC KOREA ISSUE BEFUDDLED—ADMINISTRATION BEGINNING TO SMEAR MACARTHUR AS WAY TO ANSWER FUNDAMENTAL ARGUMENTS

(By David Lawrence)

General MacArthur's renunciation of any political aspirations and his pointed request that his name should not be used in a political way certainly was a timely demolition of attempts to befuddle the basic issue—whether American boys in Korea are going to be killed day after day without a real chance to fight back at the air forces bombarding them.

The introduction of the political innuendo against General MacArthur was an administration tactic. Smarting under the evident disapproval by the country of the crude method of relieving a distinguished general of his command, the Truman supporters in Congress have hit a new low in politics. They have already begun to smear the general as if that's the way to answer his fundamental arguments.

But the conversation often turned at the Capitol Wednesday to the misuse of the office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to make political speeches for the President and the Truman administration.

General Bradley, as Chairman, does not have a vote in the Joint Chiefs, and it never was intended that he should be the spokesman of the administration when it got into hot water in a political combat on Capitol Hill. General Bradley implied that General MacArthur wants to fight a war on the mainland of China and favors a deliberate expansion of the area of the war. This charge isn't so and causes disappointment among those who had come to look on General Bradley as above the political game.

What the administration fails to see and what General Bradley failed in his speech to meet is the complaint of the mothers and fathers of the boys who are in Korea. These boys don't want to become the victims of giant air raids from Manchurian bases without an effective chance to strike back at those bases.

It is significant that Chairman VINSON (Democrat), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has switched from the firm position which he took in the case of the removal of Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations. The admiral testified before Mr. VINSON's committee and was punished as a reprisal for his testimony. General MacArthur was fired because he answered a question from a Member of Congress. Mr. VINSON now says, however, in a letter to a constituent that the whole MacArthur situation "is just this simple." He pointed out that it had been decided by the President that the war in Korea should be localized and that General MacArthur has been advocating that we should win the war by expanding it in Korea and the mainland of China. Mr. VINSON noted that the question was whether we were going to have a little war or a big one and that he wanted to be on the side of a little war.

But that has never been the issue and there isn't a bit of proof that it has ever been. The real issue is this: A decision by the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff that Korea was not to be defended was proclaimed officially in January 1950, by Secretary of State Acheson. Then in June 1950, the civilian authority—the President—decided to intervene in Korea, although no adequate military preparations had been made for it. It was a wise decision to make in June 1950, and a wrong decision in January 1950. It was wise in June 1950, because America has never been afraid to be bold when duty called. But if the United States had stationed Marines in the Far Pacific in ample numbers and had not put the bulk of its aircraft carriers "in moth balls," there might have been no war at all in Korea.

Today, however, the question is whether the forces in Korea shall be withdrawn as a consequence of a virtual surrender and appeasement or whether they shall fight to protect themselves against air attack. "Appeasement" is constantly denied but it is the administration's real plan—if the Communists will only come far enough away from their haughty pose to help the administration save face. As to big or little wars, Winston Churchill said in the House of Commons after the Munich appeasement:

"Gentlemen, you have chosen between war and dishonor. You have chosen dishonor. You shall have war."

The answer, as far as the next war is concerned, will come some day when appeasement or what is now euphemistically called a "political settlement" has been effected in Asia. General MacArthur stands as the symbol of opposition to that appeasement, because he honestly believes that a firm position will prevent world war III and that vacillation and phony "peace" talk will only invite world war III.

Airplane Mail and Passenger Service in the Tri-City Area of the Columbia Basin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

To the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, and to the Honorable Members of the Civil Aeronautics Board:

We, the Senate of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition as follows:

Whereas that area of the Columbia Basin known as the Tri-City area, comprising the cities of Pasco and Kennewick, the unincorporated area of Richland, and the rural area immediately adjacent thereto, now has a population of some 75,000; and

Whereas the importance of the Tri-City area as an atomic and national defense center makes it vital that rapid transportation facilities exist; and

Whereas the said Tri-City area now has no direct or convenient air communication with coastal cities of the Northwest; and

Whereas the public convenience and necessity of such air transportation service to the coast from the Tri-City area already has been proved: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Senate of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, That we respectfully petition the President and the Civil Aeronautics Board to act promptly to certificate regularly scheduled local airplane mail and passenger service from the Tri-City area to Seattle, via Yakima and Ellensburg; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be instructed to transmit copies of this resolution immediately to the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, to the Honorable Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and to each Member of Congress from the State of Washington.

World Communism and Its Ultimate Aims

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Tidings, Los Angeles, Calif., of March 23, 1951:

EL RODEO

As they parley in Paris, we renew our resolution that there must never again be misunderstanding among the free peoples of the world as to the nature of world communism and its ultimate aims. There must never again be misunderstanding above all by the people of the United States.

Along with the civilized world we were shocked with the horror of the Bolshevist seizure of Russia just as the unhappy land sighted deliverance in the allied trumph of the First World War. We made a feeble attempt to rid our gallant ally of the scourge but when the dauntless Poles cleared their land of the marauder and the valiant Magyars quelled the rising of Bela Kun, exhausted and sick of strike and combat, we felt the menace contained beyond the Vistula where, we vainly hoped, it would ultimately be cast aside by the fires of freedom that burned perenially in the breasts of the great Slavic peoples. We sadly underestimated the power and strength of brute force and cunning and cruelty.

For 15 years the regime in Russia was a pariah among the nations, ostracized from the councils of the nations, cut off from the normal channels of trade, denied the friendly hand of the free. As a people, as a nation, we especially seemed to recognize the menace of the upstart to all our glorious Christian traditions, the danger to all our cherished American freedoms. We shuddered at the planned massacre of the Ukraine, the endless liquidation of the flower of Russia, the rape and pillage of the innocent, the long trek of political dissidents to Siberian wastes, the wail of the purged—and we steeled ourselves in resolution that here was a godless tyranny bent on a new enslavement of humanity, insidiously planning world revolution, fomenting wars and rumors of wars—and our free choice was to stand steadfast against this new oriental despotism with all the faith and courage of those who in the past shielded us from the enemy without and made this Nation strong and great.

Then came the great change, the awful contrast. We wonder now how we could have been so deluded. But suddenly, over night, it became the fashionable thing to fawn upon and flatter this ugly thing. We were in one of those unfortunate periods of economic collapse when the Nation reeled in bewilderment, caught in the shackles it had forged. There were cold, empty larders, desolate firesides, and a litany of woes, a requiem of tears saddened the land and filled it with cries of deliverance. At the same time the moral bankruptcy of the lost generation reached a new high, and in our confusion we turned to traffic with this evil thing.

It will not harm to rehearse again the scene: Our technicians perfecting the industrial might of an enemy which despite protestations of friendship was vowed to our destruction; our professors heralding the excellence of this tyranny over our vaunted freedom; our journalists slanting and coloring the news to gloss over Communist excesses, deliberately confusing the issues, bewildering by silence and innuendo; our statesmen and diplomats in undignified social contact squandering the faith of freedom of Christian men over half the world for a mess of Soviet pottage, the collective lunacy of the land which failed to discern the web that was slowly being spun around it.

The fact that we were once uneasy comrades in arms against a common foe does not excuse us. We should still have known—because of our former understanding, because of the callous aggression on Finland, because of the cynical smile on the faces of Molotov and Von Ribbentrop as the pact sealed the mutual plunder of Poland and prepared Hitler's assault on the West. And the sell-out of our friends and our intrepid allies at Yalta and Teheran and Potsdam is something we have not yet had the conscience to disavow.

That is why we repeat that there must never again be misunderstanding among the free peoples of the world as to the nature of world communism and its ultimate aims. There must never again be misunderstanding above all by the people of the United States.

Continued Support for the International Children's Fund Is in Our National Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my concern over the drastic cut in the third supplemental appropriation bill from $12,500,000 to $5,000,000 for United States participation in the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund.

As chairman of the only congressional committee to make an intensive study of UNICEF, both in respect to the headquarters organization and the field program, I would like to report that I found this special activity for children far more significant for the United States than is generally recognized by this House. I visited headquarters in New York on two different occasions, the European regional office in Paris, and visited with chiefs of mission in Germany, Denmark, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Yugoslavia, Italy, Greece, and the Middle East.

The practical character of this action operating at the community level, with its tangible results of improved child health and welfare, has a dynamic appeal to all governments and people. Beyond this human appeal, however, is the effective stimulus of the matching formula. The initiative of the United States Congress in establishing the matching principle for both contributing and recipient countries has proven to be the keystone of UNICEF success. Fifty-four governments have made voluntary contributions for UNICEF assisted programs outside their territories and approximately another $150,000,000 has been made available by recipient countries. I was surprised to find that governments on both sides of the iron curtain were contributing to UNICEF and freely permitting goods to cross usually closed borders. Obvious was the pride which officials in war-devastated countries, as well as those from more prosperous areas, attached to their contributions to this program.

I was impressed in almost every country visited by the magnitude of the UNICEF program in relation to the small sums available. This phenomenon in part stemmed from the strategic character of UNICEF assistance but was only made possible by the organization of hundreds of volunteer local committees composed primarily of parents and teachers who were responsible for the distribution of supplies at the community level. For example, we were informed that in Europe alone UNICEF food has been distributed through more than 50,000 feeding centers, manned by full- or part-time volunteers. Thus tens of thousands of persons are actively engaged in this United Nations program without remuneration.

It would be difficult to measure the extensive humanitarian result of this special assistance to children, but in one country, for example, I saw records of UNICEF-assisted programs which revealed that over a 1-year period, girls in the 12-year-old age group grew in height from 130.6 centimeters to 137.6 centimeters, and weight from 27.7 kilos to 31.6 kilos, as compared to the national average for the same period of 130.9 centimeters for height and 28.5 kilos for weight. Boys in the same age level, who received UNICEF supplies, increased in height 5.1 centimeters and in weight 2 kilos over and above the national average. Government officials and local administrators said that UNICEF imports of supplementary food were not only responsible for increased weight and generally improved child-health condition but were an influential factor in bringing the children back to school.

I felt the international exchange of supplies under this kind of a commodity organization a valuable aspect of the program. In Austria there was sugar from Poland, and cars from Czechoslovakia. In the Middle East, microscopes from Scandinavia and wheat from Yugoslavia, and in Yugoslavia the children were eating Italian rice.

Spot checks showed meticulous reporting and a careful check on the supplies by a staff experienced in the distribution of such commodities.

The fund holds a unique place in the structure of the United Nations as the only body charged with a world-wide supply operation financed on the basis of voluntary contributions from governments, people, and organizations. This aspect of financing by voluntary contributions distinguishes UNICEF from most of the regular United Nations work based on an assessed scale of contributions.

It is not an easy process. Apathy, changes in government, economic vicissitudes, currency and trade regulations combine to make it difficult for UNICEF to rely on sufficient funds for long-range planning. To meet this problem UNICEF has followed the principle of only making allocations when there are sufficient funds on hand to complete a given program. Thus this new cut in the supplemental appropriation will not completely stop operations programed through this fiscal year but will drastically curtail any extension of the present services for children which are just now getting under way in Latin America, the Middle East, and many of the Asian countries.

I was impressed with the high degree of economy and efficiency which characterized the administration of this international program for children, but there are even greater considerations for the benefit of this country which urge me to request the Representatives of this House to restore the full appropriation for the International Children's Fund. For, with many other Members of this body, I agree with General Marshall, when, as Secretary of State, he said:

> Children whose bodies have been starved and warped are likely to develop, if they survive, into a generation of embittered adults. Our national interest as well as our humanitarian instinct demands that we do not permit this to happen. If we fail to do our part for the nourishment and care and normal development today of the children with whom our children will have to live tomorrow, we shall have failed in statesmanship as well as in humanity.

MacArthur's Ouster a Danger to Defense of Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan:

DANGER TO JAPAN'S DEFENSE SEEN AS RESULT OF MACARTHUR'S OUSTER—MARK SULLIVAN SAYS GENERAL WON NATION OVER TO CO-OPERATION FOR WORLD RECOVERY AND PEACE

(By Mark Sullivan)

President Truman's dismissal of General MacArthur was not merely a disciplining of him on military grounds. Beyond that and vastly more important, it was expulsion of MacArthur from counsel, from any part in planning or advice. Actually, this had gone on before. During several years MacArthur has been flouted in the public eye and quietly sabotaged. But by Mr. Truman's action the flouting is made formal and whole, permanent and systematic, it is sensationally announced to the world. This has effects that cannot be overcome. The world struggle is, since last Wednesday, a fundamentally changed picture.

Basic in the changed picture is the absence from it of MacArthur, and the fact that his absence is enforced by the President of the United States. The picture now lacks what MacArthur symbolized, world restoration. By what MacArthur accomplished in Japan—changing the sullen bitterness of a conquered people to a spirit that was not merely friendship toward us but eagerness to adopt our ideals and cooperate with us in promoting them in the world—by this, MacArthur brought about perhaps the longest step toward world recovery that has taken place during the postwar period.

MACARTHUR'S CONTRIBUTION

World recovery includes hope of world peace, and progress toward it. To this, MacArthur's contribution has been larger than that of any other statesman. For not only did he bring a powerful and formerly militaristic nation to belief in peace and willingness to promote it in the world; further than that, what MacArthur did in Japan had effects on the thoughts and purposes and hopes of other peoples, especially Asiatic ones. None of these, nor Japan itself, can feel today the way it felt before last Wednesday. It would be an irony, if it were not associated with so somber a tragedy, that Mr. Truman, defending his dismissal of MacArthur, and stating his purpose as prevention of another world war, implies that MacArthur's course would have brought one about.

The changes that have taken place in the world picture include a detail especially ominous to us. Our defense line against advance of Russian communism toward us is potentially moved back some 5,000 miles toward our own shore. Potentially, this had already taken place some 2 years ago when Russian communism overran China and set up in that country the Communist government that now makes war on us. While that was taking place our interest called on us to support the then anti-Communist Republic of China headed by Chiang Kai-shek. But the Truman administration did not merely fail to support Chiang, it took affirmative steps that weakened him. There is abundant and concrete justification for the statement of Senator KNOWLAND of California last September "the State Department tried to bury the Republic of China a dozen times in the last 5 years."

If the dismissal of MacArthur is to become occasion for debate, it is not MacArthur that should be the issue; it is the policy the administration has followed about China during the past 6 years. Once China had fallen to communism, Korea was destined to follow. When Russian communism moved to seize South Korea, resistance to the aggression depended upon the United States. No other country was in a position to act effectively. Whether or not MacArthur was indispensable is not necessary to discuss. It can be assumed that some other commander would have been adequate, though, obviously, MacArthur, by his experience in the East and otherwise, had special qualifications.

JAPAN INDISPENSABLE

But Japan was indispensable. Without it as a base, resistance would have been logistically difficult to the point of impossibility, and the base was made more dependable by the fact that the Japanese people had come to feel affection for MacArthur and, through him, affection for the United States. Besides, they feared and hated Communist Russia and relied upon us to defend them against it.

The changes recently wrought in the world picture cannot avoid disquieting the Japanese people. It is not merely that they see a man whom they idolized removed from them. More or less simultaneously they see Britain propose that Communist China have a place in the making of the treaty of peace about to be made with Japan. They also see Britain propose that Communist China have a seat in the United Nations. They see Britain propose that Formosa be given to Communist China. That has ominous meaning, both for nearby Japan and for us. It would raise a question whether Japan could be defended. Though these proposals have been rejected by the United States, they leave disquiet in their trail.

Former Senator Frank P. Graham Pays Tribute to a Great Statesman and Southern Leader, Charles B. Aycock, in an Address to Joint Session of North Carolina Legislature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest governors any State ever produced was Charles Brantley Aycock, of North Carolina. Recently a former Senator, the Honorable Frank P. Graham, paid an appropriate tribute to this distinguished American in an address to the North Carolina Legislature.

Dr. Graham presents a scholarly and eloquent statement on the contribution that Governor Aycock made to the South's progress in education. No one is better fitted to appraise the career of Governor Aycock than this distinguished and highly respected student of the South's history. It is an honor to be the medium by which the notable address by a beloved southerner is made available to Members of the House of Representatives.

Under leave to extend it, I include the following address by Dr. Graham at the unveiling of the Howard Chandler Christy portrait of Charles B. Aycock, April 9, 1951, in Raleigh, N. C.:

First of all, I wish to express a real sense of inadequacy for the responsibility and a deep sense of gratitude for the invitation of the North Carolina Art Society and the State legislature to interpret anew the enduring meaning of the life and services of Charles Brantley Aycock. It is good from time to time to recapture even fragmentary glimpses of a man whose influence is as ever fair and as ever young as the hopes of children for whose equal opportunity he gave his life. It is altogether fitting that the portrait of this tribune of the people should be painted by a master, distinguished for his noble portraits, and should be hung in this historic hall, famous as the forum of the representatives of the people of North Carolina. May his father, who, during the War Between the States, sat in this hall as a representative of Wayne County, and his mother, whose brow, transmitted to the son, is truly preserved in this portrait, both gather in spirit with us here tonight to share in the commemoration of their son, beloved by his generation above all the sons of North Carolina.

There are certain leaders in the story of our State, who embody in their life and service the meaning of an historic period. With loyalty to the old landmarks, they lay the foundations for the new struggles and hopes toward whose fulfillment the leaders who follow go forward from generation to generation. Such a leader was Charles B. Aycock. His robust heritage was from the rugged pioneer American stock of the early eighteenth century. His democratic idealism is the very stuff of the American dream of the equal opportnuity of all children yet unfilled in the middle of the twentieth century.

I. IN THE HISTORICAL SUCCESSION OF THE LEADERSHIP OF THE SOUTHERN STATES NORTH CAROLINA BECAME A LEADER OF THE RISEN SOUTH WHEN AYCOCK BECAME THE LEADER OF NORTH CAROLINA

To catch something of the meaning of the man and his leadership, as we see him come to life again in the frame of this portrait, we must see him in the setting of the age of which he was a gallant and venturesome, kind and simple, inspiring and creative part. The historian characteristically divides our country into sections, our history into periods, and sometimes distinguishes our leaders by regions and eras.

The historians agree that, in the colonial and formative periods of American history, Virginia and Massachusetts, with the cooperation of the original colonies and States, shared a great leadership in colonization, revolution, independence, and federation. George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Richard Henry Lee, George Mason, James Madison, John Marshall, and James Monroe have made authentic the primacy of Virginia in the Old South and the pre-eminence of the sons of Virginia in the liberation and organization of the new Nation.

William E. Dodd, my old teacher, in his history of the cotton kingdom gives to South Carolina the southern leadership of the lower South in the middle period. Through the eloquence of Robert Young Hayne, the militant governorship of James Hamilton, the fiery oratory of George McDuffie, and the relentless logic of John C. Calhoun, South Carolina assumed the leadership in our section in the championship of the principles of State sovereignty and the formulation of the creed of the economic, social, and political regionalism of southern rights and institutions. Though Andrew Jackson and James K. Polk and other great southerners as strong nationalists, placed Tennessee and other Southern States high in the council's leadership of the Nation, yet, through Robert Barnwell Rhett of Charleston, along with William L. Yancey of Alabama and Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, South Carolina took the leadership in the secession and confederation of the Southern States.

In the disunion and conflict which divided the North and the South and shattered for a time the Federal union, the greatness of the mind and the nobility of the character and spirit of Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee rose above conflict and bitterness to become the spiritual resource of the reunion of the States. The Midwestern Lincoln, the emancipator of the Negro slaves, nobly magnanimous in victory, and the Virginian Lee, one of the greatest commanders of all time, teacher of youth and reconciliation, sublimely dutiful in defeat, transcended with their immortal spirit both victory and defeat in the reunion and freedom of the United States of America upon whose united strength in support of the United Nations against division and tyranny depends today the freedom and peace of the world. The example of Lincoln and Lee became an inspiration to the youth of America, North and South. The spirit of the new South was soon to be heard, first in the matchless calls of Hill and Grady, of Georgia, a little later in the great educational crusade of Curry of Alabama and Aycock of North Carolina. To all four of these the guiding star of national reconciliation and southern recovery was the nobility of the character, the teaching, and the example of Robert E. Lee.

In the era of the rise of the South from the devastation of the war and the tragedies of reconstruction, Georgia, through the valiant recovery of Atlanta and the eloquent appeals of Benjamin H. Hill and Henry Woodfin Grady, expressive of the heroic spirit of a stricken but dauntless people, became the empire State and the leader in the resurrection of the South.

In the years just before and after the turn of the century and since, North Carolina through her educational, industrial, agricultural, and spiritual pioneers, then became the leader of the risen South. Aycock became the leader of North Carolina when he led the people up from ignorance, poverty, and racial strife through schoolhouse doors, opened to all the children of the people. North Carolina became the leader of the new South when Charles B. Aycock became the leader of North Carolina. The man who in himself preserved the best traditions of a great State, provided the brave and kindly leadership for a turbulent, transitional, and creative age, envisaged the whole commonwealth, all the people, all their industries and institutions, their fears and hopes, who understood and loved them all, beloved by them all, was Charles B. Aycock. Perhaps America's greatest educational governor.

II. THE HERITAGE AND DEVELOPMENT OF CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK

Whence came this man? How did he get that way? In what soil did his rootage sustain the tall timber of his soul? We would know the stock of his heritage, robust in body, brilliant in mind, unyielding in moral power, patient and forward in his sympathies with the people in their common hopes for the equal chance of their children. Deep was his rootage in the soil of rural North Carolina. High was his faith in the people even when they reviled him. Reverent was his oneness with the moral sovereignty which undergirds the nature of man and the universe.

His heritage on both sides of the family was sturdy pioneer English stock, Baptist on his father's side and Quaker on his mother's side. The Baptist and Quaker strains were deep parts of his life and faith. Such God-fearing, self-reliant, farmer folk have long been the rugged democratic backbone of North Carolina. As pointed out by R. D. W. Connor and Clarence Poe in their authentic biography of Aycock, land grants were made to the Aycocks in Northampton County before the middle of the eighteenth century. Two of the east Carolina Aycocks were soldiers in the American Revolution. The first Federal census lists the paternal and maternal ancestors, Aycocks and Hooks, as freeholders of Wayne County lands in 1790.

His father, Benjamin Aycock, was the Wayne County clerk of the court and State legislator who stanchly supported the Confederacy in whose armies two of his sons were soldiers at the front. His mother, herself unlettered, especially inspired her youngest son with a love of learning and a championship of the equal chance for education which the State had denied to her. Charles was the youngest of her seven boys and perhaps North Carolina's most gifted son in a generation of men great in the rebuilding of an old commonwealth.

Charles B. Aycock was born near Nahunta in Wayne County, November 1, 1859, more than a year before began the war, which shook a continent with its conflict of heroic peoples and its mighty social impacts whose aftermath of ruin and bitterness, struggles and hope, became the reference frame of young Aycock and his generation. This youngest son, with a high capacity for fine feeling, was plastic to the rugged molding of the privations and memories of war, the mistakes and bitterness of reconstruction, and the hopes for a better day. In the spirit of his great forerunner in the affections of the people, Zebulon B. Vance, he accepted with his characteristic good will the "duties of defeat," as enjoined and exemplified by Lee and Vance.

With the faults, frustrations, and hopes of a lively boyhood, young Aycock learned the lessons of a simple democracy in a farm family of 10 children. In the give and take of such a family he grew to respect with kindness the rights, feelings, and personalities of other people. He learned with sympathy the ways of dogs and horses. He tilled the soil and followed the plow. He hunted foxes, wrestled with other boys in the barnyard, tramped the fields and forests, had an ear for the songs of sweet-throated birds, and the melodies and cadenced grandeur of the poets. He learned from nature, from books, from people, and from the times. He learned from the household duties and simple piety of his mother who taught him a high reverence for women, for work, and sacred things.

When he and six brothers walked miles from the farm to a subscription school, it was borne upon him that there was no public school for them and countless thousands like them. His first school was in Nahunta, since named Fremont, where Aycocks still live to give historic association to the name and place. Then at the Wilson Collegiate Institute he sat at the feet of a remarkable teacher, the Elder Sylvester Hassell; "trapped" to the top of the class just ahead of young Josephus Daniels. There young Daniels, later at Chapel Hill and in print shops, got his preparation for his life as a tribune of the people, fighting editor in the cause of the people; as Secretary under Woodrow Wilson, builder of a powerful Navy; and as Ambassador to Mexico, the champion of inter-American good neighborhood. Charles B. Aycock and Josephus Daniels, schoolmates in Wilson, became comrades in arms in the later campaigns against special privilege, tariffs, and monopolies and together fought in the great crusades for the schools of the people. At Wilson, Aycock debated with other such schoolmates as Rudolph Duffy and Frank Daniels, who became his lifelong law partner and friend. In Kinston he was further prepared for the university by Joseph H. Foy, whose influence upon him was ever after one of the precious treasures of his life.

III. INFLUENCE OF THE UNIVERSITY ON AYCOCK

In the fall of 1877, 2 years after the reopening of the university and a few months after the withdrawal of the Federal troops from the Southern States, Charles B. Aycock, fresh from the cotton fields of Wayne County, alighted from a hack in front of the old Watson Hotel in Chapel Hill, to enter the University of North Carolina. Handsome, well proportioned, studious, and with self-reliant charm, he soon became a leader of a little band of remarkable students in the reopened university, which was to open their minds and kindle their hearts with the vision of rebuilding the life of a stricken but dauntless people.

One of these college mates of Aycock, Edwin A. Alderman, has said of the university of those days:

"There was no better place, I think, for the making of leaders in the world, than Chapel Hill in the late seventies. The note of life was simple, rugged, almost primitive. Our young hearts, aflame with the impulses of youth, were quietly conscious of the vicissitudes and sufferings through which our fathers had just passed. The conquered banner and the mournful threnodies of Father Ryan were yielding to songs of hope. A heroic tradition pervaded the place, while hope and struggle, rather than despair or repining, shone in the purpose of the resolute men who were rebuilding the famous old school."

Next to the Father of us all, his mother, and the two charming Woodard sisters of Wilson, N. C., who became the mothers of his eight children, Alma Mater and her sons were, by his own testament, deep and abiding influences in his life. Historic halls of the first State university buildings in America, with the hills and forests around, stirred his imagination with the traditions of the great past of the State and the hopes of the people for greater days to come. In these woods the veterans of the Revolution founded the university of the people. Here studied, played, and dreamed the youth who reached the highest offices and leadership of the State and Nation. The little group of professors, wisely gathered by President Battle carried on the high scholarly traditions of the university in which Charles Aycock, though weak in mathematics, soon excelled in the classics, political economy, and philosophy. He became under their inspiration a master of ideas, words, and logic. He was a match for all contenders in the Phi Society. He early became a leader of the student body and especially of a company of gallant souls who were soon intent upon the educational business of transforming an old State into a new commonwealth.

Unprecedented in the history of the university before or since, in protest at what was considered faculty interference with their elections, the insurgent students elected Charles Aycock the chief marshal during his first year. This story is graphically told by Judge Robert W. Winston, his college mate, life-long friend, and his partner in a great law firm, in his brilliant university day eulogy of Aycock. This turning to him by the students of the university for leadership in a muddled situation was prophetic of the call to him by the people of North Carolina for leadership in troublous times toward better days.

Along with James Y. Joyner and three score other students, Charles Aycock joined the Baptist Church at Chapel Hill under the influence of a young minister, A. C. Dixon, one of the legion of ministers, teachers, writers, governors, judges, legislators, and builders with whom Wake Forest College has blessed the North Carolina of Aycock's generation and since.

Under the wise and kindly President Battle he doubled his courses to study law in his senior year. He also came under the influence of the spirit of a brave woman whose unresting pen in letters to her boys had spurred former governors and countless alumni and legislators to reopen the university. It was the valiant Cornelia Phillips Spencer, who in 1875 climbed to the belfry in the South Building in which Aycock was later to room and rang the college bell which had not rung in Chapel Hill for 5 years. The woman who rang the bell thus announced in spirit to the generation of Charles Aycock that the university was reopened and that the historic institutions of the people were on the march again.

IV. COOPERATION OF ALL INSTITUTIONS

The momentum of the traditions, services, and hopes of almost a hundred years could not be ended by the turbulent times which had closed the university's doors. Noble colleges of the churches for men and for women, historic private academies, and a few public schools had kept the lamps of learning burning during those dark times.

May we, in the spirit of Aycock and in our gratitude, say for them all, both church related and privately endowed institutions, all hail for their great role through the years and all success in the campaigns for building nobler mansions of the mind and soul of youth. It was for this that the university was reopened in 1875, consolidated in renewed and reinforcing strength with the Women's College and the State College in 1931, both founded as products of the great democratic educational crusade. This University of Aycock, this university of the people is the cooperative partner of all the schools and colleges, public, denominational, and private, under the distinguished and devoted leadership of Gordon Gray in able cooperation with Controller W. D. Carmichael, Jr., and the chancelors, R. B. House, J. W. Harrelson, and E. K. Graham II, who has just succeeded the able and beloved Chancelor W. C. Jackson, teacher and biographer of the life and spirit of Aycock.

V. THE GREAT CRUSADE

In the year 1877, in which Charles Aycock entered the reopened university, there was a need for a democratic State-wide system of public schools to undergird all our colleges, industries, institutions, and enterprises of the common life and liberate great bodies of the people from poverty and privilege, prejudice and ignorance, into creative cooperation for a better life for all people.

With the coming to Chapel Hill in one student generation of Charles B. Aycock, Edwin A. Alderman, Charles D. McIver, James Y. Joyner, Locke Craig, M. C. Noble, W. J. Peele, Robert P. Pell, Francis D. Winston, Robert W. Winston, R. A. Doughton, James S. Manning, Robert S. Strange, Horace Williams, Frank Daniels, Charles R. Thomas, and other teachers, builders, and dreamers, something deep and creative happened in the history of North Carolina.

The night on which some of these graduated, two of them, Edwin A. Alderman and Charles D. McIver, later founder of the Woman's College, in the presence of the heritage of Archibald De Bow and Calvin H. Wiley and in the presence of the challenge of much ignorance and poverty in the general life, talked far through the night. As one of them later said in recalling this night that "toward morning 'by a light that was never seen on land or sea'," they had resolved to give their lives to educating the people to the need of education. It had become the stuff of their convictions, under God, that the public schools were the chief hope of a more creative and nobler commonwealth for which they had been preparing as they dreamed their dreams on the holy hill of their great dedication.

From the fires burning on that hill and in other schools and colleges of the State, the torches were lighted for the educational crusade which was to become the inspiring part of an industrial, agricultural, and cultural renaissance. Through dynamic interconnection with movements in other States, this crusade was beginning to stir the hopes of the people for a better day for their children.

Goldsboro, where Charles B. Aycock had been teacher and county superintendent and was now, as the rising attorney in eastern North Carolina, the chairman of the school board, became the front and center of the educational revival. Edward P. Moses, the superintendent, was brilliantly aflame with the new evangelism and at the Chapel Hill summer school for teachers communicated the flames lighted there and at Goldsboro to the people of the State. Within a brief period there had come to Goldsboro E. P. Moses, from Tennessee; Aycock, Alderman, later president of three universities; Joyner, the extraordinary organizer of the fruits of the Aycock campaigns, and later president of the National Educational Association; Julius Foust, later president of the Woman's College; and Thomas Foust, all from Chapel Hill; Eugene C. Brooks, later the dynamic State superintendent of public instruction and able president of State College, from Trinity College with its great traditions of Braxton Craven and his Normal College at Old Trinity; and leaders and teachers from Wake Forest College, Davidson College, Guilford College, and especially from the woman's colleges in this capital and other strategic towns, and all the other colleges of the State. The State superintendents, Scarborough, Finger, and Mebane were pointing the way.

Goldsboro, under the chairmanship of Aycock, became one of the main proving grounds and the outpost, from which Aycock moved out to lead the bold and brilliant State-wide movement of the people for the education by public taxation of all the children of all the people.

Against the possibility of the fires burning out with sporadic bursts of popular zeal, the urgent need was the championship of laymen, businessmen, farmers, politicians, and parties. The popular crusade, bravely launched by wise and eloquent educators in the Southern States and aided by philanthropic funds in the North, needed the championship of a statesman who with clear analysis, homely illustration, simple logic, profound insight, and flaming zeal, could identify the values of the public schools with both the common work of the people's life and the noble vision of the people's hopes for the equal opportunity of all children, white and black, in the towns and on the farms. The need was for the commitment of a great leader and a great State to a great cause. The man, the place, the cause, and the opportunity came together in North Carolina in 1900 in Charles Brantley Aycock when he committed the people of North Carolina to public taxation for the education of all the children of all the people. The standard he carried through many campaigns and raised aloft at the turn of the century for the turning of this commonwealth has been carried forward by every Governor of North Carolina from the peerless son of Wayne, Charles B. Aycock, to the fighting son of Alamance, W. Kerr Scott.

Near the turn of the century, three stubborn barriers stood across the way up which Aycock would lead the people into the promised land of education and cooperation. The first barrier, as a part of the aftermath of the war, emancipation and reconstruction, was interracial strife and fears attended by the economic and political exploitation of the Negro. The second barrier was the traditional aversion of the people to taxation and especially the taxation of people of property for the education of the children of poor whites and Negroes, both of whom were considered shiftless and incapable of education. The third barrier was much public apathy and indifference to education based on too widespread illiteracy and poverty.

VI. THE THREEFOLD AYCOCK PROGRAM

Charles B. Aycock declared war on ignorance, poverty, privileged education, and the political exploitation of the illiterate Negroes. He became the successful and popular leader of the movement which had three parts: First, the immediate disfranchisement of the illiterate Negroes; second, the disfranchisement of both illiterate whites and illiterate Negroes after 1908; and, third, public taxation for the education of all children of both whites and Negroes as a basis for increasingly more equal opportunity of all people, white and black, to earn and to vote as the common rights of the citizens of the Commonwealth.

It was the first part of his threefold program which won for him a large majority. The second and third parts were the objects of terrific assaults. The wide popularity which had come to him from the first part was dedicated to the fulfillment of the second and third parts of the program. The suggestion to falter and halt in the fulfillment of the whole program was considered by him to be suggestions for the breaking of pledges given by his party and himself, violations of his personal honor, a failure in more equal opportunity for the poorer whites, a monstrous injustice to the defenseless Negroes and a prostitution of his party and his State.

He declared a new and indignant war on three such suggestions. He valiantly withstood the movement to postpone indefinitely the date of 1908 for the disfranchisement of the illiterate whites and was opposed to devices for the disfranchisement of illiterate Negroes after 1908. He met with hot scorn the suggestion to use the taxes paid by each race for the education of the children of that race. He refused to consider the suggestion for common taxation for the existing school terms and separate taxation of the races for any addition to the school terms.

Once when some friends told him that the movement was gathering strength for the separation of the taxes for the respective apportionment to the schools of the races, he answered simply in case that were done he would resign his office as Governor and retire to private life. He would thus have expressed his sense of personal dishonor and aroused the public indignation for the dishonor of the State whose people he respected and loved too much to betray for any office in their power to give.

Even his own county of Wayne joined many other counties in supporting separation of taxes. He was told not to speak his cause at the Democratic convention in Greensboro in 1904, because the mass of people gathered there would howl him down. With the great friend of education, former Gov. Thomas J. Jarvis, at his spiritual side, he made one of the great speeches of his life, unfaltering to the end in support of common taxation for the education of all children. The ovation given him that day was a landmark in the history of North Carolina and the South. On that day Aycock became the triumphant leader of North Carolina and North Carolina became the new leader of the South.

VII. FOUR PERIODS OF INTERRACIAL RELATIONS

We see him historically now, more clearly in the context of better relations between the races in the South. The relations of the races in the South have four main periods. First was the period of the institution of slavery, inherited from the ancient and medieval world, quickly found unprofitable in the North, and found for a time to be profitable in the South with the illusion of privileges which enslaved the blacks and disinherited millions of whites. Slavery could not endure without a denial of the teachings of our religion, without the renunciation of our democracy, and without the erosion of the economic foundations of the freedom, dignity, and enterprise of the human spirit.

The second period was the period of reconstruction based on the premature enfranchisement of the exploited freedmen and the disfranchisement of the conquered Confederate whites. This domination of the whites by the carpet bag regimes backed by Federal bayonets engendered and contributed to much southern fear, bitterness, and violence for a generation.

The third period was the period of intimidation of the blacks by the whites, the disfranchisement of the Negroes, and too much exploitation of the Negroes without the equal opportunity to learn the meaning of citizenship, to work with higher skills of hand and brain, and to vote as a citizen of our State and Nation.

The fourth period evolved from the tragedies and lessons of slavery and war, the carpetbag-freedmen domination of the whites and the white counterintimidation and exploitation of the then illiterate blacks. This fourth period was a period not of domination and counterintimidation but of education and cooperation. Booker T. Washington, who worked his way through Hampton Institute in Virginia and founded Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, preached the gospel of education, honest work, and personal worthiness as the basis of the new orientation for human progress in the relation of the races. The eloquent statesmanship of Booker T. Washington, J. L. M. Curry, Edgar Gardner Murphy, all of Alabama; the Peabody Board, the Southern Education Board, the Southern Education Conference, the Slater Fund, other private benefactions, and the long gathering momentum of the crusades of Alderman and McIver and their valiant cohorts in North Carolina, all contributed to this period of education and cooperation.

The head and front of this fourth period was the political leader who risked his vast popularity, staked his personal honor, committed his party and his State, and dedicated his vast powers of body, mind, and flaming spirit to the cause of common public taxation for the education of all children.

Aycock talked and preached education in every county in North Carolina and in States from Maine to Florida as a flaming evangel sent from God for the education and redemption of all the children of men. For every day of every year of his administration as Governor, a new schoolhouse arose in North Carolina. The last word he said on this earth as he dropped dead in Birmingham speaking to the teachers of Alabama, was the word "education." The last sentence of the last message to the people in which he was to have announced his candidacy for the United States Senate, published after his death, were these words:

"Equal! That is the word. On that word I plant myself and my party—the equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity to burgeon out all that there is within him."

VIII. PRESENT OPPORTUNITIES OF PEOPLES OF GOOD WILL OF BOTH RACES TO COOPERATE FOR FEASIBLE STEPS FOR NOBLER RELATIONS OF THE RACES IN AMERICA

Toward the fulfillment of the hopes of Aycock, the American dream of the founders of the Republic, and the teachings of our religion, the people of good will of both races in the North and the South need to get together for nobler relations of the races in America on some such feasible measures and ideas as the following:

1. In view of the origin, history, and power of the "mores" of peoples based on the universal consciousness of kind, an historic social heritage, the degree of the visibility of the difference between races, the largeness of the members of the groups involved and the economic competition of the low-income groups, there is needed a new emphasis on the influence of religion, education, personal kindness, decent respect for the human dignity of persons, and voluntary cooperation of people of good will for better relations in the local communities, in the long haul of the generations for justice on this earth. To our good northern friends, I emphasize the unwisdom of using Federal compulsions and force at educational levels beyond the levels of acceptance by the people in the States. Such unwise compulsions cause bitter set-backs not enduring progress which mainly comes from within the minds and hearts of the majority of the people in the States.

2. Federal aid to education under State and local control for the more equal education of all the children in all the States.

3. Local-State-Federal cooperation for the prevention of even one lynching by a mob in the South or a gang in the North.

4. Abolition of the poll tax. If Senators and Congressmen pledge their support of prompt ratification in their States, then the most expeditious and feasible way would be by constitutional amendment, originally sponsored in the Senate by the distinguished Governor and lately lamented Senator from North Carolina, J. M. Broughton.

5. Admission of Negroes at the graduate and professional level where equal facilities are not provided in State institutions in acceptance of the established principles and spirit of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court as the supreme law of the land in the States as well as in the Nation. In case separate facilities are under State laws then provision for equal facilities in schools, libraries, extension services, roads, hospitals, sanitation, health, welfare, and equal justice under law. In cases where churches and private endowments have not provided equal facilities, the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary has already pointed the voluntary way for denominational and private, professional and graduate schools.

6. The acceptance of the right of Negroes qualified by education to vote in primaries and general elections. The right to be taxed, to be drafted and to die for one's country carries the right to vote as a qualified citizen of our common country.

7. Voluntary cooperation of labor and management and of private and public facilities in the employment of workers, on the basis of competence, needed for maximum production and the national defense of the very human freedom and dignity now imperilled by denials of opportunity from within and by assaults of totalitarian tyranny from without.

8. Over-all and under-all, the dauntless recognition of the brotherhood of all men and the fatherhood of one God "Who made of one blood all the nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth."

By democratic logic, these are contemporary translations of the basic ideas and long range hopes of Thomas Jefferson and Charles B. Aycock.

IX. AYCOCK AND JEFFERSON

From the hill and shrine of Monticello near Charlottesville in the spring of his dauntless hopes there came down into the valleys of men's struggles, a tall, red-haired, sunny-faced young man to take up his battles for human freedom, national independence, religious liberty, public education, equal opportunity, and the abolition of the slave trade as a step in the ultimate abolition of human slavery. The history of America, with all its faults and frustrations, is humanely different because of the life, sufferings and battles of Thomas Jefferson in the cause of human liberty and equal opportunity for all.

From a historic hill in the woods of North Carolina there returned to his people a tall, blue-eyed, sandy-haired, brilliant, and eloquent young man to take up his life-long struggles for the freedom of the mind and the equality of opportunity through the schools of the people. The history of North Carolina, and the South, with all our faults and frustrations, is hopefully different because of the life, sufferings, and battles of Charles B. Aycock in the cause of the liberties of the people and the equal opportunities of their children.

CONCLUSION

The unveiling of this portrait is the symbol of the ever unfolding life of Charles B. Aycock in the life of this Commonwealth of his struggles and his dreams. In this hour we are desperately reminded that his ideas and hopes for the freedom of the human mind, the dignity of the human being, and the equal opportunity and enterprise of the human spirit are imperiled by the most monstrous threats of totalitarian tyranny. May the commemoration of the life and character of Charles Brantley Aycock mean the rededication of all to the ideas and struggles, carried forward by the United States of America, as the leader, under God, of the free peoples of the earth, in a stronger United Nations, as the best hope of human freedom, equal opportunity, and peace in the world.

Postage Stamps Commemorating Centennial of Territorial Government of the State of Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington.

House Joint Memorial 1

Joint memorial relating to the issuance of commemorative postage stamps commemorating the centennial of the Territorial government of the State of Washington

To the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, and to the Honorable Jesse M. Donaldson, Postmaster General of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition as follows:

Whereas the Territorial government of the State of Washington was instituted and created in the year 1853; and

Whereas it is eminently fitting, proper and necessary that the centennial of the Territorial government be fittingly observed; and

Whereas it is necessary that proper and timely plans be made for the observance and celebration of said centennial; and

Whereas celebrations, educational meetings, pageants, exhibits, and exhibitions depicting the growth of Washington will be held and many books and publications will be published; and

Whereas services in honor of distinguished Washingtonians who have contributed to its growth and illustrious history will be held in commemoration; and

Whereas such celebration of our centennial should be noted and observed not alone by the proud citizens of the State of Washington but also by the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, That we respectfully petition the President and the Postmaster General of the United States that the Postmaster General issue suitable commemorative postage stamps recognizing and honoring the centennial of the institution of the Territorial government of the State of Washington; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from the State of Washington.

Spencer A. Canary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, one of the great editors of northwestern Ohio passed away on Wednesday last. His life was that of a pioneer editor with vast experiences in the everyday life of America. His editorials, including that of the day of his death, were an exposition of America.

From my first days in the Congress he graciously shared his vast experiences of a busy newspaper life and I shall be always grateful for that opportunity of learning the American way of life as lived and expressed by Spencer A. Canary.

I want to include the story from the Daily Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio, which he loved and served when "30" came:

S. A. CANARY'S LONG COMMUNITY SERVICE ENDED BY DEATH

Yesterday was "30" for Editor Spencer A. Canary, of the Daily Sentinel-Tribune. This symbol, used by all newspaper folk, means the end of the story or the final piece of copy for an edition of the paper.

Our editor passed away last night at 10 o'clock. His passing came with shocking swiftness while he and his wife were discussing plans for arising early this morning to start a motor trip through the Southern States. They were planning to be gone about a month and intended to let their whim and fancy choose their daily destinations.

His preparations for the trip were almost prophetic. He had cleared his desk late yesterday and had bid goodbyes to all the members of the editorial and business staffs.

In turning out the editorial which appeared in yesterday's paper he stated "This is my last editorial. I won't be writing any more after today." This naturally was understood by all to mean that he was not going to bother to write editorials during his extended vacation trip. The shocking truth of the statement came to us with frank reality today.

He was looking forward to the trip with great anticipation. He had just come in possession of a new automobile, the gift of one of his sons, and he had advised Mrs. Canary to pack sufficient clothing for at least a month of touring.

After his usual evening of reading and watching of a television program, he followed Mrs. Canary upstairs, carrying some freshly laundered clothes up to the top landing. On arriving there he sat on the edge of the cedar chest to chat about final plans with Mrs. Canary, advising her that they would arise early in the morning and travel a while before eating breakfast somewhere along the way.

In the midst of their conversation he started to slump over and slowly slid to the floor without a cry or a sound. A doctor was summoned and he stated that Mr. Canary had died instantly of a stroke; that he had suffered no pain.

The news of his sudden death spread rapidly in spite of the lateness of the hour.

The final rites will be held Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock at the Young Memorial with Rev. Murray Drysdale officiating. The interment will be in the Oak Grove Cemetery. Friends may call at the memorial Friday afternoon after 4 o'clock and during that evening as well as Saturday morning.

Spencer Andrews Canary was born in Bowling Green on May 13, 1874, to John W. and Celia E. (Duncan) Canary, the latter a niece of Gen. William H. Gibson. He was 76 years 11 months and 5 days old at the time of his death.

As a small boy Spence peddled onions in mornings before school and did all sorts of odd jobs for small fees. Starting at the age of 13 he worked on farms nearby during the summer months, his first job involving a daily 7-mile walk to and from the pasture to take care of the cows.

He was proud of the fact that his earliest newspaper experience came when he peddled the Toledo News Bee and Toledo Blade here. He continued to show his great industry by accepting employment as a house-to-house canvasser, one of his items being the standard dictionary when it first came out in 1895.

Spence was possessed of a very keen mind and very great perceptive powers and they were displayed in his school days at Bowling Green High School when he was the salutatorian of his senior class in 1894. In grammar school he won a scholarship in Tri-State Business College for the highest scholarship in the class and he accepted it to take a course in stenography there.

His experience then took him to the schools, first as a janitor and then as a teacher in the seventh grade in Bowling Green. Later he worked industrial life insurance for Metropolitan Life in Toledo.

The early days of photography invited his curiosity and he has often told how he "Huck Finned" on the old Miami canal with a tintype gallery man. One of his most exciting experiences came during a storm when Spence was playing the part of the tow-path mule and he saved his aged partner from death by preventing the ship from going over the old Independence Dam. Another time they experienced a tornado while tenting around Florida and Ridgeville Corners in that area of Ohio.

He enjoyed public debate and joined his brother, Russell, in Seneca County to participate in semimonthly debates in the country schoolhouse. This experience brought him in close touch with public problems and during that time he became the chairman of the first meeting in Bloom township, Seneca County, on a stone road proposal.

Nor was he afraid of hard labor for he worked for 6 months in the 22-foot France Stone Quarry near Bloomville and was always proud of the fact that he never bushed or quit because of fatigue or heat.

Before the turn of the century brought him into the newspaper business, Mr. Canary was stenographer for lawyers, a lumber company and the B. & O. commercial freight office in Toledo.

All of this vast human experience formed a very excellent background for this outstanding newspaperman who first became a reporter for the old Sentinel on November 5, 1900. He became its business manager on January 6, 1902, when he and John T. Hutchinson bought that paper and he served in that capacity until July 1, 1905, when he sold his interest and engaged in book selling before returning to the paper in December of that year.

In October 1907, he bought an interest in the Sentinel-Tribune when the two papers consolidated and he was associate editor until April 1909, when he became the editor of this paper. This month saw him completing his forty-second year as the head of the editorial department of the Daily Sentinel-Tribune.

During that time he covered every type of story possible to experience on a small-town paper. Spence was particularly proud of his prodigies, all reporters whom he had personally trained and had seen develop into able newspaper people.

His personal guidance and teaching formed the entire professional background of three members of the present editorial staff and to him they owe all the credit for what they know about reporting. These are our Society Editor Miss Minniebelle Conley, Neighborhood Editor Wayne R. Coller, and Managing Editor Ivan E. Lake.

Others who have benefited by his liberal advice and guidance include Ross Householder, a mining engineer now in Kingman, Ariz.; Larry Newman, associate editor of the American Weekly Magazine in New York City; Fred Beyerman, assistant city editor of the Chicago Daily News; Don Wolfe, State editor of the Toledo Blade; Homer L. Brady, executive secretary of the Sandusky Chamber of Commerce; Don Shafer, personnel manager with the Owen-Illinois Corp. in Toledo.

Spence was a highly skilled reporter and was recognized far and wide as one of the finest small-city editorial writers in the country. He did not care for the routine of copy desk work and after 1924 he left those tedious duties to others while he covered various beats as a reporter.

There was no better interviewer. No one probed a story to its finest point with any more fervor than he. Our editor was a living example of the energetic reporter who loved the people that he wrote about; who was wa. devoted to this community whose streets breathed their lives out in confidence to him; whose stores, homes, and institutions were living personalities who depended upon the press as their champion.

He began to relax his attentions to news coverage several years before World War II and to spend more time devoting care to his editorial column, the special part of the paper which was strictly his own. But when America became involved in the world conflict and there were no young men available for handling the routine reporting jobs at the courthouse and around the town, Spence again trod the streets to apply his skills to the task.

Mr. Canary unquestionably was a victim of the war. The rugged daily job eventually took its toll. On May 24, 1945, he was a victim of a stroke of paralysis. At that time no one thought that he would write again but his indomitable will, his marvelous courage and his supreme desire to continue his work brought him through.

After many months of convalescence he returned to the office to resume his place and he continued to write editorials with only brief let-ups for vacations until his sudden death last night.

Not many people knew it, but his first stroke took away his ability to manipulate his fingers on a typewriter and every editorial that he had written since that time was in longhand, produced after hours of reading and study of the innumerable problems of the present day.

His record of public service is one with which few persons are familiar because, in true modesty, his activities were never played up in the news of the day. Spence was forever a booster of Bowling Green and Wood County.

He was three times secretary of the Republican Executive Committee and was also secretary of the Central Committee.

In 1904 he and William M. Coen, now deceased, conceived and promoted the City Board of Trade, which was the forerunner of the old Commercial Club, now known as the Chamber of Commerce. When it became known as the Commercial Club in 1910, he was the first secretary and served for 12 years as a director.

It was early in the latter time that Bowling Green suddenly displayed a new growth, winning the fight to gain the Normal School (Bowling Green State University) and being successful in gaining the present armory and post office buildings. He was a very influential figure in every civic enterprise. He was always liberal in support of various enterprises which came to Bowling Green as the result of such community backing.

When the Parent-Teachers Association was organized in Bowling Green he was its first president and continued as a supporter of it always. He served as secretary and president of the Town and Gown Club before his resignation in 1937.

Fraternally he was a Mason, an Elk, a Knight of Pythias, being a past chancellor commander of the latter and was a member of the Royal Arcanum.

He was a member of the Presbyterian Church and had served as secretary of its board of trustees.

The very nature of his position as editor of this county's only daily paper brought him in close association with all types of enterprises and community endeavors. He was associated with J. R. Mann, of Lake Township, in promoting the Wood County Improvement Association of which J. S. Brigham was the temporary chairman and he (Canary) was the secretary until it could be organized among the active farmers. The association was later merged into the Wood County Farm Bureau, being the county nucleus.

Mr. Canary took a very great pride in the part that he played in the preservation to the public of the Maumee River road largely along the line of the old trail. He initiated the fight for its preservation editorially and served as secretary of the fighting organization of which the late George J. Munger, Jr., of Perrysburg, was president. He prepared, wrote, and read the arguments in favor of its preservation. This fight extended from 1917 but was particularly active from May 2, 1927, until the letting of the road improvement on August 30, 1928. That fight prevented the road from being thrown back from the river for the sake of private interests that urged it.

It was natural that this activity should find him also being interested in the history of the Maumee Valley, and so he was a member of the Maumee River Scenic and Historic Association and served as its vice president. This group secured the present park system along the Maumee River. Appointment came through Ohio's Governors George White and John W. Bricker.

An honorary membership in the Ohio Archeological Society evidenced the high esteem in which his work was held by that group. He was included among the editors of the Museum Echo, which is the periodical publication of that organization.

In his humility and belief that he could best serve the public in his editorial capacity rather than by being an active participant in many projects, he often declined official appointments by many of Ohio's governors to various other boards.

Twice he was offered opportunities to accept appointments to the board of trustees of Bowling Green State University, but he would not accept because he felt he could be of greater service in an editorial way if he was not involved officially with the university.

Spencer lived a full life and he loved it. There was very little in the world in which he was not interested. His hobby was human nature. He loved young people. He enjoyed studying all people in the light of phrenology. The Tope School of Phrenology once conferred the honorary title of doctor of phrenology on him in recognition of his knowledge of the subject.

Proper exercise to keep fit was another hobby he enjoyed. It was unquestionably to this that he could credit his remarkable recovery after the 1945 stroke. In sports he was interested especially in boxing, billiards, and scenic motoring.

One of his deepest disappointments in life was the fact that he never got into active service during the Spanish-American War. His father and his mother's brothers were in the Civil War and his ancestors had fought in the Revolutionary War. He did join two "paper" companies and served in two drill companies but was never accepted by Uncle Sam.

In World War I he served in bond campaigns, was a member of the executive committee for the county's war work social service organizations, assisted in Red Cross drives and various other patriotic endeavors.

On December 8, 1903, he was united in marriage to Lucy Lee Chaney, daughter of John and Sarah Chaney in Bowling Green, whose grandfather had served in Congress with John Quincy Adams. To this union were born three sons. Their home was an ideal one and they were most proud of the successful careers of the three boys.

His wife, whom he affectionately called "Duke," and the three sons survive. The latter are John Sumner, an attorney in Cleveland, Robert Barnhard, chief of the division of social administration in the State welfare department in Columbus, and Richard Lee, wholesale distributor of Kelly-Springfield tires of Columbus. Five grandchildren, a niece, Mrs. Celia Mooers-Squires of San Diego, Calif., and a nephew, Wayne Canary, of Toleda, also survive.

He was the last of his immediate family. Preceding him were sisters Mrs. Irene Mooers and Miss Helen Canary, and a brother Russell.

Loyalty of Americans of Rumanian Descent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a resolution unanimously adopted by American Orthodox citizens of Rumanian descent in Detroit, Mich., on February 18, 1951, showing the loyalty and devotion of Americans of Rumanian descent to the principles of American democracy and their determination not to permit Communist-inspired interference with freedom of their religion:

RESOLUTION

Following the disturbance created among American Orthodox of Rumanian descent by the unauthorized elevation of the former Akron, Ohio, priest, Andrei Moldovan, to the rank of bishop for the Orthodox Rumanians of America an act sanctioned and promoted by the Communist Rumanian Government of Bucharest:

We, representatives and members of 21 religious, fraternal, cultural, and social organizations of Rumanian background, from Detroit, Mich., and Windsor, Ontario, called all American citizens of Rumanian descent to a mass meeting, held February 18, 1951, in the large hall of the Rumanian Home, 1423 Farnsworth Street, Detroit. At this meeting the following resolution was unanimously approved:

"Whereas the Communist government of Rumania, by its terroristic and antidemocratic actions, excluded itself from the respect and consider tion of the civilized world;

"Whereas said government, imposed upon the freedom-loving Rumanian Nation by force, tyrannizes the nation from which we or our ancestors have come to this country;

"Whereas said Rumanian Communist Government's actions are wholly contrary to the aspirations, principles, and freedoms guaranteed by our American form of democratic government;

"Whereas said Communist Government of Rumania sanctioned and has caused the consecration into a bishop on November 12, 1950, in Sibiu, Rumania, of the former Rumanian Orthodox priest of Akron, Ohio, Andrei Moldovan;

"Whereas at the ceremony of Moldovan's consecration the Communist Rumanian Government was officially represented by its Minister of Religion, Stanciu Stoian;

Whereas said Andrei Moldovan was sent immediately by the Rumanian Communist authorities to the United States in order to impose him, illegally, and by force, as the head of the Rumanian Orthodox Church of America;

"Whereas the great majority of the members of our organization are of Orthodox faith;

"We resolve to reject with all possible contempt the unsolicited interference of the Rumanian Communist Government into our religious affairs in the United States;

"We categorically refuse to recognize Andrei Moldovan, appointed by a foreign Communist government, to be the bishop or head of the Rumanian Church of America."

Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the Senate of the United States unanimously confirmed the nomination of Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming to be this Nation's Ambassador to Costa Rica. It was not the first time that General Fleming had been confirmed to a post of responsibility in the Government. He may even hold some sort of a record, because he has been confirmed as Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, Federal Works Administrator, member of the Maritime Commission—then designated Chairman—and as the first Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation. So General Fleming's brilliant career as a civilian administrator is well known to all of us here in official Washington.

General Fleming was graduated from West Point at the head of his class just 40 years ago, in 1911, so this year's reunion of his class at the Academy will be the historic one for them. Just 20 years ago, however, the then Major Fleming had won the acclaim of the sports world for the job he had done in rehabilitating West Point's athletic program. Quentin Reynolds then, as now, one of the ablest writers of our times, told of Fleming's work in one of the last columns he wrote for the New York World before it was sold.

A copy of this clipping recently came to light, and so that it will not again be lost I have obtained permission to extend these remarks and include Quentin Reynolds' Looking 'Em Over column from the New York World of 1931 in the RECORD at this point:

LOOKIN 'EM OVER

(By Quentin Reynolds)

FLEMING OF WEST POINT OWNS TREASURE BEYOND PURSE OF MERE ROCKEFELLER

Philip B. Fleming gets the comparatively modest pay allowance of a major in the United States Army, but right now Philip B. Fleming comes very close to being the richest man in the world. No, Major Fleming hasn't been pyramiding that Auburn stock to dizzy profits; he hasn't been buying low and selling high; he has been involved in no get-rich-quick scheme. But on a table in his dining room at West Point, Major Fleming has a little bit of silver which must make him feel very wealthy, indeed. It is the only thing of its kind in the world. It is something which didn't cost the major a cent, but it's something that he wouldn't sell for anything. Now, if you own something which no one has money enough to buy, you certainly must be one of the world's richest men. That's how it is with Major Fleming.

It all started 4 years ago when Fleming was made graduate manager of athletics at West Point. Of course, it really started long before that. It was in 1907 that Fleming was appointed to West Point from Iowa. He was graduated from the Academy in 1911 at the head of his class. But he graduated as a private in his cadet regiment, not as a lieutenant. He had been reduced to the ranks for rather a heinous offense.

Fleming was manager of the football team then, and once, after a hard practice, he sat with the football team at dinner. Some gold-braided officer interrupted the meal to read a long list of orders. The players were all exhausted and hungry after 3 hours of hard scrimmage, and young Fleming, in charge of the training table, with a fine disregard for discipline, said to them: "Go on and eat, never mind that guy," or words to that effect. So the sounds of the gold-braided officer's speech were punctuated by the less-dignified noise of the clash of knife and fork as the hungry athletes went to work on the dinner.

Other officers, horrified at this act of lese majesty, came scurrying up to the table and began hurling imprecations on the heads of the tired football men.

Shows officers alighting place

"It wasn't their fault," Fleming said quietly, "I told them to go ahead and eat. They've had a tough day and they're hungry."

So Fleming took the rap. They demoted him to a private of cadets. Maybe Fleming has forgotten that story now. I heard it from one of his classmates who happened to be one of those hungry football players.

But he lived that episode down quickly enough. Fleming attracted attention right away, because he was a great engineer in the making, and the Army higher-ups didn't take long to discover the fact. He rose rapidly by virtue of excellent work in connection with the building of the Panama Canal and mapping and surveying the Philippine Islands. He was a captain now. In 1917 he was commissioned a major. During the war he commanded Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind., with a garrison of 14,000 men. In 1916 he was transferred to West Point. In 1927 Fleming was made graduate manager of West Point, and that was the best break West Point ever received.

Now we're getting nearer to that bit of silver. Part of his job as graduate manager was to meet the writers who accompanied the Army team on trips. He was Major Fleming for a while, but it wasn't long before he was just Phil Fleming. He never realized it, but every time he sat around talking to sports writers he was doing a magnificent job of salesmanship. He was selling West Point. After a while Fleming and West Point became synonymous. When you thought of the Point you thought of Fleming.

At the Army-Notre Dame game in Chicago last fall we all had a lot of fun. Fleming was always with the writers. We all worked together. We played together. On the way home, in the Army special, Fleming casually mentioned that his time was about up at West Point and that he would be transferred very shortly. Why, the thought was incredible. West Point without Phil Fleming? Absurd. Why, how could the Point get along without this dapper little major with his smiling eyes? And how could we all get along without him? Consternation fell upon us.

Out to get even with Fleming

"We have to do something about Phil," someone said. "Let's give him a little something to remember us by."

Plans were made. This wasn't going to be a dinner honoring the Army or West Point. What did we care about West Point? We cared about this gallant friend of ours. So the other night Phil Fleming was guest of honor at a small dinner. Fleming has a host of Army friends in the city, but none of them were there. We didn't invite them. You see, this was just our way of slapping this fellow on the back and saying, "You are a pretty swell guy, Phil, and we're going to miss you." We didn't want a gang of Army officers there. That would have made it more or less formal and stereotyped. This was just a get-together like those we had in Chicago. It was no formal dinner. Why, there weren't even formal speeches. There were only about 20 present. All except four or five were sports writers. Lou Little of Columbia, Maj. Ralph Sasse of West Point, Tuss McLaughery of Brown, Hugo Bezdek of Penn State and Lou Young of Pennsylvania were present. They are all old friends of Phil.

There wasn't even a story written about the dinner. This wasn't something to be covered. We even had an orchestra. It was Grantland Rice who told the orchestra that this was a Navy party, so everyone entered the dining room to the strains of Anchors Aweigh. There was never a dinner like this one. No one present said a good word about Fleming. There were none of the usual sloppy sentimental speeches with which such affairs usually abound. You see, everything was on the level, and when you are really on the level, you don't spend a long time writing out eulogistic speeches which sound very pretty but don't mean very much.

Westbrook Pegler was at his satirical best castigating the guest of the evening. Bill Corum, George Daley, Paul Gallico, George Trevor, Bob Kelly and other football writers all told Fleming how glad they were that West Point had finally decided to get rid of him. Everything was off the record. The more we lambasted Fleming, the broader he smiled. He was storing up glorious memories. Then we gave him the little piece of silver.

Genuine silver in token at that

On it was engraved: "To the Hero of Major Engagements, 1927–31—From the War Correspondents." Now, I don't remember that ever happening before. I don't recall any graduate manager, football coach, boxer or ball player ever being singled out by a group of sports writers for such an honor. Phil Fleming gave a little talk at the windup. Ralph Sasse introduced him, and told him that he was going on last, like any acrobat.

Pegler corrected him. "They always put the star bout on last," he said.

Fleming tried to get serious and tell us how he felt about it. But we all knew how he felt, just as he knew how we felt, and we kidded him out of it. But he did hint that there is some chance that he won't be retired from West Point. This is a great chance for the Army to show a streak of real smartness. They ought to keep that guy there. He has quite an important job, because, although his actual task may be merely to supervise athletics and arrange and approve of schedules, his real job is bigger than that. His real job is to sell the Army to the rest of us and to maintain friendly relations with colleges and the public. That's not the easiest job in the world, for there are many who like to make the Army an object of attack. It's easy to attack the Army, because the Army is too big to hit back.

Well, anyhow, that's the story about the richest man in the world. And if you don't think he is, just try and buy that little piece of silver from him.

Senator Kilgore on the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY O. STAGGERS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the thoughtful editorial entitled "Senator KILGORE on the Far East," which was published in the Parkersburg Sentinel, Parkersburg, W. Va., on April 14, 1951:

SENATOR KILGORE ON THE FAR EAST

The statements of United States Senator HARLEY KILGORE, of Beckley, on the dismissal of General MacArthur and with reference to our situation in the Far East are worthy of serious consideration. They will be regarded in a much more serious light in West Virginia, we are certain, and given considerably more weight than the constant flow of blasts in Washington.

Senator KILGORE is not only West Virginia's senior Senator, and an extremely able one, but one of the outstanding Members of the greatest legislative body in the world—the United States Senate. He is avowedly an administration supporter, and he supports the administration policy both with reference to General MacArthur's dismissal and to our present policy of conduct in the Korean war.

What Senator KILGORE said in effect was that we should not carry the Korean war to Red China because of the danger of provoking a third world war. He also, and quite rightly, called attention to the constant policy of the United States of opposing aggression and its desire to avoid becoming an aggressor.

With reference to the dismissal of General MacArthur, Senator KILGORE expressed the firm belief that time will prove President Truman's action was right. Were it possible to strip away politics and emotion from consideration of the actual dismissal, there is no question that everyone would reach the same conclusion as stated by Senator KILGORE. No organization can continue to function effectively, much less the United States of America and its Armed Forces, if an important official or commander is constantly bucking the rest of the outfit.

In this connection, it is with considerable gratification that we see the appearance of MacArthur before a joint session of Congress receiving the happy blessings of President Truman and his administration. This is in thorough accordance with our democratic procedure, and a statesmanlike act on the part of the President. It also removes from many of our minds any doubt that the President dismissed the general from his command for good reasons and not out of pique, and that he did so upon the sound advice of his Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Certainly no one, no matter how partisan, can truthfully say that the President's action was an attempt to muzzle MacArthur. It now stands out for what it was, the simple removal of an officer who refused to obey the orders of his superiors—in other words, insubordination.

There Was Talk of Red China Entering Korean War as Early as August 1950, Statement of Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, Notwithstanding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I was amazed when I read in Sunday's newspapers that Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, aide to General MacArthur, had issued a statement to the press that at the time of the Wake Island conference of President Truman and MacArthur no one in the Government had the slightest idea Red China would intervene in Korea.

Where was Major General Whitney? Certainly he could never qualify as an intelligence officer. If he had been receiving mail from home he would have known that one of the main topics of conversation as early as August of 1950 was the fear Red China would enter the Korean fighting and prolong the struggle. Someone around General MacArthur's headquarters must have heard such reports, even if Major General Whitney did not—and it would be difficult to explain why he did not. We heard them over here—thousands of miles away.

The Wake Island conference was on October 15, 1950. Many weeks before I received a letter from a general officer under General MacArthur's command conveying the optimistic prediction fighting would end in late November. The exact message was:

> The picture is much brighter the last couple of days. We are all quite optimistic. I believe this war should be over late in November.

Naturally, I was elated over such good news and I carried the general's letter with me for days showing it to different Members of the House. They were also pleased but more than one raised the direct question, "But does your friend take into consideration the Chinese Reds coming into the war?"

I promptly replied to the general's letter and I put to him the question so many Members of this House had raised. Shortly I received a reply from him, dated September 6, 1950, in which he said, referring to my lack of enthusiasm over his prediction in his letter dated August 24, 1950:

> You said in your letter that you all weren't as optimistic as we were. We are still cheerful in this part of the world and I believe the date of late November is still good.

So I know that the intervention of Red China was considered likely long before the Wake Island conference—General Whitney notwithstanding. He should have known, too.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include with my remarks a very timely article by Mr. Drew Pearson which appeared in the Washington Post this morning. It seems to cover one of the points in the present controversy very well. Mr. Pearson's article:

MACARTHUR DOMINATED AT WAKE

(By Drew Pearson)

A highlight of the current Truman-MacArthur controversy is the New York Times story summarizing the conversations between the two men at Wake Island.

Because the New York Times story had the earmarks of being leaked out by the White House, some MacArthur proponents have challenged it, while MacArthur states that no records were made of the conversations on Wake Island.

In view of this controversy, the Washington Merry-Go-Round's account of the Wake Island conference, published on January 23, some months prior to the Times' April 21 account, may be significant. For the President can hardly be accused of any partiality toward this writer except in his choice of "cuss" words.

Writing at that time—3 months before the Truman-MacArthur controversy—I reported that:

1. MacArthur was so sure of victory he promised General Bradley that he would transfer one full division to Europe.

2. MacArthur assured the President the Chinese would not intervene.

3. MacArthur expected to get his troops back to Japan by Christmas.

4. Because of the certainty of victory, much of the conference was devoted to plans for reconstructing Korea.

5. Highlight of the Wake Island meeting was the brilliant conversation of one man. MacArthur completely dominated the conversation.

WHAT THEY SAID

Because the Wake Island conference now appears to be playing such an important part in the Truman-MacArthur controversy, the salient portions of my January 23 Wake Island column follow:

The President of the United States flew half way 'round the world to confer with General MacArthur, yet aside from a few conversational pleasantries reported by accompanying newsmen, nothing has been published regarding what happened on this mid-Pacific island.

However, I believe it is important that the American people know what took place at Wake Island; so herewith I shall report some of the recorded conversations.

Almost more time was given to a discussion of Korean rehabilitation than to military strategy. When it came to the latter, General MacArthur dominated the conversation.

"The North Koreans," he explained, "have about 15,000 guerrillas left in the south, but the winter will take care of most of them. The others are a beaten force. They are only fighting to save face. It goes against the grain to have to destroy them."

HOME BY CHRISTMAS

MacArthur assured Truman that he could "finish the job in North Korea" in a short time. According to the stenographic notes he said:

"I hope to be able to have the Eighth Army back in Japan by Christmas. I may be able to send a convoy into Pyongyang immediately."

At this point, President Truman asked: "What about Chinese intervention?"

MacArthur's reply was: "They could have intervened earlier when it would have been decisive, but that time has passed. We are no longer fearful of their intervention. Although there are several hundred thousand along the Yalu River, it is not likely that they could cause us much trouble."

He also implied that he could "take care" of the Chinese, even if they decided to cross the Yalu River.

At the same time MacArthur described his plans for completing the conquest of Korea, he also argued against keeping American troops in Korea.

Obviously this raised the question why march across the frozen North Korean wastes to the Yalu River if the plan was to march right back again in time to return the Eighth Army to Japan by Christmas. However, no one at the Wake Island conference seemed to challenge MacArthur regarding this risky move.

MacArthur's advice on the future of Korea was: "We should turn Korea over to the Koreans as quickly as we can and get out as quickly as we can.

"Korea is a poor country," he said, "and we cannot afford to impose an occupation on them * * * military occupations are always failures. I want to withdraw all our troops as soon as possible."

TROOPS TO EUROPE

At one point, Gen. Omar Bradley asked whether MacArthur could make any troops available for Europe in the next few months.

MacArthur replied: "Yes, I think a division can be made available early in 1951."

Bradley also remarked that he hoped MacArthur wouldn't have the same trouble he had with American pilots in Europe shooting up railroad bridges that were needed later for rehabilitation.

"I have had the same trouble," MacArthur replied. The stenographic notes show laughter at this point.

High lights of the Wake Island meeting was the brilliant exposition of one man. MacArthur completely dominated the conversation, and virtually no effort was made to challenge his opinions.

Perhaps also this was the most tragic part of the conference.

Japan's Farewell to General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Brooklyn Tablet for April 21, 1951:

JAPAN'S FAREWELL

The beginning of General MacArthur's return in triumph, not in humiliation, had an auspicious beginning which thrilled Americans. This was the farewell given in Tokyo.

When the general went to Japan less than 6 years ago, it was to preside over a defeated, despirited and embittered people. They received him sullenly and turned their backs upon his presence, the Oriental's demonstration of enmity.

But when the General left, millions bade him farewell in a manner that showed respect, gratitude, and friendship. He was cheered, saluted, prayed for, and almost venerated by the masses of the people, thousands of whom were up before dawn to witness his departure.

The Japanese Diet, in special session, passed the following resolution:

"General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, former Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, helped our country out of the confusion and poverty prevailing at the time the war ended, guided and assisted Japan in establishing democracy and toward a self-supporting economy, thus paving the way for the independence of our nation.

"The entire people of our country are deeply grateful over these excellent achievements of the general."

The Nippon Times, of Tokyo, in a lengthy and flowery editorial said: "Mere words can never describe adequately all that he has meant to this nation whose rebirth as a free, democratic nation the general guided through difficult days with sincerity, understanding, and benevolence. It is with genuine sorrow that the Japanese people will bid him farewell."

Nowhere in history can be found such an instance as that of the head of an army of occupation gaining the universal love and respect of the occupied people.

At the core of these and many other worthwhile reforms was the spirit of peace, democracy, and Christian brotherhood—which symbolized the general's every activity.

"We are sorry to see him leave. He will always hold a warm spot in our hearts. We wish him well wherever he may be. Our doors and hearts will always be open in welcome. History will long record General MacArthur's heroic stature as a soldier, statesman, and democracy's architect for the future."

And our own correspondent, Father Patrick O'Connor, in his article on page 1 of this issue of the Tablet, bespeaks in eloquent language General MacArthur's contribution to the Christian religion in Japan.

AMERICAN HERO

As we look at this great accomplishment in a few years, we thrill at the achievements of an outstanding American and religious-minded leader. He did much for Japan but he did far more for America in bringing about peace and making our country beloved among erstwhile enemies.

Where the general's critics placed their theories in practice, we have lost our good name and influence. This is particularly true in China and in Germany. As for Poland and the other countries of East and Central Europe, the general's critics have suffered defeat after defeat. In those nations we have little influence; we are treated with hatred, contempt, or suspicion. There is no peace.

In Japan this successful civilian administrator was the symbol of anticommunism as well as of Americanism and in this field, too, he made his critics look very bad. He left in an atmosphere of triumph; he accomplished great things and his popularity knew no bounds.

Leaving Tokyo the deposed, "dismissed for insubordination" general was given a hero's welcome in Honolulu, San Francisco, and Washington, while New York City, as this is being writen, is scheduled to outdo itself in a never-to-be-forgotten tribute.

What demonstration of friendship, gratitude, and affection the American people gave for a man who fought for 14 years for his country and its good name without once seeing his native land. And what a response to those who sought to humiliate him, who charged him with disobeying orders, who talked about the civil being above the military when he, as a civilian leader in Japan, brought order out of confusion while they brought confusion where there should be order both nationally and internationally.

The American people, this week, told the world what a towering figure they consider General MacArthur. He will live always in the hearts of his loyal countrymen.

NOW FOR THE "TENSION"

On March 4, 1923, the American people were informed that they were in an emergency. The emergency continued until 1940, when we were informed that the Nation was facing a crisis. The crisis has continued off and on until the present time. Recently Secretary of Defense Marshall informed the Nation that we were in "tension" and, he added, "The tension may continue for 10 years."

On the one hand, we have had the forgotten man, thousands of whose brothers have been sent abroad to die; then we had great fanfare over social security while every American now suffers from a lack of security as officials broadcast direful warnings; then we had the Government insisting on health insurance while telling us to seek the nearest bomb shelter; the "welfare state" has been championed while the warfare state is being legislated.

Oh, for the good old days when to be an American meant to be a free person, one free of the fears of Government administrators, actions, controls, and false leaders, free of people who did not attempt to save you while engaging in wars, who thought of America and its people first, who did not nestle to their breast betrayers and confusionists, whose actions did not continually arouse apprehension, suspicion and enmity.

The Late Arthur H. Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 21, 1951, burial services for Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg were held in his home town, Grand Rapids, Mich. His loss will be keenly felt. For posterity I deem it appropriate to include in my remarks editorials from the Grand Rapids Herald, the Grand Rapids Press, the Grand Haven Daily Tribune, and the Holland Evening Sentinel:

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald]

AS THE NATION MOURNS

East and West, North and South, the people's high regard for Arthur H. Vandenberg, United States Senator and world statesman, and their sorrow at his passing are reflected in the editorial columns of their newspapers.

He belonged to the Nation and to the world no less than to Grand Rapids and to Michigan.

A few typical expressions follow.

The New York Herald Tribune: "It is only once or twice in a generation that a single speech changes the course of history * * * but the speech Senator Vandenberg delivered in the Senate January 10, 1945, stands apart from all others, a turning point in his own career and a milestone of major significance for the Nation. * * * The memory of the man remains luminous in the minds of the generation that saw his works accomplished."

The New York Times: "Perhaps more than any other political figure of his time he typified America's capacity for change and growth, and symbolized our political conversion from a policy of isolation to world responsibility. * * * If America's adherence to the United Nations, its decision to oppose the expansion of Communist aggression, and its formulation of the Marshall Plan and the North Atlantic Treaty are among the great events of our epoch, as unquestionably they are, then Senator Vandenberg must retain a central place in contemporary history. * * * The memory of his achievements is not likely to pass away for many years to come."

The New York World-Telegram and Sun: "He became the chief architect of the bipartisan foreign policy. * * * It is his country's great misfortune—but it was no fault of Senator Vandenberg's—that the policy has been limited in application. He protested vainly against the 'tragic failure' of the Truman administration to stand as firmly in Asia as in Europe against Communist domination and aggression. * * * His death is a tragic loss to the country he loved and served wonderfully well."

The Washington Evening Star: "The tyrants of our time have reason to remember him with bitterness and hate. But the rest of us must remember him with an abiding sense of gratitude—a gratitude that must be felt by all who cherish the true meaning of liberty, justice, truth and simple, ordinary decency. * * * If he could leave one admonition with us, it would be not to forget that we are in greater danger of destroying ourselves than of being destroyed from abroad."

The Washington Post: "In his day, he was a Titan in the Senate, and will live in its history along with Clay, Calhoun and Webster. We mourn him as a man who, above all others, has been responsible for the evolution of a sustained international policy in our country. The measure of Arthur Hendrick Vandenberg is the vacuum he leaves on the Republican side of the Senate. Vandenberg squared party and country with his belief that politics during the present crisis should stop at the water's edge."

The Boston Traveler: "There exists in his party no ready replacement for his job of peacemaker on essentials. For his selfless leadership in a critical policy area we owe him a great debt of gratitude."

The Boston Globe: "His career was of enormous assistance to the efforts of many Americans of both parties to make the world more secure against the threat of war. It is to be hoped that other Republicans of prominence will come forward to assume leadership comparable to that of this statesman from Michigan."

The Chicago Sun-Times: "Senator Vandenberg did more than any other Republican to change the course of American foreign policy after World War II. The former isolationist's formal conversion to the cause of international collective security was as historic as it was dramatic. * * * We shall miss his counsel all the more as we come to realize the tremendous debt we owe him."

The Chicago Daily News: "If the United Nations survives the strains of power grabbing that proved too much for its predecessor, the League of Nations, the late Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan will occupy a large place in the historical evaluation of these times."

The Atlanta Constitution: "While the Nation was paying tribute to a great military man, it was mourning the loss of another patriot of heroic stature—Arthur Vandenberg, of Michigan, editor and statesman, whose powerful voice was the deciding factor in many history-making policy battles on the Senate floor. * * * His objectives rose high above partisanship toward the kind of unified foreign policy which would enable us to stamp on the Communist aggressor anywhere he raised his ugly head."

The Atlanta Journal: "It was the last and relatively brief phase of his long career that marked the difference between a man of talent and one of creative vision. * * * On that high note ended the active career of a man whose mind and spirit were great enough to put truth above consistency, conscience above pride of opinion and country above party."

The Kansas City Star: "The refusal of Senator Vandenberg to submit to a necessary operation until he had seen two important measures through the Senate was characteristic of the man in his late great years. * * * His hold on general public confidence became so great he was able to keep his party in line and in the first critical years after the war he gave invaluable service to the Nation."

The Detroit News: "The loss to the Nation, more and more evident as his last illness settled upon him, is complete. * * * A capacity for growth was the distinguishing mark of the Vandenberg nature. * * * By a magnificent projection of moral force he swept his party out of isolationism into the new current of world thought and cooperative action for peace. * * * It has been remarked how often in the current great debate one unanswerable sentence from Vandenberg in his prime might have returned it swiftly to its proper course. * * * That Vandenberg was Presidential timber goes without saying, and that he never turned a hand to capitalize on that status is equally a matter of record. Thus his integrity as a free man was uncompromised to the end."

The Detroit Free Press: "The voice of Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg is stilled by death. The personal tragedy is that Senator Vandenberg died before the battle for bipartisanship which he led could be won. The national tragedy is that the structure of American unity in face of world perils which he devoted his life to build lies in ruins. * * * There was no other leader in either party able or willing to bridge the chasm opened by partisan approach to our foreign relations. There's none today. * * * Cannot we take from the life of Arthur H. Vandenberg a new dedication to carry on the work he began and bring to fruition the bipartisan approach to the world about us for which he pleaded? We are certain that he would have asked for no greater monument."

The Jackson Citizen Patriot: "Arthur Vandenberg belonged not alone to Michigan or the Republican Party. He was a great American—perhaps the greatest of this day. In a time when small men grub for graft, when dishonesty, incompetence and greed are common attributes of public life, his integrity was never questioned, his wisdom was respected and his selfless patriotism was recognized. * * * His eyes were ever on the horizon which was his goal; the horizon of men's dreams and ideals and faiths."

The Flint Journal: "His going has left no bitterness, no recriminations, no enmity, but only a sense of irreparable loss. * * * His passing brings sadness, but there remains the memory of a completely honest, selfless, devoted statesman—an example for future leaders to emulate."

The Saginaw News: "Arthur H. Vandenberg's footprints on the sands of time will not soon be obliterated. * * * Another son of Michigan will in due course be appointed to sit in Senator Vandenberg's chair in the Senate Chamber, but it will be a difficult assignment for he will have ever before him the example of a career of national service which knows few parallels."

The Lansing State Journal: "Michigan's distinguished senior Senator was a statesman in the best sense of the word. * * * For the sake of this country and the causes to which he was devoted, it is to be fervently hoped that his great influence for integrity in Government, for unselfish public service, and for peace and justice will continue to be felt through the years to come. He has taken his place among the immortal great of the Nation's illustrious statesmen."

The Battle Creek Enquirer and News: "He never sought universal popularity as the required basis for his championship of causes. He fought that national preservation and human safety were more important than partisan rivalry. * * * In his younger days he had written a book, 'If Hamilton Were Here Today.' There will be many a speculation in the future—and anxiety will seek comfort thereby—as to how the responsibilities of future issues would be met if Vandenberg were here today."

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press]

ARCHITECT OF FREEDOM

The death of Arthur Hendrick Vandenberg will be mourned wherever freemen live and continue to fight for freedom. For no American of the last decade fought that fight more vigorously or contributed more importantly to its victories than Senator Vandenberg. Above all others, he was responsible for one of the most effective weapons the free world has had in that fight—American bipartisan foreign policy.

Until 1943, when Senator Vandenberg voted to extend the President's powers to make reciprocal trade agreements, this country's enemies had hoped that a split between Democrats and Republicans on foreign policy would play into their hands. But with that vote, Senator Vandenberg as the Republican Senate leader on foreign affairs signaled the birth of a foreign policy which was to doom the doctrine of isolation and remove the last sign of disunity within the Nation on the prosecution of the war and securing the peace to come.

The solid achievements of the bipartisan policy are to be noted throughout the western world. Wherever the cloud of communism has been lifted it has been largely because of the existence of that policy and the devoted leadership afforded it by Senator Vandenberg from 1943 to his very death. An early advocate of the United Nations, he was one of the key American figures in San Francisco when U. N. was established and its Charter was written. It was Senator Vandenberg who stepped forward at the critical moment to guarantee Britain's recovery when, in 1946, he spoke eloquently and successfully for the British loan. Greece and Turkey owe their present freedom from communism in large measure to the Michigan statesman, for it was his ceaseless efforts on behalf of the Truman doctrine which guaranteed American aid for those two countries. All Western Europe has cause to be grateful to him for the determined battle he put up for the Marshall plan. And if Western Europe's chances for survival are greater today than they were a year or two ago, they are better very largely because of the decisive part he played in the fashioning of these instruments of foreign policy and in the United States' adherence to the North Atlantic alliance.

Conceivably Congress would have adopted some, if not all, of these measures if Arthur H. Vandenberg had not been in the Senate. But these are stronger measures because of his vigorous fight for them. He, more than any other man, has stood as a symbol of national unity on foreign affairs.

In many ways, Senator Vandenberg's years in the Senate recalled the days of Clay, Calhoun, and Webster. One of the great debaters of our time, Arthur Vandenberg could deliver a speech reminiscent of the golden days of oratory. Yet he was unsurpassed in his ability to cut through to the core of an issue, to sum up the central problem in a few clear, crisp sentences and to outline a proper course of action.

He brought, then, to a consideration of modern problems the careful and prolonged analysis that characterized a more leisurely era in our history; but essentially he was a man of action. He was completely of our times. He was a man who had the courage and good sense to alter his views as the times and the background of facts changed; a man who often put aside personal ambition for the sake of his party and country. His voice, though silenced by illness for many months, continued to echo in Washington and international capitals, and his remembered opinions will continue to carry great weight throughout the world for years to come.

It is a heartening thought to the profession and the city which produced this remarkable man that his power of expression and his clear and patriotic thinking on foreign and domestic affairs were shaped and developed through newspaper work, editorial leadership and editorial writing in Grand Rapids, his home community. For many years before he left to become a force in the Nation's and world's history, the Press knew Arthur Vandenberg as a vigorous and brilliant competitor and as a kindly friend in the many contacts of civic life. Nowhere will he be missed more genuinely than in the city which gave him to the service of the world.

[From the Grand Haven (Mich.) Daily Tribune]

SENATOR ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

One appraisal was missing after the dramatic appearance of General MacArthur before both Houses of Congress. Senator Arthur Vandenberg had already passed away. Even had he lingered for a few hours longer, he was much too ill to participate in the debate occasioned by the deposed general's address.

Senator Vandenberg's counsel on foreign affairs has been missing for months. Congressmen on both sides of the aisle—and foreign diplomats—have yearned at times for the Senator's recovery, that he might rescue the allies from their confused thinking. He seemed to be trying to oblige their wishes by a grim, heroic struggle to overcome his long sickness.

The cause of a bipartisan foreign policy has been badly crippled by Senator Vandenberg's illness and death. The business world has lost an eloquent spokesman in the Senate. The Republicans will miss one of their truly great leaders.

"What is a conservative?" the late Senator once asked. "At one point the dictionary says 'one who seeks to prevent loss, decay, or injury, and who protects and preserves.' In that sense I want my party to be conservative. * * * But at another point the dictionary says that a conservative is 'one opposed to change or progress.' In that sense I do not want my party to be conservative. If it is static, it will die. It will promote and not prevent decay for itself and country. This is not a static country nor a static age."

Arthur Vandenberg applied this philosophy to his own career. Men and women throughout western Michigan became familiar with his forceful political opinions long before he entered the Senate. He was a newspaperman who was inspired by the greatness of American traditions. His capacity to absorb the political thinking of his day was phenomenal.

Many people do not think of Senator Vandenberg as an author of books. Yet we have three good-sized volumes before us—all of which he wrote or compiled: The Greatest American; Alexander Hamilton (1921); If Hamilton Were Here Today (1923), and The Trail of a Tradition (1926).

There may be others. But these were gifts to another newspaperman who also has gone on. They all deal with the Senator's hero, an American pioneer who ranks with Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln as individuals who gave to this country its remarkable form of government.

Some men are elected to public office because they belong to the groups capable of bringing out the largest totals of votes. Others win because they are popular personally. Senator Vandenberg was appointed the first time, then wrote his record by hard work and brilliance. He was—like Alexander Hamilton—a high-grade statesman.

The course of Senator Vandenberg's political fortunes might have been downward except for his willingness to turn away from a seasoned isolationism to all-out internationalism. His fateful decision was reached in 1945. He sensed that the free nations of the world would soon perish unless they banded together. The world had become too small for the Monroe Doctrine and aloof neutrality.

Our early impressions of Senator Vandenberg were mixed with both admiration and awe. Once he read critically a story we had written, while we watched tensely each movement of his big pencil. Michigan newsmen, while not always agreeing with Arthur Vandenberg, seemed to find few subjects on which the Herald's brilliant editor was uninformed. We heard his voice rasp out at political rallies and tried to remember some of the long words in his amazing vocabulary.

We felt we knew him best, however, when in 1941 he spoke before a group of newspapermen at the Spring Lake Country Club. Many said it was one of the finest speeches of his career. It was on this occasion—almost 10 years ago—that he expressed the longing to retire from public activity, loaf a bit, write a few more books, and look back upon a crowded life. These pleasures he was denied.

Senator Vandenberg was a true friend of this area of Michigan he called home. He was never too busy to look after the smallest detail in a request from a constituent. He used his political partisanship with a master's skill, and combined conservatism and progressivism according to the formula he had set up. "I want the Republican Party to be liberal enough to march with the times to dare new answers to new problems and to use the power and strength and initiative of Government to help citizens to help themselves," he once said. "I want the oak to stand. I want the branches to grow."

This is a lofty aim for an individual or country as well as a party.

Senator Vandenberg was of presidential caliber. Some will say that he missed not only this but also the opportunity of being on hand to straighten America out in its present indecision. Others will lament his chance to enjoy the peace in later life he so wanted. But he had mighty compensations—he was in some respects—again like Alexander Hamilton—the most outstanding American statesman of his time. Through his skill in guiding coalition movements, he achieved bipartisanship at crucial moments in history.

The branches of the tree he has planted are bound to grow.

[From the Holland (Mich.) Evening Sentinel]

GROWING TO NATIONAL STATURE

When Arthur H. Vandenberg left Grand Rapids some 20 years ago to fill a place in the United States Senate he was to all intents and purposes a local character. He was not known to any extent outside the bounds of Michigan, and even in this State his main reputation was concentrated in western Michigan, in the area where his newspaper had been circulating.

Now a score of years later, when he has come to the end of his earthly road, he is a national figure. The name of Michigan's senior Senator is as well known in all the 48 States as that of any Member of the upper House in Washington. It is not unreasonable to go further. His name is pretty well known in many of the countries of Europe. The propaganda machine of Soviet Russia took occasion from time to time to cover that name with special abuse. The Russians understood that the Michigan man had exerted a tremendous influence in building up America's defenses against the onsweeping tide of communism.

During those years in the Senate Mr. Vandenberg grew in political stature. When he began his career in Washington he was limited in his outlook, but he was big enough in his personal capacities so that he found it possible to grow into the bigness of that job. Slowly but consistently he kept pace in his political development with the unfolding exigencies of the Nation's history and the world's needs. He had the good fortune—it may have looked like bad fortune to him at the time—to serve in the Senate during a period when his party was out of office. As a member of the opposition minority during the New Deal days, he was faced constantly with the challenge of events.

There is a profound truth in the old saying that "the north wind made the Vikings." It was almost certainly the political north wind that this minority Senator had to brace himself against for years that developed the spiritual muscles which later came to be recognized by the Nation and indeed by the world.

During the past 10 years or so Senator Vandenberg stood above party in the same way in which every truly national leader has to rise above the narrow compromises of party regularity. He remained a Republican of course but he was strong enough to carry his own party along the path that seemed the highway to his country's true interests and highest honor. In the end he came to be recognized more as an American leader than a party strategist.

Like so many other great Americans, he grew up to the stature that the needs of his country demanded. Democracy does not usually breed supermen; nor does it need them. But it often does breed men who, even though they are of average stature, bear within them the power to grow to a size that matches the greatness of great occasions and times. Such a man was Senator Vandenberg.

Recognizing That Television Makes Report That Can't Be Matched, the NBC Sent Its Prize-Winning Cameramen to Critical Europe To Document Current History; Their Ace Commentator, Robert McCormick, Later Joined Them and Helped Prepare Several of These Special Battle Reports, Washington—Dr. John R. Steelman

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, again, the Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman, presents the weekly Battle Report, Washington, and it seems that with each succeeding issue the information conveyed not alone is of even greater interest but is more interestingly exhibited and disclosed.

In this, the thirty-second teledocumentary Battle Report, Washington, the American television audience was given a magnificent treat—first, by way of the splendid pictures photographed by National Broadcasting Co.'s cameramen, Charles and Eugene Jones; and second, through the narration by Lou Hazam. These, taken together with the commentaries by Robert McCormick, make for one of the most spectacular word and moving pictures ever released to the audio and video audience.

Additionally thereto, Dr. Steelman brought to the television screen, on Sunday, April 8, two distinguished visitors, Maj. Orville Munson, of the United States Army, just returned from Korea where he served as liaison officer with the Turkish brigade, and Mr. John C. Dreier, Ambassador to the Organization of American States.

Major Munson's story of his experience in fighting alongside the Turkish troops, although a splendid story, is equalled, however, by a report of Mr. Dreier, who tells of the accomplishments made in building hemispheric solidarity and a Gibraltar of democracy, here in the Western Hemisphere.

I doubt very much if anyone could have seen and heard this program of the thirty-second Battle Report, Washington, without experiencing a sense of exultation in realizing just what our country is doing—for all mankind—in making this world a better place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker, in order to give the Members of this House, as well as Americans everywhere, an opportunity to read this intensely human document of today's happenings, under the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks, I include therein this thirty-second Battle Report, Washington, which was as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. MCCORMICK. From the thirty-eighth parallel, latest pictures of General MacArthur as he again visits our troops on the battlefront. And from the Nation's Capital on parallel 38–51, NBC television visits you again with Battle Report, Washington.

Washington, this week going about its defense business through streets abloom with cherry blossoms, and Korea, where the hills are ablaze with gunfire and rumors of an imminent Chinese offensive.

This is Robert McCormick, glad to be back on the job again. Today Battle Report brings you the fourth of its exclusive teledocumentaries on Europe, and reports on our Turkish allies in Korea and the meeting of the Latin-American foreign ministers in Washington. But first, the Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. These days in Washington are busy ones for many thousands of workers. The other evening at approximately 9 o'clock I drove by several Government buildings. They were ablaze with light and people were moving about as if it were midday. There is, of course, only one reason for this activity and it can be summed up in one word—defense.

Once again our Nation is in peril. Everything we own, everything we hold sacred—even the life of every man, woman, and child in the United States is threatened. Our only chance of survival is to erect defenses which are so strong no one will dare attack us.

Surely every thinking person knows that the objective of Soviet policy is not the uplifting of the underprivileged. The brutal purging of nonconformists—the vicious denunciation of all who do not submit to the Kremlin yoke—is eloquent testimony to the real ambitions of the tyrants. The nature of Soviet terrorism is self-evident, and the prime targets for this terrorism are the men and women of the United States.

This afternoon we have two distinguished visitors who will report from two different sections of the world. Maj. Orville Munson, of the United States Army, has just returned from Korea where he was liaison officer with the Turkish Brigade. Mr. John C. Dreier, our Ambassador to the Organization of American States, will report on the meeting of the foreign ministers which has been in session here in Washington for the past 2 weeks.

Televisioh at its best is a reporter that can't be matched. Recognizing this, NBC Television sent its prize-winning cameramen, the Jones brothers, to critical Europe to document it for you—country by country. Your narrator, Robert McCormick, later joined them and helped prepare the fourth of these special teledocumentaries. We invite you now to see Battle Report, Italy, and hear the story of that country from one who has just returned—Robert McCormick.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a little girl about this age myself. Maybe she was on my mind as I traveled about Europe. Anyway, it seemed to me that nowhere was Italy better symbolized than in the picture of this babe among the ruins. A new and young Italy being born out of the ashes of the past.

Most of you remember that past. Only a few years ago—as shown in these actual shots of World War II at San Pietro—its terrible music echoes throughout the countryside in bombs bursting and gunfire. Italy inherited from the war, destruction. Such destruction as this, visited upon the famed abbey of Cassino, driving its monks away. But they have returned. And patiently stone by stone, I saw them rebuilding the abbey again, while below, in the one-time battlefield, now a graveyard, crosses mark where the soldiers lay who keep them company.

In the town of Frascati, 30 miles from Rome, I saw a cat sunning herself in a window.

And in the public square not far away, human beings following her example. Old men without work—poverty-stricken and hungry—dozing over their shovel handles. Yes; to me the streets of Frascati alone spoke volumes on Italy's basic problem—overpopulation and unemployment—a high birth rate and thousands of people wandering the streets all day with nothing to do. All this for modern Italy to worry about, piled atop the debris of war.

For a place to live, thousands of war-tossed homeless have taken to caves like these, right in a downtown section of Rome. Many of these cave dwellers, 1951, are northern farmers, whose farms were destroyed by the war. Drifting southward, they burrowed these holes into the soft, wet clay of the hillsides of the city and are forced to call the cold damp shelters that resulted, home.

But most Italians pass them by with eyes calloused from long seeing the same sight in southern Italy. For here in Matava, at the heel of the boot, the cave dwellers have been around for 2,000 years.

Italy today, then, is Italy in transition, seeking to come out of the caves of its past into the light, seeking to overcome the problems to which fascism brought it and emerged a healthy member of the democratic family. This has called for American aid, and while in Italy I dropped by to see Mr. Leon Dayton, head of our Economic Cooperation Administration there, to ask him about that aid. This is his answer.

Mr. DAYTON. During the course of the last 2 or 3 years, we have had thousands of tourists here; a great many American businessmen, and others here just for the Italian sunshine, history, and art of Italy. Nearly all of them, at one time or another, have expressed that this work we are doing here is Operation Charity. Well, there is very little that could be further from the truth. I wish there was one way we could tell the American people that this is a real investment in the future. It is not the kind of investment, either, we have to wait 10 years to pay off. In fact, we can see some of the dividends today.

Mr. MCCORMICK. As we traveled the Italian peninsula, the Jones brothers turned their cameras for you on the dividends of American aid, of which Mr. Dayton speaks.

The truth of his remarks is rooted in brick and stone in the new city of Cassino. Rather than reconstruct the former blasted town site, Italy is preserving it as a memorial. The new town is rising in a fresh location a half-mile away. With American aid, new housing—such as this, the largest apartment project in Rome—is now taking shape. In four more months, it will be providing low-cost accommodations for hundreds of families. These balconies, of course, will be for the people, not dictators.

The busy fingers of throbbing machines are already beginning to spin the thread of a new industrial life. A whole new section of this textile factory—which will contain American looms and give work to over 200 people—is now under construction, thanks to American help. We found the workers fully aware of this, and grateful.

But one of the most amazing miracles of all is being worked with the help of these subterranean steam formations. Italy provided the geysers in Tuscany, where it is said that Dante wrote his Divine Comedy. America provided the engineering know-how. And somehow, in some way mysterious to a layman like myself, steam that bubbled from the earth was tapped by huge rigs. Huge stone condensing towers rise into the sky. Borax extracted as a byproduct, and power sent soaring across the land for miles—power to light the city—to keep the wheels of industry turning. But these pictures tell more than the story of the power of Italian-American cooperation. More reconstruction—the bay at Naples, which used to take any left-over bombs from the wartime bombing missions to the Rumanian oil fields.

And now you're leaving one of the world's largest railway stations on Italy's crack train running between Rome and Milan, running on time, we might add, without Mussolini's help. We rode this modern streamliner—further evidence of United States aid—as it sped along miles of new track, going up for a brief visit to the engineer's cabin, shining with the latest type of locomotive equipment. The interiors are as luxurious as anything we've seen in the States. Repairs to the line still go on, but we sped across this bridge at 70 miles an hour—a bridge that formerly could be crossed at only 5 miles an hour. Yes; more evidence that Italy is on the right track. And well might we take pride in its progress, for as ECA's Leon Dayton put it:

Mr. DAYTON. Probably the best example I can give you of the near miracle that is occurring here, and I think, an example of some of the short-term dividends we have gotten from the program, is by making a comparison between 1947 and now 1951. In 1947, the physical facilities of this country were badly destroyed. The people were poverty-stricken. There was a strong Communist minority here playing on these factors to get control of the people and of the Government. But in 1951, Italy has assumed full partnership with the United States. She is preparing to defend the ideals and principles which caused us to make them.

Gentlemen, I spoke to you earlier about some discussion of this work here being called Operation Charity. I think you will find we are getting our money's worth out of Operation Strength for the free world.

Mr. MCCORMICK. And so, as we draw to the close of this report, how best to sum up what our cameras saw and ears heard? Perhaps like this: The glories of which Mussolini boasted were the old glories, symbolized by the wonderful works of art in which Italy is rich, and for which it is deservedly famous. But today—today the Italian people are not so much concerned with this past as they are with the present. The monarchy is gone. Mussolini is gone. In their place is a new Republic whose leader we sought out in his simple office. He greeted us warmly, and said that while our cameras could record the physical evidence of our common effort toward recovery, it could not show what is in Italy's heart and mind. We asked Prime Minister de Gasperi to take this responsibility himself and here he is.

Prime Minister DE GASPERI. That is why I am here today to tell you the sentiments and motives that inspire my Italy. They are: (1) Gratitude for the generous cooperation of the American people; (2) renewed faith in liberty; (3) the firm resolve to defend democracy and to obtain social justice. May God speed us on our common way.

Mr. MCCORMICK. This firm resolve to defend democracy, which Premier de Gasperi pledges, has its strength in the Italian Army, now being born anew with American advice and assistance. We are reserving that portion of our report on Italy for next week. Instead, for our final word, we turn your attention next to our exclusive interview with the Foreign Minister of Italy, Count Carlos Sforza.

Count SFORZA. Now we are allies in the Atlantic Pact. That is why you are just as interested as we are in our rehabilitation and recovery. We will do our best and you may be assured of our loyalty because the Atlantic Pact has been created for peace, for freedom, and for saving our western civilization, and these are our deepest ideals and convictions.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Thus, with these assurances of Italian loyalty to the American cause, we close as we began, with this small babe against the ruins, symbolizing the new Italy, young as this child, struggling to live as a free person again in this new world. How well she succeeds will depend not only upon herself, but upon you.

As our infantry moves forward in Korea, they are faced with a new Chinese puzzle to solve. The Communist invaders have broken contact with our troops along much of the western front and pulled back in a surprise withdrawal. Yet, all expectations are of a major enemy counterattack perhaps when we reach the wider waist of the peninsula above the parallel. Our Air Force reports the Chinese massing—perhaps for just such an attack—in the central mountain area, as our soldiers advance cautiously. And here are some troops the Communists have already learned are bad medicine. Our Turkish allies in action around Seoul, teamed up with American tank forces. These Turks need no lesson on the menace of communism. Back home, Russia is on their border. For more information on how highly these troops are valued in Korea, we turn now to a man who can boast 5 campaign stars and some 20 citations, including the DSC. A man who helped train the Turks in Turkey and fought side by side with them in Korea as liaison officer until wounded. Ladies and gentlemen, the Army's Maj. Orville Munson.

Major MUNSON. I was assigned to Turkey in January 1950 as part of the American Mission for Air to Turkey. On arrival I was sent to the Turkish engineering school in Istanbul. While there I taught infantry tactics. That is, I taught engineer units, which normally build bridges and such things, how to reorganize their companies and battalions to fight as infantry when necessary. I was given the job as liaison officer with the Turkish brigade.

Mr. MCCORMICK. How did the Turkish people feel about sending men to Korea, and how did the men themselves feel about going?

Major MUNSON. I can't answer for every individual, but I can say this—the majority of the unit that went to Korea were volunteers, officers and men. And I remember some of the women in Turkey saying that if they went to Korea, and that if they didn't come back as victors, they shouldn't come back at all.

One thing that impressed me so much was on the ship going from Turkey to Korea, the Turks big comment here was that they were afraid that they were not going to get there in time to help out. They actually wanted to spill some blood for the cause of the free world.

Mr. MCCORMICK. What kind of fighters are the Turks?

Major MUNSON. The Turks are a proud people and rightly so. You see the Republic of Turkey is only 27 years old. To gain their independence they fought for 2 years to drive the British, French, and Greeks from their soil. In doing this they had some divisions that fought until every man was killed. With a tradition like this to live up to, the Turks today have a real inspiration. We found that it was very hard to impress the Turks with the advantages of maneuver. The Turks want to just dig in and fight, and as we learned so often, to close in with his bayonet.

They are especially fond of our trucks, tanks, and weapons. The Turkish Army is still mostly horse-drawn, and, therefore, they haven't had too much of an opportunity to work with our equipment—and so at first they find it quite difficult to handle. Naturally, when they see some of the things that our boys can do with that very same equipment, they can't help but admire our ability. Seeing is believing.

They thought our weapons were wonderful. I remember the first comment that the engineer company commander made with regard to our infantry rifle. "Good. Everybody a machine gun."

Mr. McCORMICK. Where were the Turks fighting when you were wounded, Major Munson?

Major MUNSON. You all remember when the Chinese Communists came across the Yalu River in their big offensive? We were trying to secure some high ground in one of the northernmost areas of the Eighth Army sector. I was at that time assigned to one of the infantry companies to assist them in organizing for the attack. There were some tanks assigned to us at that time and they were operated by American personnel, so there was quite a bit of liaison responsibility in interpreting.

The Turks at that time were protecting the right flank of the Eighth Army. They were to hold back the initial punch that was received from the Chinese. This was until the American divisions organized for an orderly withdrawal. Incidentally, there is little need of my having to add this, but the Turks did a swell job. Just ask the boys from the American Second and Twenty-fifth Divisions. They know what I mean.

Mr. McCORMICK. Major, you think a good deal of these soldiers from Turkey, don't you?

Major MUNSON. The Turks know why they are in Korea—to stop aggression, now. They never forgot that their homeland borders on the Soviet Union. But still this fighting brigade was dispatched unhesitatingly to fight halfway around the world to show at considerable cost in life and money that the Turkish Republic considers itself a part of the free world and a spearhead of democracy in the east. The Turks are willing to resist aggression anywhere in the world when called upon by the United Nations to do so. I want to say here, that I consider it a privilege to have had the opportunity to serve with a country whose ideals and aspirations are so fundamentally like our own.

Mr. McCORMICK. As these ground soldiers in the west plunged into North Korea for the deepest penetration, north of Yongpyong, and advanced toward the main enemy base at Kumwha, over their heads the air battle waged hotter than ever. Fifty United States Thunderjets, covering B–29's in a heavy raid on the Manchurian border bridges, ran into 40 Communist jet fighters and routed them. Put that down in your book as the biggest all-jet air battle in history.

Meanwhile, here in Washington, in a sweeping demonstration of cooperation, 21 American Republics signed a brass-tacks agreement to strengthen our own Western Hemisphere against the Communist plague. Conferring as our representative throughout the 2-week session, and credited with much of the success of this historic meeting is the State Department official on whom we next focus. He is our Ambassador to the Organization of American States, John C. Dreier.

Ambassador JOHN C. DREIER. Yesterday morning the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the 21 American Republics gathered in the great Hall of the Americas in the Pan American Union and signed the final act of their meeting of consultation. The first to sign was the ranking Foreign Minister, Dr. Manuel Tello, of Mexico. The 20 other Foreign Ministers followed in order, the last one being the host to the meeting, our Secretary of State, Hon. Dean Acheson.

Two weeks ago the foreign ministers gathered in Washington at the invitation of Secretary Acheson to consider the common problems of our 21 countries in the present grave international situation. There were three big subjects on the agenda: Political and military cooperation, the problem of internal security against subversive activities, and emergency economic cooperation. Yesterday it was apparent that the determination of the foreign ministers to resolve these common problems and set forth the policy of our American family of nations in this crisis, had met with outstanding success.

Thirty-one resolutions were adopted as a result of the 2 days of work—and work it was in capital letters. On one of the last nights the group labored until 3 o'clock in the morning. And the next night they worked until 6 o'clock in the morning, in order to finish their task on time.

In the political and military field the American foreign ministers made clear that our 21 countries stand united today in the finest tradition of inter-American solidarity. Reaffirming their desire to live and work in peace, they nevertheless laid plans for more effective military preparation for the defense of our continent. They also again indentified their governments with the larger purpose of the United Nations to establish a rule of law and justice in the relations among nations throughout the world.

In dealing with the subject of subversive activities within the Americas, the foreign ministers set forth the main lines to be followed for the purpose of controlling fifth-column activities. They also agreed on the need for increased efforts to improve living standards and to strengthen fundamental human freedom in order to fortify the faith of our peoples in their democracy.

Economic questions occupied a large part of the discussions. It was recognized that the emergency in which we find ourselves imposes special problems of production and supply. The needs of defense programs must be met, while measures have to be taken to prevent any unnecessary dislocation of the economics of our 21 republics. The economic resolutions adopted by the Foreign Ministers deal with production of strategic materials, with the allocation of scarce goods, with measures to combat inflation, and a number of other related subjects. They embody the basic inter-American principle of fair treatment to all—the sharing of sacrifices so that all may share in the benefits to be achieved.

The decisions of the meeting of Foreign Ministers are in themselves important to the future of every one of us, uniting as they do the efforts of the 21 American Republics. However, as Secretary Acheson pointed out in his closing remarks, the manner in which decisions were reached there is also of great importance. For in this meeting, the American nations have again demonstrated the validity of their great system of cooperation based upon principles which commend the loyalty of every one of them.

The highly satisfactory results of this meeting of consultation are eloquent evidence of what can be accomplished by nations working in a sincere desire to merge their national interests in the larger goal of a world in which peace, freedom, and prosperity can be achieved.

Mr. McCORMICK. Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another teledocumentary, this, then, against the background of Battle Front Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your thirty-second Battle Report, Washington.

John Alltucker, Educational Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I read with much regret in the Times Herald of Vallejo, Calif., of the retirement of John R. Alltucker as superintendent of schools of Vallejo.

For 24 years he served the Vallejo school district, the last 10 as superintendent. Vallejo is really a Federal city. The major industry is the Mare Island Navy Yard. In 1940 Vallejo had a population of 20,072. About that time Mare Island Navy Yard was being expanded rapidly until at the end of the war there were over 42,500 workers in the yard. The city of Vallejo grew to about 80,000, but the boundary of the city was not enlarged. The school population grew about like the population of the city. Vallejo had a staggering problem to handle the education of its enormously increased school population.

Lanham Act funds helped build some schoolhouses. Mr. Alltucker, loyally and vigorously supported by the board of education, handled the job of providing education for the increased school population. The intellect and the character of John Alltucker was impressed upon many a pupil of the Vallejo schools during the 10 years he was superintendent of schools. Somehow, under the administration of John Alltucker, they received as good training as they would had they lived in normal cities. Part of the reason was that the superintendent had undying faith in our public-school system, and his board of education had faith in the ability of their superintendent to give every child that came into the Vallejo schools during this wartime period an opportunity to get an education, the birthright of every American child.

I think the board and the superintendent still are wondering how the job was done, but it was accomplished.

Later the wartime pressure relaxed some, but not nearly as much as was expected when the war ended. A large population still remained in Vallejo. Some of us thought that since the schools had been built by the National Government to take care of an educational war emergency and, since Vallejo had done this magnificently, the sensible thing would be to turn the schools built with Federal money over to Vallejo and other similar cities, on the promise that they would continue to be used for education. With a group of my House colleagues I tried to bring this about and introduced a bill to accomplish such transfers. We submitted testimony on the matter to the Public Works Committee. I was fortunate in getting Mr. Alltucker to come before the committee and explain the situation in Vallejo, which was similar, but perhaps more aggravated, to what it was in many other war towns. He made a great witness. He thoroughly explained the problem; he was able to give answers to all the questions put to him and in every way he made an excellent showing. Naturally, I was greatly pleased that Mr. Alltucker, my constituent and friend, had made such a good impression. However, the Public Works Committee took the view of the Public Works Agency, that these schools should be sold to the local school districts. Nevertheless, our hearings brought the price down to practically a nominal amount and the thanks for this result is due to Mr. Alltucker more than to any other person.

John R. Alltucker is a true educator. He is unassuming, frank, friendly, and modest. He is continually thinking of how he can improve the opportunity for education for the pupils under his jurisdiction. He never took the attitude that Vallejo was the only city that had an acute problem in education. He recognized that others had similar situations. His relations with his Congressman were most cordial and friendly. He never made any unreasonable requests. His conduct was such as to make his Representative in Congress want to "break his neck" to do something for John Alltucker. Vallejo is to be congratulated on getting and keeping a man like him for 24 years. The board, including all members of it while he was superintendent, are to be congratulated on working so cordially with Mr. Alltucker and supporting him so loyally in working out the problems presented to the board during the trying war and postwar years.

His administration of the schools, in a manner that gave every war worker in the Mare Island yard the feeling that his children were being properly educated, raised the morale of these fine workers. This may account for the many awards that Mare Island and its workers received for their fine accomplishments.

McNeil Island

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an excellent article by Paul J. Squier, warden of McNeil Island Penitentiary, in the State of Washington. The article points up the very fine work being done at that institution:

MCNEIL ISLAND—EMERALD OF PUGET SOUND

(By Paul J. Squier, Warden, United States Penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash.)

The oldest, the most far-flung outpost, the only prison in the continental United States for which a navy is a necessity. McNeil Island stands out as an unique institution.

Before the State of Washington had come into being; before the Bureau of Prisons was organized; McNeil Island was a facility of the Federal Government for housing offenders. It was the United States marshals' jail, serving the great Northwest Territory. It became a part of the Federal prison system in 1909.

In the early days, when law enforcement consisted of the simple expedient of hanging or shooting a culprit when caught, rehabilitation was but a word in the dictionary. Prevention by detention was the most progressive method and, as early as 1875, mutineers from the sea, outlaws, and malefactors involved in illicit Indian traffic, were taken in clinker-built dinghys across the cold, tide-driven waters of Puget Sound to the island, 3½ miles out, where 27 acres were purchased and the first buildings erected.

Conditions were primitive. According to old records, the bath line for many years, took place in a wooden barrel, in water heated over hot rocks. Wood was the only fuel. Weather conditions, however, were temperate, running from an average summer high of 71.8 to a mean low, in wintertime, of 35.4. There was much rain.

Today, situated about 15 miles from Olympia, Wash., to the south and an equidistance from Tacoma to the north, McNeil Island receives inmates from an area extending from the icy wastes of the Alaskan Territory to the hot Mexican borders of southern California.

GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT

From its original holdings, the Government institution has grown until today it encompasses the whole of McNeil Island, an area of about 7 square miles or 4,400 acres.

By 1924 a population of 400 had already cramped living conditions and made additional area necessary. In 1926, in return for Federal timberlands, a transfer of the local school section was made to the institution. In this region, located some 3 miles inland from the main buildings, the penitentiary farm came into being the following year.

Nearly a decade later, the Government purchased the complete island and today we have a main institution with a normal capacity of 900 men (but with a present population of around 1,040), a large hinterland being constantly developed, and a McNeil Island Camp with a normal capacity of 250. The island has become a complete world of its own, self-contained and slowly approaching self-sufficiency.

Living quarters for inmates at the main institution are provided by three cell blocks, an honor dormitory and an admission and orientation unit. The modern hospital has a capacity of 80 beds. A 700-seat auditorium, built by the inmates, is one of the finest in the prison service. There are administration offices, school units for both academic and vocational classes, chapels, cannery, powerhouse, laundry, library, shipyards, and shops of various kinds.

Efforts toward improvements and more efficient facilities are constant and continuous. For example, the main kitchen is now undergoing extensive renovations. A new air-conditioned bread-room will reduce stale bread to a minimum and allow for the proper cooling of breakfast rolls and other bakery goods which develop pan taste when handled without the proper facilities.

The power plant is being enlarged and modernized, eliminating the ever present danger of power failure from the mainland. A Diesel motor of 800 kilowatts has recently been installed, and preparations are now under way for the installation of a new 1,200-kilowatt turbine.

The old, inadequate system of securing water from deep wells and springs was discarded in 1937 when the Butterworth Dam and reservoir were completed and the pumping system put into operation. The water from Eden Creek is filtered and pumped either to the camp, which has two steel tanks with a total capacity of 550,000 gallons, or to the concrete reservoir above the main institution which has a capacity of 680,000 gallons.

A second dam is now in process of completion and will insure an adequate supply of water for the expanding domestic, institutional, irrigative, and industrial uses. In order to derive multiple benefits from one operation, 100 acres of now almost impenetrable swamp will be changed by the dam into a placid lake, nestling in tranquillity below the evergreen forests. Thus is utility served without the sacrifice of beauty.

THE M'NEIL FARM CAMP

Supplanting the penitentiary farm, the McNeil Island Camp came into being in 1943, coincident with the closing of the camps at Dupont, Wash., and Kooskia, Idaho, due to curtailment of activities brought by the war and need for conserving staff manpower.

About half of the commitments to McNeil Camp are short-termers from the courts, and half are received by formal transfer from the main McNeil institution. Population during the past year has ranged from 280 to 355. The two institutions are most closely integrated, and are, of necessity, complementary—the camp furnishing a large proportion of fresh food, and the main institution furnishing services not available at the camp.

Prior to the war, the penitentiary maintained a farm population of 90 to 150 inmates, who worked at the farm and were housed and fed there in a modern dormitory, consisting of three squad rooms, housing 50 men each. The original dormitory and culinary unit and office space comprise the heart of the present unit. There are now three additional cottages of the war-time surplus variety which house 50 men each. In most respects, policies and functioning are according to commonly approved camp practices. However, this camp is unique in the Federal Prison System in that the officer personnel and all funds are provided through the main institution. There is excellent cooperation between the farm group, the camp administration, and the main institution—administrative, custodial, mechanical, and culinary departments.

The future holds some very interesting possibilities for the camp at McNeil Island. Orchard and berry development will play an important part n the farm economy and should contribute substantially to the cannery operation as well. Continued land development as recommended by the Soil Conservation Service, will contribute to the self-sufficiency of the dairy through more abundant pasture and hay, and enable us to establish and operate an economical beef venture. Close cooperation with the cannery will enable us to conserve surpluses and meet more and more of the steward's off-season needs. Our timber operation will some day become so important that its value can scarcely be overemphasized. The various elements should blend into a closely woven program to give the balance and unity which a prison farm should have.

Out of a total of 4,409 acres, the farm has slightly less than 1,000 acres of cultivated land. Perhaps 2,000 acres can best be considered forest land, since a fine stand of young fir in general. A recent soil conservation survey indicates about 600 acres favorable for production may be cleared and put into cropland. Land clearing is a sizable job, with tremendous fir stumps to be uprooted and burned before plowing can be started. Land clearing does provide productive winter work for the inmates and is a stabilizing influence on the work program. Practically all the acreage yet to be reclaimed will be devoted to pasture, forage, and small grain production—three of our most pressing needs.

The orchard and berry program is quite ambitious, with 300 acres devoted to this feature. Two hundred acres of this total represents young orchard that will need several years to reach full productivity. At that time about 65 acres of old orchard, scattered about the island, will have passed their usefulness and will be removed. This will leave a solid block of over 200 acres of productive fruit to effect the maximum operating economy. This orchard can be irrigated with facilities now available and should give good production in a few more years. Tree fruits being grown include apples, peaches, prunes, sweet and sour cherries, pears, and apricots.

The garden operation is quite sizable, with up to 80 acres devoted to it. Most of this land is irrigated with portable equipment from permanent underground installations. The chief handicap to the garden operation is unfavorably contoured land, a condition to be improved by clearing and developing adjacent areas.

The hog and poultry features provide pork and eggs to fill institutional requirements. Yearly pork production is around 500 head.

The dairy unit on McNeil Island has developed from a mediocre beginning, with grade animals purchased from here and there, to a herd of 67 high-grade milking cows. The first bulls with any important background used in the herd were loaned by the Department of Agriculture and came from the Huntley, Mont., experiment station. In 1940, a bull was purchased from Carnation Farms, and since that time several others have been obtained from the same source. Then, too, three bulls were supplied from our own institutions: one from La Tuna, and two from Terre Haute.

In 1940 the herd reached its highest average production, and was at the top of the list for the institution dairy herds.

During the war years, and since, production has been declining, due to the feed situation and the shortage of money for purchase of feed. The only purchased animals in the herd have been the bulls, until recently, when, through the efforts of Director Bennett and Warden Squier, nine purebred heifers were bought from Carnation Farms.

INDUSTRIES

Our industries are presently composed of four units: a cannery, a furniture-repair shop, a pallet shop, and a shipyard. A year-round average of some 20 percent of the inmate population is employed in this work.

The largest of the industries is the cannery—both in number of employees and in investment. Approximately 67,000 cases of canned goods have been prepared during the past year. The major part of this pack has been for the Army, and the balance has gone to our own institutions and to other Government agencies. The dehydrator is in a semiseparate unit.

The cannery is in operation about 7½ months of the year, and work is maintained on two shifts for a considerable portion of that time. In off-season, only about one-fourth as many men are employed in maintenance, repair, and shipping.

The pallet shop, which is the second largest industry, is presently working on an Army contract. This is operated on a piecework basis and peak production is 685 pallets in 1 day. Twenty-five thousand, 4-foot by 6-foot heavy equipment pallets have been completed in the past 6 months, involving the using of over 2,000,000 board feet of lumber and a large quantity of hardware.

The furniture-repair shop is engaged in refinishing office desks and chairs for the Army and for other Federal offices.

The shipyard is probably the best known of the island's industries. During the war three tugs were built for the Army, and later a tender was built for Alcatraz. More recently, the yard has been used to repair boats for the Coast Guard, and boats and barges for the island's navy.

INMATES

The inmate population is a heterogeneous group. Ages vary from 17 to 80 years, and sentences from 1 month to life-plus-60-years. Analogous variance obtains with regard to degrees of intelligence and culture. For example, recently one inmate chose to sleep on the floor and apparently did not know what a pillow was for until he became acclimated. Practically all professions are represented; the most rare is that of school teacher. The Negro population has increased over 400 percent since 1941, due to the influx of military prisoners and to shifting population. Our Eskimo population is increasing, but they present fewer problems than any other racial group. Only five of our present N. M. V. T. A-law violators are other than white. Commitments are largely from Washington, Oregon, and California.

EVENING ACTIVITIES

The year 1941 marked the beginning of the first attempt at an organized recreational program. Prior to this time various cliques almost completely monopolized the playing areas and consequently the bulk of the population was left with no alternative but to walk around the yard. A softball and an outdoor basketball league were formed and eventually developed into the present-day set-up wherein two leagues are in play. These are: Major league of eight teams in basketball, softball, and volleyball. The minor league of four teams is comprised of those lesser-skilled individuals who thus are given an opportunity to play with men of their own ability.

The drill hall, previously utilized for officers' training, was renovated and made available for winter-months activities. Basketball standards, punching-bag platforms, standards for volleyball courts were installed and, over a 6-year period, have finally evolved into a complete 6-month winter-program period. This area is utilized by the inmates from 12 noon to 8:30 p. m. during the regular workweek, and from 12 noon until 4 p. m. on Saturdays and Sundays. The use of this indoor area has been a splendid morale booster for all types of inmates, as a well-balanced program for both active and nonactive men is carried on by the recreational division.

Inmate committees work with the recreational officer and the officials in charge of the institution and thus promote cordial, well-received programs.

Visitors have been very favorably impressed with the sportsmanship shown by both players and spectators. Inmate officials have received words of praise for their work and the combined efforts of both inmates and officials has left a pleasing impression on the outsider.

Next to radio, the library with its 10,000 volumes and 48 magazines has the greatest number of participants. Each inmate has the opportunity to avail himself of the library at least three times a week, since it is open for 8 hours each day. Magazines are mostly distributed by request, usually about 75 a day. Books taken out average 300 to 400 an evening. Vocatfonal training is given in bookbinding and marbling. The second evening period is devoted to selected study groups, a great books discussion circle, and to the debating team. The actual debates with neighboring collegiate or high-school teams invoke a hearty interest and frequently attract an audience of several hundred inmates.

The auditorium is the scene of daily events such as church activities and the motion-picture shows (which make their appearance on every week end and on holiday occasions), as well as for vocational classes on Wednesdays, and for orchestra and choir practice; and on special occasions it is used for boxing matches or other activities such as outside lectures, debates, inmate shows, etc. It is also the usual meeting place for the personnel for regular or special lectures or discussion groups.

Evening school is likewise divided into two periods. Classes are conducted in the afternoon as well, but those are primarily for inmates with a full-time or half-time school assignment. The program is ambitious and entails academic, vocational, and avocational aspects. Most classes are held on alternate evenings, so a wider range may be offered. The supervisor states that less emphasis is being placed on the formal school-room type of class and that the trend is more toward vocational training and correspondence study. Correspondence study has more than tripled during the past 6 years. Some 8,000 lessons embracing more than 75 courses from 6 major sources have been completed during the past quarter.

The inmates have appreciated some innovations in the activity program. Our hinterland is especially fruitful in raising small colleges, and the education department has capitalized on their teacher-training and sociology departments to the extent that four of the students now take admission interviews, one teaches classes in sociology-psychology, and one compiled statistics for college credit.

Hobby-shop activities have rapidly increased in scope and number of participants. It is supervised by a custodial officer under direction of the education department. Twenty-one inmates are now engaged in flytying, 12 in leather work, 7 in weaving, 7 in woodwork, 1 in plastics, and 1 in art. The excellence of many of these products indicates that the avocations could be transformed into vocations and become the means of earning a good living.

PERSONNEL AND ORGANIZATION

Time is a commodity with which the administration is not too well supplied and, consequently, there is an ever-present emphasis on speed and efficiency. Organization is the keynote. Training and the time factor are under constant consideration.

For example—the McNeil Island fleet. Gone are the days of haphazard schedules, antiquated lapstreaks, and seagoing guards. Today, a highly trained group of maritime officers handles the 24-hour-a-day activities of passenger boats, freighters, tugs, power barges, and ferry service.

Boats arrive and leave in a steady stream: A freighter with a load of apples from eastern Washington or leaving with a cargo of canned goods for Alcatraz; a power barge loaded with lumber for the pallet crews; tugs bringing in scows piled high with Army salvage from Seattle; and, in between, the continuous clocklike runs of the passenger boats bringing in the shifts, business representatives, and new inmates.

These passenger boats alone excite the imagination. They must meet deadlines every hour of the day and most of the night. In spite of weather, unforeseen incidents, and other emergencies, they leave on the minute and return on time.

Boats have beached in heavy fogs and fast-running tides; bows have been smashed, striking submerged "deadheads" on stormy nights; there is the constant threat of broken log rafts and heavy Puget Sound traffic in high winds and rolling seas. Yet, to the credit of able and alert maritime crews, never has a boat been lost nor has a serious accident occurred in the thousands of McNeil Island runs.

The engineers and construction units are another example. Trucks, tractors, graders, bulldozers, and other heavy power equipment tune up every morning for another day of purposeful activity. Survey crews and office draftsmen work at top speed to keep ahead of the dam construction, the building, and the opening of new projects.

An intricate and strategic network of roads, guarding 14 miles of shoreline, must be kept in constant repair. Docks must be kept in first-class condition. To save time and money, the construction units have erected and run their own sawmill, organizing logging crews to keep them supplied with material from the island timberlands. A forestry unit has planted hundreds of young seedlings with the long view of a permanent forest crop.

All this business is run in close cooperation with the shops—the machine shops, which manufacture and supply new for old and broken parts; the auto shops, which keep the motor pool ready and running; the carpenter shops, which fill quick orders and needed repairs.

Over all this interlocking industry is a crack custodial force to see that the main purpose of the institution is not lost in the press of business; and educational and classification groups to foster rehabilitation—to get the right man into the right place. Finally, under one administrative head an effort is made to see that these widespread activities function smoothly, without conflict or friction, synchronized into one smooth-running organization.

All this is accomplished with a personnel of 250 employees, 75 of whom live with their families in modern homes on the island, about 25 in an up-to-date officers' quarters. The rest commute from Steilacoom, Tacoma, or adjacent areas. On the side, the island residents find it expedient to maintain a cooperative store, a filling station, and a part-time garage. Local organizations sponsor a well-rounded religious, recreational, and social activities program for all ages.

And so McNeil Island continues to function down through the years, growing, experimenting, changing with the times in its attempt to meet the needs of the Nation, striving to be of service to society, a credit to the Bureau, and an important and purposeful part of the United States Government.

Deferment of College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, President Samuel N. Stevens, of Grinnell College, has given a good deal of thought and study to the deferment of college students who pass the difficult aptitude tests, and his analysis of the matter is very worthwhile. I, therefore, ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include President Stevens' memoranda on the subject of protecting the national health and safety by permitting men to continue their education and not engage in military service until their program of study is completed. President Stevens' remarks follow:

1. This is not class legislation. A study was made with the cooperation of eight other colleges and universities of the economic backgrounds of the students in the colleges. These students come from families with incomes that range from $2,000 a year to over $100,000 a year. The median salaries fall within the range of between $3,600 and $5,000. Reports from the Department of Labor indicate that even in the field of industrial wages the averages today are within this range. Consequently, since the people in school involve economic backgrounds that are almost identical with the students in high school and the prospects generally it cannot be said that postponing military service of a college student is class legislation.

2. Education is not a luxury. It seems apparent from many of the discussions which have taken place that American people at times look upon higher education as a luxury which can be ignored or thrown out whenever an economic or political crisis arises which makes stresses and strains on our manpower. I am sure that you agree with me that there are no problems in our modern social economy which have remained as simple in structure or solution as they were in the early part of this century. It makes no difference how we deal with technicalities of production or distribution or with the problems of social control or with the problems of international policy. At every point the need for enlightened historically sound, scientifically accurate judgments is so pressing as to almost take on the nature of an emergency. We cannot expect to maintain world dominance economically or to give world leadership operating from an educational framework that is as obsolete as the horse and buggy is when seen in terms of whole plan.

We need in the national interest more and better leadership. We need men capable of arriving at sound social, political, moral and technical judgments. There is no substitute for processes of higher education. Russia recognizes this fact and systematically has her brightest and best men do intensive study at the university level. England recognizes this fact for England knows that her loss in world leadership is due in no small part to the thousands of her brightest men who were allowed to die on Flanders Fields. England today is poverty stricken for leadership because the men who might have reached the stature of national leaders in her economy are no longer alive. The loss was unnecessary. She no longer makes this mistake. Examine England's methods of deferring her men and you will find that she sees to it that her brightest and finest brains are not only given an opportunity to become educated before they enter the military service but are not permitted to enter military service at all. They serve the national interests by preparing themselves to carry great loads of great responsibility, after the present generation of old men has given up and passed out of the picture.

3. The national emergency does not require the sacrifice of educational growth and development for boys between 18 and 24 at the present time.

The Defense Department has consistently misled the American people in regard to this matter. I personally believe that the manner in which the American people have been misled by the Defense Department is almost immoral. I recognize the fact that the vast appropriations which have been asked for and freely given would never have been made possible had it not been for the induced crises stirred up by military leaders and encouraged by our executive department. It has yet to be demonstrated that any one of the services is in a position to adequately clothe, arm, and train the men now under their control.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

STATEMENT OF W. D. JOHNSON, VICE PRESIDENT AND NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS, IN OPPOSITION TO THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

My name is W. D. Johnson. I am a vice president and national legislative representative of the Order of Railway Conductors of America. I reside in Washington, D. C., and I maintain an office at 10 Independence Avenue. The general headquarters of the Order of Railway Conductors is located in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The Order of Railway Conductors was organized July 6, 1868, and is the second oldest railway labor organization in the United States.

As a representative of the Order of Railway Conductors, I am fully authorized to appear before this committee and file this statement in opposition to the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway project. Our opposition to this project dates back for approximately 20 years.

We are not opposing the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway project merely from the standpoint of railroad employees, regardless of the fact that if this project is constructed, many conductors will be adversely affected. In addition to our interest as railroad employees, we are very deeply concerned as taxpayers, both State and Federal. We are, therefore, at a loss to understand why the Federal Government should be urged by a few individuals to appropriate more than a billion dollars of Federal funds to be used to subsidize the construction of a water-transportation system that cannot in our judgment be justified by the widest stretch of imagination, particularly so from the standpoint of national defense.

The records show that our present transportation systems are fully adequate to meet present and future transportation needs even though there would be a substantial increase in both freight and passenger traffic. Therefore, the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway will simply mean taking away from present transportation systems tonnage that they are capable of handling and transferring it to another system. This is merely "robbing Peter to pay Paul."

In World War II, the proponents of the St. Lawrence project pleaded national defense, the same as they are doing at the present time. However, we have successfully fought two World Wars without the St. Lawrence project and I feel confident we will come out victorious in the present conflict without this added means of transportation.

It has been estimated that it will require from 7 to 10 years to construct this project. I am, therefore, wondering just how we will be able to carry on and meet the transportation needs during the interim period of construction. If we are able to carry on and meet the needs during the construction period, why can't we carry on after the project is constructed? In other words, if the future security of our great country is dependent upon the construction of a project that cannot be put into operation short of 8 or 10 years, I fear that our security will be destroyed long before the project is constructed, so why consider an expenditure of over a billion dollars of Federal funds for the construction of a nonessential project.

During World War II, the American railroads handled 97 percent of all organized military traffic and 90 percent of all war freight. Railroad management and employees were highly complimented by the President and other high-ranking officials for the efficient service rendered. It has been said many times by those in authority that if the railroads had failed to render prompt and efficient service, we would have suffered defeat in World War II. However, regardless of this outstanding transportation record, special effort is being put forth to deprive the railroads and the employees traffic that rightfully belongs to them.

I recall that General Eisenhower, on his return from his inspection tour abroad, stated in substance that our foreign allies are not inclined to give up, but on the contrary, they are eager to carry on provided they are supplied with the necessary implements of war. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be far more profitable and effective to use the vast sum of money that would be required to construct the St. Lawrence project to provide the necessary implements of war and get them in the hands of our allies at the earliest possible date.

I know that the engineers for the proponents have estimated the cost of construction of this project to be less than a billion dollars. However, past experience will show that the cost of construction of water projects far exceeded the estimates submitted and I daresay that the St. Lawrence project if constructed will not be an exception to the rule.

Railway employees are deeply concerned with respect to our national defense. They have no desire whatsoever to do anything that would in any way retard our defense program. We, therefore, feel that our opposition to the St. Lawrence project is fully justified and will prove to be helpful instead of harmful.

Let me say in conclusion that our job as American citizens is to face realities and to strengthen and support our basic industries. This is no time to waste our money or efforts in the furtherance of experimental dreams. I, therefore, sincerely hope that this committee will render an unfavorable report on this project.

Military Careers of Former West Point Football Stars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am enclosing an article written by Walter Stewart, one of the country's recognized sports writers.

All of us watch with interest the progress of outstanding football players at West Point during the course of their preparation for service as officers in the regular Military Establishment. It is but natural that we lose sight of their excellent reputations as they leave West Point, because in the course of things others must take their places in the public eye.

Coach Blaik, in a conversation recently, gave me some very interesting figures about the military service of recent well-known graduates. I communicated that information to Mr. Stewart and indeed he has paid a great tribute to these fine soldiers. His article follows:

Anyone thoughtless enough to angle a sneer toward football at West Point will have to lick the Honorable CLIFFORD DAVIS, a belligerent solon equipped with a built-in left hook and a grand pair of hands. We can't understand why anyone this side of the Kremlin would care to launch such a sneer, but our able and industrious lawmaker is prepared to kick in the teeth behind it.

Armed with the statistics of heroism, Congressman DAVIS strikes a deep bell tone from the heart of sporting America as he reports that.

1. Of the last nine captains of Army football teams, three have been killed in action. One of these three was our town's John Trent, the immortal warrior without fear and without reproach.

2. Since 1936 a total of 177 football lettermen have graduated and 95 percent have catapulted into service under fire.

3. Twenty percent have earned the Purple Heart for blood spilled in combat and 6 percent have been slain with faces set hard toward the enemy.

This is a record written in gore and guts and agony. It rates top brackets in football's hall of fame—in mankind's hall of fame. The backs and linemen of the United States Military Academy are a peculiar brand of tiger—a tireless and sacrificial type somewhat set apart from the average candidate for commission.

THE HARD WAY

Hours of practice are strictly limited and boiler-sized heads of steam must be jammed into these time capsules. Hard driven the cadets come out of the showers drained of energy and designed for an early rendezvous with the sack. But bed is a long way off—stiffly dug-in behind a rampart of textbooks. To reach it, the cadet must pierce an outpost line of higher mathematics—plow through a pulverizing fire blanket of bridge stresses before he crashes head-on into the final wall of resistance—the technique of fire control, English literature, and advanced Spanish.

Have you ever sought to concentrate upon a puddle of type when your brain sagged with your spine—when your shoulders quivered beneath the heavy anvils of fatigue? Well, we have—and no slight pressure is involved. Yet the football forces of West Point must keep in academic step with students who reach the study hour in comparative bright-eyed eagerness.

Of course football is nothing but war with the gloves on—the finest conditioner for a harsh and thankless profession. Yes, a cadet must flog his mind into stride when fatigue claws at his bowels—when cleated bruises freckle his hide and clean sheets wait a stride from the study table.

THE RUTHLESS PARALLEL

So the circumstances will be identical some fire-torn night when he crouches in the shifting shadows of a ruined cottage with a map spread across his knees and a flashlight quivering in his grubby paw. But this time the corporate life of a battalion, a division, an army is balanced upon the clarity of his thinking.

He is tired now—bone-tired and fighting back the tide of sleep which reaches out to engulf him. It is at this point that commanders strike with devastating skill, or see their units cut up and go back for reclassification. And the old fullback or tackle, toughened in heart and body and spirit, is the most likely candidate for success.

Yes, football is war with the gloves on—follows the same principles of tactics and strategy. As laid down by the military scientist, Von Klausewitz, one of these principles brings major attacking forces into contact with minor defensive units of the enemy. And what else is double teaming in football? On the defense, you seek to deploy and maneuver in such a manner that the foe will be unable to overwhelm you by massing at the critical point of assault.

Football offensives must blend air blows with ground power, and so must the winning general. You cannot advance the ball unless you are adept at feinting at one point and striking at another—building apparent strength at the flank and hitting up the center. The flag is pushed forward in the same intricate fashion.

Intelligence is equally vital on both fields. Scouting reports vary in detail, but the essentials are the same. What is the probable enemy intent and what are his capabilities? Where are the crevices of his defense? With these facts at his elbow, coach and commanding officer assess them endlessly and sketch flexible plans.

But men do not react precisely to the lines drawn upon a map or a blackboard. The foe has beefed up left tackle by overshifting, or moved artillery to saturate an area intelligence had described as a favorable avenue of approach to the jump-off. So one of the alternate plans must be adopted and put into immediate operation. The change must be made under full pressure and without losing momentum—a cruel task for a quarterback or regimental commander.

And for solid proof, read the roll call of glory—Army football men who moved on to the fire-swept slopes where games are played for deadly keeps. Eisenhower, Bradley, Stillwell, Neyland, Sultan, Patton, Gearhart, O'Donnell, Hobbs, O'Hare—a brilliant, surging listing.

So as long as we operate efficient and sharply striking football teams at West Point we'll have a hard corps of brilliant combat officers. Many of those who formed that doomed 6 percent failed to make the All-America while they played at the Academy. They waited a few years.

Sanctions Against Chinese Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

FRANKFORD LIONS CLUB,
Philadelphia, Pa., April 18, 1951.

Hon. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.,
Representative Sixth District, Pennsylvania, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SCOTT: Your news letter dated March 26, 1951, in which you advocate that sanctions be placed against the Chinese Communists unless they withdraw beyond the Korean borders, in which case our troops, Air Force and Navy, would assume a noncombatant status pending their replacement by other occupation forces from all the peace-loving nations of the world, was read at the last meeting of this club.

In the belief that this Nation should take a definite stand and adopt an understandable policy with respect to the Chinese Communists and the Korean situation, we wish to inform you that a resolution was unanimously adopted by 112 members of this club in support of House Resolution No. 173, providing for sanctions to be approved against the Chinese Reds, but before they are used, the United Nations is to call for a cease-fire, involving the withdrawal of the Chinese beyond the Yalu River, followed by the U. N. recommendation for guaranteeing an independent Korea within protected boundaries.

Sincerely yours,
LIONS CLUB OF FRANKFORD,
By JAMES E. EMBERY, Secretary.

America for Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY L. TOWE
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement sent to me by the members of the Third Medical Battalion, Third Infantry Division, now in Korea:

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS

Frankly, we, the fighting men in Korea, are more worried about the Communists at home than the Chinese we are facing. At least here we are on even terms. We are both armed. But our families back home cannot defend themselves against the many sneaky tricks of the Communists in their midst. Further, we feel the sentences imposed on those Commies accused to date have been far too lenient, and in addition, we cannot see them enjoying the sanctity of our jails. The American taxpayer, including us over here in Korea, are getting fed up paying for trials and retrials and appeals and the upkeep of these undesirables in our jails.

We wish to offer to the American people a plan for ridding our country of those who don't seem to like our form of government at absolutely no cost to the taxpayers. Will all people at home insist that all those who don't like our Constitution, including the likes of Earl Browder, Eugene Dennis, Paul Robeson, Alger Hiss, Harry Gold, and the many others who have betrayed us, and those who always seem to be ridiculing the American way of life, insist again that these people be deported from the United States. We suggest these rodents be sent over to Korea and turned over to the military, who will see to it that they are given safe conduct to the thirty-eighth parallel and presented to their Chinese comrades. The cost of this project will be borne, and with great enthusiasm, by donations of the fighting men in Korea.

Send them over to us and we will do the rest. How about it, all you good people back home? Let us save and keep America for Americans.

MEMBERS OF THE THIRD MEDICAL BATTALION, THIRD INFANTRY DIVISION, APO, 468.

"A United States Air Force Mission With the Atomic Bomb, What It Looks Like, and How It Is Delivered"—Jim Berryman, Cartoonist-Illustrator, the Washington Star

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if anyone has ever successfully analyzed the elements of education in art, music, economics, scientific and technical subjects, commerce, labor, agriculture, trade, finance, law, medicine, the humanities, and other subjects which constitute some of the facets of an able, well-rounded and successful cartoonist.

I have seen men like Tad Dorgan, Cliff Berryman, John McCutcheon, and Herb Block, impart a more fluent, legible, understandable, and factual story with a few brush or pencil strokes—in a cartoon—than most persons are able to express in a 1-hour talk, and on almost any subject.

In addition to a thorough understanding of the classical arts and sciences, of the intricate problems of psychology, sociology, and the humanities, a good cartoonist must at the same time be endowed not alone with a lively imagination and well-developed, indefinable sense of humor, but an even deeper-seated realization of the most serious problems of life.

Mr. Speaker, I doubt if this world has ever had two cartoonists endowed to a more marked degree than has characterized the internationally known and beloved Clifford Kennedy "Cliff" Berryman and his equally distinguished son, James T. "Jim" Berryman.

The work of the late Clifford K. Berryman intrigued this Nation for more than a half a century. The Berrymans—father and son—were not only both winners of the Pulitzer prize, but both were president of Washington's famed Gridiron Club of writers and cartoonists Jim Berryman is now the president of the famous Gridiron Club which satirizes public officials at two large dinners each year. He has long been both a magazine illustrator and a writer, specializing in the popular presentations of technical subjects, and made a considerable number of drawings, both for the United States Navy, Army, and the United States Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that every man, woman, and child, in these United States could read this splendid article by our good friend, Jim Berryman, entitled "A Mission With the Atomic Bomb, What It Looks Like, and How It Is Delivered," as reproduced in the Washington Star, last evening.

Mr. Speaker, it would be like painting the lily for me to try to explain the wonderful piece of writing and illustrations done by this great artist-writer.

At long last we have a factual report as to just what we might expect to happen when the United States Air Force B–36 or a B–50 travels alone to its target devoid of fighters and as a single, lonely package of destruction.

Jim Berryman said yesterday when I talked with him:

"Congressman, I wrote and illustrated this article simply to enlighten the average man, woman, and child—to give all of them faith and courage in what we in America have done and can do—to protect our American way of life if and when any eventuality arises that might make it necessary to protect these shores.

"After seeing what Gen. Curtis LeMay has in hand, I am satisfied that the American internal defenses are not going to be wrecked by a murderous attack from the heavens as they were at Pearl Harbor because General LeMay is not letting his Air Force be caught like a lot of sitting ducks."

Mr. Speaker, that Americans everywhere throughout the country and particularly the children in our rural sections whose teachers daily read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, may gain an inkling of but one phase of what is being done by the United States Air Force to secure our lives, under the unanimous consent of my colleagues, I extend my remarks. I desire to include within my remarks a brief statement made by Gen. Curtis LeMay, Chief of the Strategic Air Command, United States Air Force, and a wonderfully illustrated article accompanying it, the same written by Jim Berryman, cartoonist and illustrator for Look magazine, as reproduced in the Washington Star, where we in Congress almost daily see and enjoy his work:

STATEMENT FOR LOOK BY LT. GEN. CURTIS LEMAY, CHIEF OF THE STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

The primary objective of the military forces of the free world is peace. Air Force Secretary Thomas K. Finletter has defined the mission of air power in this connection as being one of the most important means for preventing war and establishing a world of peace.

The role of Strategic Air in this is one which is very clear and seriously held by us in the Air Force Strategic Air Command. We feel that by having our strategic bombers in the highest possible state of readiness, we are serving as a most potent force to deter any aggressor. We also are serving as a force which can help win the victory should war come in spite of the most earnest efforts of the leaders of the free world.

The officers and airmen of the Strategic Air Command understand the terrific responsibility which is theirs. The ability to deliver atomic weapons gives us a power which is enormous, but we are firmly dedicated to using that power toward the preservation of the peace and security of the free world as we know it.

The news article was as follows:

FLYING AN ATOMIC BOMB MISSION WITH SELECT B–50 CREW—STAR CARTOONIST BERRYMAN MAKES THE FIRST SKETCHES AND WRITES THE FIRST STORY OF HOW AIR FORCE BOMBER DELIVERS WORLD'S MOST LETHAL WEAPON AND RETURNS

(By James T. Berryman)

They said it was a dry A-bomb run. But it seemed live enough to me in the pressurized B–50's forequarters at 30,000 feet altitude. For only a bulkhead door separated the navigator and me from the atomic bomb's cradle in the 60-degree below zero temperature of the bomb bay.

Man's most destructive weapon lies rigidly fixed in its launching position. At the attack unfolds, the navigator occasionally glances at the grotesque bulk of what he calls "The Thing" through a circular-glass peephole in the bulkhead. This is probably unnecessary, for the bomb is immovable until it is released automatically by the magic of electronics. This ghastly weapon is preset when the B–50 rises from the earth on its fateful mission.

I think I am one of the few civilians, and surely the only cartoonist-illustrator, to have flown on a simulated A-bomb mission. The security-conscious crew of the B–50 looked at me with goggle-eyed wonder when Lt. Col. Harry E. Stengele, wing commander of the Ninety-sixth Bombardment Squadron, announced to them that I was authorized to go on their mission, sketching pad, pencils, crayons, and all. This was at Hunter Air Force Base, Savannah, Ga.

SEEKS TO SCOTCH RUMORS

I was there because Maj. Gen. Roscoe C. Wilson, deputy chief of staf. on Operations for Atomic Energy—and once a cartoonist at West Point—thought a cartoonist illustrator could tell a big part of the A-bomb story without giving away any vital technical information to your enemies.

He said, "I believe it is high time some of the ridiculous stories circulated about the A-bomb be killed and buried once and for all. I've even heard rumors that hundreds of thousands of American people fearfully believe that an enemy agent could board a Hoboken ferry toting the bomb in a zipper bag and blow Manhattan clear over into Brooklyn."

An enemy agent about the size of the legendary Paul Bunyan, strong man of the north woods, would find it a strain to carry the A-bomb fitting into the B–50 (No. 8117) on which I flew as supercargo. I don't say there aren't smaller bombs. But this type, which is the standard 1951 model, is a whopper.

BOMBER LOWERED OVER CARGO

It is towed out by tractor to the waiting, fueled B–50, all 10,000 pounds of it shrouded under canvas like a bulbous corpse. The big, 99-foot-long bomber has been lifted by its nose by a crane and rests back almost on its tail at an 18- or 20-degree angle. Ground crews surround "the thing" like ants and shove it on its easy-riding dolly under the belly of the bomber, just below the gaping bomb-bay doors.

The shrouds come off as the bomber is slowly lowered over its cargo by the crane which has held up its nose. A hydraulic lift draws the bomb up into its launching position in a supporting nest of four triangular braces. Big set screws are turned down by hand until the bomb is rigid in its carriage. Then the bomb-bay doors snap shut with force enough to cut a man in two.

And there on the airfield's concrete apron, her wings spanning 141 feet, lies this ominous silver-gray lady, pregnant and ready to deliver.

While the specifications of the bomb are classified, it is possible to describe it in general terms. I do not, in fact, know the exact specifications.

APPROXIMATELY 20 FEET LONG

The bomb, I believe, is approximately 20 feet long and 9 or 10 feet in diameter. It is about the bulk of an average-sized living room.

Unlike conventional bombs, this weapon is bulbous, not tear-dropped.

The men call it "the thing," or "the panic," the "ostrich egg," or just "the bomb."

A drenching rain slapped our faces as we left the briefing room of the Ninety-sixth Bombardment Squadron to board the 8117.

JETS FAILED TO PIERCE WEATHER

Above the storm, a crewman said: "Boy, what a beautiful night. Those damned fighters never will find us now." That was my first news that fighters would be out after us as we winged toward target X. The jets never got up. They were locked in by weather, that wonderful, awful weather.

Target X is a city. I cannot say what city. It is one of a number of cities closely approximating the characteristics of a Russian city or cities earmarked for attack if the United States Strategic Air Command ever has to make its great strike. The crew of the No. 8117 know now where it will go if R-day ever comes. The B–50, work horse of the strategic air command, and heavily armed, can bomb at 30,000 feet, traveling at 350 miles per hour in all kinds of weather.

Each B–50, equipped with atomic bombs is a bomber force in itself, by World War II standards. It packs the punch of a 500-plane raid. Under typical conditions, the B–50 travels alone to its target.

There are hundreds of these SAC work horses. I believe there are hundreds of bombs. There are also a few hundred of the "select" type of crew with which I flew, and several more hundreds only a little less skillful.

Inside the 8117, as we clambered on, it was like a superelectronic workshop; a maze of dials and instruments beyond imagining. Every man of the 10-man crew had a steady, excruciatingly detailed task.

We headed for target X and it was all business. These atomic-bomber men are not kids. They are in their late twenties and early thirties, most of them family men, and they are deadly serious. There is little of the kidding over the plane's intercom, as among the bombers of the last war. That "Thing" in the rear compartment has a sobering influence.

Target X was roughly 1,300 miles from the take-off. Later I looked on the maps and found that there are many bases available to the United States Air Force less than 1,300 miles from vital points in, let's say, Russia.

It was, they said, a routine flight. To me it was magic journey through a nether world of gray-green haze interspersed with violent storms.

WAS AUTOMATIC OPERATION

Tension increased as we approached target A. This was a full dress radar automatic operation.

As the target was approached, control of the great B–50 passed out of the hands of its pilots into the hands of our radar navigator. He was Major Sharpe, of Moran, Tex., 33-year-old father of a 3-year-old son and a 6-year-old daughter.

Major Sharpe is known among the crew as a "bad boy" because he has to sit in a corner. Directly before his eyes is the radar scope. On his right hand in the little corner is a fantastic panel of dials and meters. The same on his left hand.

The radar scope is Major Sharpe's eyes. He sees on it the pattern of the terrain over which 8117 is traveling. Its center is round, like a pie, and two lines mark out a wedge of the pie. Radio beams bounce against any metallic objects on the ground, and reflect back through night and storm to make the pattern on the radar scope. The wedge is important. When the two lines, closing like a pair of shears, come together, the A-bomb plunges out of the bomber's belly and heads for the target through the darkness of night or the gloom of the overcast.

As target X spread its points of light on the radar scope, Navigator-Bombardier Capt. Milton Timothy, 32, announced into the intercom: "Approaching I. P." This meant that the plane was approaching the initial point from which the bomb run would be made.

"Aircraft on gyro," said Maj. Leslie R. McKee, 31-year-old atomic commander of the 8117. "Radar bombardier in control." Major Sharpe now had control of the plane. He had become "Mr. Atomic." His job was to make adjustments in the automatic gyropilot control which would bring together the closing scissors blades on the radar scope and put the plane on its target. He was checked over the intercom by Captain Timothy in the nose of the plane, and as Major Sharpe became "Mr. Atomic," the flight engineer, Lt. Merle Bare, already busy at his controls, now became a human rheostat. Under his skilled hands, the ship had to maintain the exact speed and altitude to coincide with Major Sharpe's electronic and radar calculations.

Major McKee and Lieutenant Colonel Stengele, in the pilot's seats, sat and waited, all the while checking and rechecking the instrument panels before them—the true air speed, functioning of the engines, wind velocity, etc.

The story of these hushed 4 minutes was being told on a time gage before the eyes of Radar Navigator Sharpe and on the radar scope as the two lines came together. The time gage ticked off its last second and the lines came together at the same instant.

This was the instant of the A-bomb's release. Something over 40 seconds later it would have exploded over its target at the exact height for which it was set.

DIRECT HIT INDICATED

In this case 8117's lethal cargo was not dropped. If it had been, the plane, rid of its 5-ton burden, would have lurched forward and up. It would have been 4 to 5 miles away when the atomic blast came.

Radar impulses showed that this test run of the A-bomb discharge technique had scored a direct hit.

"How accurate are bomb drops," I asked. "Well," said one of the officers, "suppose you were the manager of a big strategic warehouse in the Urals. Suppose you had a ground-to-plane short wave. You might hear the buzzer, and it would be on your wavelength." And we would say, "Here's that A-bomb you ordered, Mr. Voronovsky. Do you want it on the front step or in the back yard?"

After we wheeled away from the target we headed for our refueling point. I wasn't prepared for the huge air tanker which appeared over us. The connecting link between the planes was actually fired from a boom gun into our plane's opened refueling hatch. We took on thousands of gallons of gasoline in such a routine fashion that it seemed like pulling up to a ground pump.

This operation has changed the whole nature of our strategic air attack.

General LeMay and his boys carry a terrific wallop. I am convinced there are also a good many bombs tucked away in some very convenient spots.

We wheeled back to the air base over water. It was a comfort to see through one break of the clouds a tiny green island below us with wide, shining concrete runway covering the length of it. This could be home some day for a crippled B–50.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Is an Age-Old Scheme That Is Not New to the American People

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway is one of the several New Deal hobbies inherited by the Fair Deal spenders that cannot be masqueraded as a defense emergency project, according to the New Orleans (La.) Times-Picayune in its issue of February 20, 1951. The editorial follows:

ST. LAWRENCE SCHEME AGAIN

The old St. Lawrence seaway scheme, which bobbed up again in Mr. Truman's legislative carryall, reappeared briefly before the Mississippi Valley Association at its St. Louis meeting. A proposal to endorse it "in the interest of the national defense emergency" was promptly rejected and the association thereafter reaffirmed its opposition for reasons frequently stated and considered sound and sufficient by the country and Congress over a long term.

The only new talking point of its advocates was that presented at the St. Louis meeting—that the project's adoption would be "in the interest of the national defense emergency." Since it would require years for completion, the present defense emergency would be long gone before any aid from the St. Lawrence project could be available. And since material and labor costs have winged their way to a new and fantastic "high" since the diameter of the hole this St. Lawrence business would make in the National Treasury has been estimated carefully, most Americans feel that total cost, condemned as excessive years ago, would be practically prohibitive now when our Federal debt has attained cloud-touching proportions and the essential needs for defense must be supplied at a cost so prodigious that it worries all intelligent folks.

The St. Lawrence seaway scheme is one of the several New Deal hobbies inherited by the Fair Deal spenders that cannot be masqueraded as a defense emergency project. Congress, wrestling with the hugely difficult problem of financing our defense necessities, should lighten the overload by deleting the nonemergency items camouflaged into the administration's emergency spending plan to give it the appearance of another "squander spree." The costly St. Lawrence scheme is one of the obvious deletables.

Dean Gooderham Acheson Shifts His Stance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, last November the Secretary of State directed his scornful remarks against Senator TAFT, who had demanded a reexamination of our foreign policy. A gale of public wrath is blowing the Secretary now, and he is conveniently shifting his stance, as Mr. Felix Morley points out in Barron's this week. Members are invited to read this important article which I shall insert at this point:

REEXAMINATION IS HERE—AS THE MACARTHUR TRIUMPH MOUNTS, MR. ACHESON SHIFTS HIS STANCE

(By Felix Morley)

Even before General MacArthur reached Washington the Truman administration was reeling under the impact of his triumph.

Last Wednesday night, as the Bataan was winging east from San Francisco, Secretary of State Acheson sought to patch some crumbling sections of his foreign policy. Speaking to the Women's National Press Club, the Secretary tried to make it appear that he welcomes what he euphemistically called "discussions" of his leadership.

"These discussions," said Mr. Acheson, "make up the national mind and focus the national will." Out of them "comes a national agreement upon conclusions, produced by the innate common sense of the American people when they have heard all sides and have come to the point of decision."

Listening to these fine phrases, some of the Secretary's audience pinched themselves, to be sure they were awake. It was recalled that only 5 months ago, on November 17, Mr. Acheson made his sarcastic reexaminist speech, directed at Senator TAFT's post-election statement that our foreign policy must be reexamined.

On November 17 Mr. Acheson retorted: "We need to look at this reexaminist and see what kind of a person he really is." The Secretary then compared him with a farmer, "who pulls up all his crops to see how they have done during the night." Having "put our hand to the plow," concluded Mr. Acheson, "does it make sense to say, 'I want to reexamine our programs?' "

Now Mr. Acheson answers that question in the affirmative. He says we have not yet "come to the point of decision." He agrees—belatedly now—that there is a great debate on foreign policy and says that reexaminists play an invaluable role therein.

Like Hamlet before him, Dean Gooderham Acheson knows a hawk from a handsaw when the wind of popular sentiment veers sharply. When it is blowing as strongly against those in office as is the case in this country today politicians accept what they cannot prevent. Secretary Acheson's job is in jeopardy. A recantation could save it, at least temporarily. So he too is thumbing a ride on the bandwagon of reexamination.

With General MacArthur's address to both Houses of Congress last Thursday this bandwagon really began to roll. For that address, noble in conception and beautiful in delivery, was also a deeply controversial document.

The former Supreme Commander in the Pacific told Congress that "the whole epicenter of world affairs" is rotating back to Asia. State Department policy has been based on the assumption that Western Europe is of far greater importance to the United States.

General MacArthur asserted that Chinese imperialism, rather than communism, is the immediate problem in Asia. This does not accord with present thinking in the Department of State.

General MacArthur never once mentioned the United Nations, acclaimed as the foundation stone of State Department policy. But the general did pointedly emphasize "the malicious gossip" which undermined the strength of Chiang Kai-shek. Most of the criticism thus characterized has emanated from, or has been inspired by, the Far Eastern Division of the Department of State.

The general further says flatly that "decisions in the diplomatic sphere" necessary to achieve a Korean settlement have not been made, and that his appeals for such decisions were distorted. It is the duty of the Department of State to make diplomatic decisions, and General MacArthur's charge of distortion cannot, in simple justice, be left unanswered.

Finally, the general asserts that the Joint Chiefs of Staff shared his viewpoint about both the strategy and tactics of the Korean campaign. To this the Department of Defense, on Thursday night, gave a strangely evasive reply, saying merely that the Joint Chiefs of Staff concurred in President Truman's decision to relieve MacArthur of his command. That is no answer to the point the general makes.

The cumulative importance of General MacArthur's assertions are given great political substance by the character of the receptions given him in San Francisco, Washington and New York. The old soldier himself may conceivably fade away, though at the moment it looks as though the fade-out will be very gradual, and is far from imminent. Regardless of his future as an individual, however, the issues MacArthur raised before Congress must be explored by Congress. And, as Secretary Acheson has been prompt to realize, they involve reexamination of a very searching nature.

This scrutiny, in the first place, will be in executive session, probably before the Senate Armed Services Committee sitting jointly with the Foreign Relations Committee. The hearings will, of course, involve detailed testimony from General MacArthur himself, but others are certain to be called.

It is already apparent that the inquiry will go back of the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, to examine both the basis and the direction of our postwar policy toward China. General Marshall will have to take the witness stand again, not only as present Secretary of Defense but also as President Truman's special envoy to China in 1945–47.

Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer, whose report on Korea has never been made public, will be another expert witness. So, in all probability, will be Gen. Patrick J. Hurley, who early in 1945 so strongly resisted the proposals to furnish the Chinese Communists with American arms and money. There are several former and present officials of the Department of State who are likely to be questioned in this connection.

If the Republican plans work out, former Defense Secretary Louis Johnson will be another star witness. And, of course, Mr. Acheson will eventually be summoned to answer the MacArthur charges, and to fill in some of the omissions which are so glaring in the white book on China compiled by the Department of State nearly 2 years ago.

The nature of the public response to General MacArthur, as much as the controversial nature of his address to Congress, insures a thorough and overdue inquiry into the conduct of our far-eastern policy, from Yalta on. It is even suggested that Alger Hiss, as one of the original architects, should be temporarily released from the penitentiary to give evidence.

That acid proposal is on the extreme side. But it helps to illustrate the temper of some Members of Congress following the MacArthur address. Administration spokesmen admit that they have no hope of choking off the comprehensive reexamination now shaping up. Their efforts will be to justify, rather than to conceal, a record of which so much is still brushed under the rug.

The decision to have the coming hearings secret is undeniably wise. For some of the disclosures promise to be sensational and some of the testimony is certain to be bitter. And while it is vital for the public to know the background of our present troubles, too much distraction from the confrontation of those troubles as they stand today would be deplorable.

After all, we have an army fighting against great odds in Korea, and many other hostages to fortune that demand concentrated attention all around the globe.

Deceiving the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, what the American people demand is not only justice to them but also fair play and justice to our fighting forces in Korea. There is a unanimous sentiment on the part of the people throughout the United States in favor of the position taken by General MacArthur with reference to affairs in the Far East.

The people are in no mood for political trickery with the security of our Nation involved, and especially with the lives of our fighting forces who are now paying a heavy death toll for the Truman fiasco.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting as a part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of April 26, 1951:

John O'Donnell in the New York Daily News provides the information which explains General MacArthur's statement to Congress that the measures he proposed for ending the Korean war in the shortest time and with minimum loss of life were fully shared by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The Pentagon did not reply to that statement. It merely stated that the Joint Chiefs joined with Mr. Truman's civilian advisers in supporting the dismissal of MacArthur.

APPEASEMENT PLANNED

Mr. O'Donnell makes clear why no reply is possible. He states that last January 12 the Joint Chiefs formally approved the military measures urged by MacArthur for bringing the war to a conclusion. MacArthur's report, with their endorsement, went to Secretary of Defense Marshall, General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, was then united in support of the MacArthur recommendations with General Collins, Army Chief of Staff; General Vandenberg, Air Force commander, and Admiral Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations.

"Marshall, Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and—on their advice—President Harry Truman embalmed that MacArthur dispatch in deep official secrecy back 3 months ago," O'Donnell states. "The shameful reason was that Acheson and Marshall during those days were discussing with the British and French the idea of appeasing the Commies by turning over Formosa to the Red China regime, kicking the Nationalist China representative out of the U. N. to make way for a Kremlin satellite, and so preserve by paying blackmail British trade with Communist China, the crown colony of Hong Kong, and the tottering French colonial empire in Indochina."

As O'Donnell observes, the only security involved in the suppression of these facts is the political security of the Truman administration. This is another instance in which the New Dealers have endeavored to deceive the American people. It is of the same pattern as the calculated confusion and deceit employed to mask administration moves which brought down the Japanese attack upon Pearl Harbor.

Many other examples of resort to subterfuge and deception readily come to mind.

There was the wartime suppression of the dramatic story provided by Lt. Col. William E. Dyess of the death march on Bataan, in which Dyess was threatened with court martial if the facts were published. The administration's fear was that an outraged American public would demand, with a single voice, that it prosecute the neglected war in the Pacific with utmost energy to effect the speedy rescue of suffering American prisoners, instead of using the American war machine to abet British imperialism in Africa and further British aims in Europe.

CONSPIRACY STILL EXISTS

The administration still is in conspiracy with England. It used to allot its favors impartially between the English and the Russian imperialists, as in the days when Alger Hiss was planted in Roosevelt's State Department, when Roosevelt himself was making fantastic concessions to Stalin, and, later, when the Achesons, Lattimores, and Services were joined with General Marshall in selling China into Communist hands.

British control of our State Department, through Acheson, is no disfavor to Stalin. England, placing its Asiatic possessions and trade above honor, leads the United Nations in the efforts to appease communism. General MacArthur was sacrificed to the English, but in Moscow the removal of the foremost antagonist of communism has caused rejoicing equal to that in London.

Any pretense that secrecy is justified in relation to the administration's scandalous treatment of General MacArthur is cockeyed. In an administration as hospitable to foreign influence as Truman's, and as leaky of secrets, both Russia and England have access to all of our information of every kind. Only Americans are kept in ignorance.

We Must Put Freedom First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. SMITH

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include an editorial from the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News, edited by an outstanding figure in American journalism, Maj. Frederick Sullens:

WE MUST PUT FREEDOM FIRST

Within very recent weeks the American people have taken some urgently needed steps to avert present danger; steps showing that as a Nation we now know, deep in our hearts, that we have never been in greater peril; steps showing that at long last we are facing up to the central fact of our time. We face the fact that the Soviet Union—in its drive for world conquest—threatens the security of our homes and even our very hopes for the future.

One proof that we are emerging from both our historic isolationism and from our complacency is that the Congress the other day passed an unprecedented measure authorizing the sending of American troops to Western Europe for the purpose of assisting the free nations of that area in their defense against any possible Soviet onslaught.

So much, then, to our credit. Yet it remains to be seen whether we recognize the full extent of our danger, how pressing it is, and how intense it is. Certainly we haven't yet made our position clear on three issues of transcendent importance.

First of all, while the Congress has made tremendous appropriations for preparedness, they have not yet levied those extra taxes that will enable us to come close to a pay-as-we-go fiscal policy. Yet unless there is willingness on the part of the Congress to impose and willingness on our part as taxpayers to accept the hardship of those taxes today, we cannot expect that tomorrow we can control or even arrest a serious inflation—an inflation that would destroy our ability to build up our own military might, since it would sap the economic health and vitality upon which our military might be based.

The masters of the Kremlin would like nothing better than to see us wreck our economy through uncontrolled inflation. This would be for them the cheapest of all victories. Moreover, a serious inflation in the United States would swiftly make itself felt throughout the entire free world. It would, for example, nullify one of the Marshall plan's major accomplishments—the defeat of inflation in Western Europe. In 1948, financial chaos prevailed in most Marshall plan nations. Today they have reached financial stability. That stability would be shattered if American prices continued to climb. Further increases would threaten Europe's economic recovery and its own rearmament program. This would be another very cheap victory for the Communists. A conquest at no cost.

In the second place, if we are to act as if we were genuinely aware of our danger, we must have national unity not as a lip-service platitude but as a working reality. Lack of unity is an enemy within, a sixth column, sowing doubt and confusion and even paralysis. One practical test of our unity is the kind of backing we give to General Eisenhower in his immensely difficult and delicate job of unifying the military defenses of the Western World. And let's not forget that if he succeeds in his great task in Europe he will be helping immeasurably to bring us in America security and relief from crisis spending.

Another practical test is the backing we give to General Ridgway in his new post as commander in chief of the forces of the United Nations in Korea. His is a tough task and the fate of thousands, of tens of thousands of American boys, depends on how well he meets it. We must not let even honest differences of views as to the action in dismissing General MacArthur embarrass General Ridgway because if it does, if there is a let-down of morale on the fighting front because of quarreling on the home front the cost will be reckoned in blood.

Another practical test as to our unity is in the field of foreign policy. If our foreign policy is to be effective, the Republican and Democratic Parties must cooperate, must move forward together toward a common goal. When we Americans address ourselves to the world we must speak as the voice of the Nation and not as that of a single party. We must rise above partisanship. The vote of every Senator and Congressman should register his individual conviction as an American rather than as a Republican or a Democrat. There should be no such thing as a Republican foreign policy or a Democratic foreign policy. There should be only an American foreign policy, which in turn must be in tune with the foreign policies of all of our friends and allies who are sharing with us the hard and difficult task of thrusting back Communist imperialism, whether in Europe, southeast Asia, Africa, the Middle East, or South America.

Central to that foreign policy is a recognition of the interdependence of the free world. In resources, material, intellectual and spiritual, the free nations as a group have an overwhelming advantage over the Soviets and their satellites. The problem is one of mobilizing of those resources. Some of the resources of the free world are located in underdeveloped areas. That is one reason why we should help the people in these areas to help themselves. But there is a more compelling reason. These people yearn for a life in which there is some dignity and some comfort. The Communists promise them such a life. They are not interested in communism as an ideology—only those things which communism falsely promises. Actually they ask for little and need little; better seeds for better crops; some fertilizer; a steel plow in the place of a stick. If through a sensibly and economically operating program of the foreign aid we can continue to win friends and help strengthen the free world, we will have made an investment which will pay off magnificently. Benjamin Franklin said it a long time ago—but it is worth recalling now: "We must all hang together or assuredly we will all hang separately."

In the third place, if we are genuinely aware of the fact that the chips are really down in this conflict now going on between the free world and the Kremlin, we will again bring up for early consideration the enactment of a law establishing universal military service. It is the one move in the period immediately ahead that will insure not only an adequate pool of trained military manpower but also keep the cost of our defense establishment at a figure which we can live with. Right now the average American private is paid about $3.00 a day plus allowances for dental care and the like. Make no mistakes about it. He needs it. He needs all of it. And as long as we keep on drafting men who are the sole support of young wives and other dependents, we should continue the present rate of pay.

But we won't have to draft men in their middle twenties, men who have already served their country, if universal military service is adopted. Not only that, but it is only through universal military service that we can build up a defensive strength so impregnable that it can hold off Communist aggression. You know how it would work. At the age of about 18 all male Americans—meaning all regardless of their I. Q.—before they have assumed family obligations, would go into Armed Forces training establishments for, say, a 2-year hitch. They would be given good care and food and clothing, enough pay for incidental expenses, perhaps a dollar a day. By the way, a Turkish officer gets a dollar a month. At the end of the training period our men would be released from their boot camps or air bases or cantonments. They could return to their jobs or they could continue their schooling. At the same time they would become members of a well-trained Reserve whose very existence would eventually enable us to reduce the size of our standing Army. This training for war in time of peace or even in time of a so-called localized war such as the one now going on in Korea does not come easily to us Americans. We are antimilitaristic by instinct. However, we can manage to survive only if we recognize the scope of the catastrophe that awaits us if we fail to do everything, no matter how unpleasant and painful, that we can do to make and keep ourselves strong.

We have always known that to win a war we had to wage war with boldness, vigor, and above all a sense of dedication, but we have not wrapped our minds around the fact that to win a peace we must wage peace with boldness, vigor, and above all a sense of dedication. If we are willing to take that fact to heart and wage peace in that manner and on the same four fronts—the military, political, economical, and psychological—the Kremlin is waging its cold war, the Soviets haven't a chance to win either a cold war or a hot war.

And we can be sure that if the Kremlin thinks it hasn't got a chance to win a hot war, it isn't going to start one. If we are mature enough and have stamina and staying power enough to go the entire course, we can confidently expect that—within the next decade or less—we will not only have thrust back the present danger, but also will have laid the groundwork for the first durable peace with freedom that men have ever known.

Press Misleads Public on Views of the Vatican

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, many pro-Trumanites in their desperate effort to justify the President's dismissal of General MacArthur tried to make the public believe that the Vatican endorsed the President's action.

The fact is that one Giorgio Luigi Bernucci, an Italian news columnist, merely expressed his own personal views about the President's action in a column which appeared in Osservatore Romano, a newspaper published in the Vatican City.

Little publicity, however, was given to the statement of the National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service which explained this fact.

I include here the following article which appeared in the Brooklyn Tablet, a Catholic weekly, April 21, 1951:

PRESS MISLEADS PUBLIC ON VIEWS OF THE VATICAN—QUOTES OSSERVATORE WRITER ON GENERAL MACARTHUR AND DRAWS FALSE CONCLUSION—HEADINGS PROVED HOAX—COLUMNIST DOES NOT REPRESENT PAPER'S VIEWS; NOR IS PAPER OFFICIAL

At least one press association, many daily newspapers and many broadcasting stations caused confusion among the public last Sunday. The issue related to President Truman's ousting of General MacArthur.

First page headlines in one daily asserted "Vatican paper backs Truman step in MacArthur case as aid to peace," another stated the Pope had decided against MacArthur, while some radio commentators—Drew Pearson, to mention one—said the Vatican backed the dismissal of the general.

The Associated Press was responsible for most of the misleading dispatch from Rome, which said that "the MacArthur case was removed from the international plane to one essentially domestic by the dismissal, said the Vatican newspaper, which usually reflects the opinion of Pope Pius XII. The newspaper noted that President Truman's decision might even be against his own popularity."

This first comment on the issue in Osservatore Romano was written by Giorgio Luigi Bernucci.

It then quoted Bernucci as stating the President was right and the general wrong. In the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune Bernucci was called an editorial writer, but in the Daily News and other papers he was referred to as a news commentator.

SERVES AS COLUMNIST

The facts in the case are that:

1. Neither the Pope, the Vatican, or Osservatore Romano expressed any opinion on the ousting of General MacArthur.

2. Count Bernucci is merely a columnist on Osservatore and his observations are only his own.

3. Osservatore is not the official organ of the Vatican save when it carries an official Vatican pronouncement which is labeled official.

The National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service on Wednesday issued a brief statement on the misrepresentation. It follows:

"Over last week end there appeared in Osservatore Romano an article making reference to the removal of General MacArthur. The article expressed the opinion that the dismissal of the general could be regarded as a step indicating a desire for world peace.

"General press accounts said that Osservatore Romano itself had made these observations and reference was made to editorial comment by Osservatore Romano.

"Osservatore Romano, while published in Vatican City, is not the official organ of the Vatican, except to the extent that from time to time it runs a column containing official Vatican pronouncements, always under the same heading, so that those familiar with the paper know that unless the material appears under this heading, it is not official.

"Actually the MacArthur comment was contained in an article which appears regularly twice a week in Osservatore Romano and is written by Giorgio Luigi Bernucci.

"This regular article does not contain Vatican official views, but the views of the writer. It is headed Acta Diurna, and undertakes to review various news developments around the world. We are informed that in this instance, definitely the comment on the MacArthur case was the writer's own, and does not necessarily represent the views of Osservatore itself."

The Woolen and Worsted Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following:

BOSTON OFFICE,
TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA,
Boston, Mass., April 18, 1951.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANE: Enclosed is copy of letter sent to Senator MAYBANK by our Research Director Solomon Barkin, which is self-explanatory. I believe that after you have had the opportunity of reading it, including the analyses of the machinery in the United States, you will agree that the granting of exemptions as mentioned is most discriminatory, especially in view of the present conditions prevailing in the woolen and worsted industry and, particularly, as it exists in Massachusetts at the present time.

I know you will be keenly interested in this matter because of the prominent position that woolen and worsted mills have in the Commonwealth.

May I hear from you regarding this matter.

Very truly yours,
J. WILLIAM BELANGER,
Director.

TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA,
New York, N. Y., April 16, 1951.

Hon. BURNET R. MAYBANK,
Joint Committee on Defense Production,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MAYBANK: We are very much interested in the hearings now being held before your committee on the provision for accelerated depreciation privileges to industries. Our attention has been drawn to a grant of a certificate of necessity to manufacturers in the woolen and worsted industry, where we are sure this privilege should never have been extended. The granting of this exemption represents a violation of every principle announced hitherto as a guide for the review of applications for this special tax benefit.

It is reported that the Peerless Woolen Co., of Rossville, Ga., and the woolen plant of the Hardwick Woolen Mills, of Cleveland, Tenn., both owned by the Hutcheson family, have been granted tax benefits for the construction of plants valued at $4,213,000. The benefit is reported as 60 percent of the cost of these installations. These plants are reported as being designed for the production of melton, kersey, and flannel fabrics.

The benefit cannot be justified as necessary under the regulations issued by President Truman. While these woolen fabrics are required for national defense, there is no shortage of facilities for the production of these materials for national defense.

The woolen and worsted industry now has sufficient capacity to take care of all possible military and civilian needs. Most woolen mills in this industry are prepared to manufacture the three types of fabrics. The construction of these new facilities will only increase the degree of overcapacity in the industry and thereby reduce the opportunities for full and continued employment at existing facilities. The unevenness of employment at the present time, even with the available Government contracts, makes the construction of further facilities with Government aid of highly dubious value. It will undermine sound competition.

The degree of available capacity is illustrated by the attached table, representing the operations in the industry for the last 13 months. It indicates that only about 80 percent of the woolen-spinning spindles and 85 percent of the broadlooms for the weaving of the woolen fabrics are now actually operating. The operating woolen-spinning spindles are running 86 percent of a full 40-hour week. The operating woolen and worsted broadlooms are now running 88 percent of a full 40-hour week on the first shift. The second-shift woolen spindles are only running three-quarters as well as the first shift and the third shift only one-third as much as the first shift. In the case of the looms, the second shift is running only 90 percent as well as the first shift and the third shift only 40 percent as well. The large unused capacity and the idle mills in the industry can be utilized for military production without the addition of new production capacity.

This exemption is ill-advised and injurious to the well-being of the woolen and worsted industry. It will cause further loss of opportunities of employment to the workers already in the industry and create a demand for new workers who may be more properly used for more urgent military production. Your committee should analyze this case immediately and seek to develop a policy wherein such ill-considered action by a governmental agency is not permitted to occur.

Sincerely yours,

SOLOMON BARKIN.

Tragic Disunity in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence in the Washington Star of Wednesday, April 25:

TRAGIC DISUNITY IN GOVERNMENT—LACK OF LEADERSHIP IS OBSTACLE TO COOPERATION EVEN BETWEEN ELEMENTS WHICH FAVOR SAME WORLD POLICY

(By David Lawrence)

The state of disorganization and disunity in the American Government today is indescribably tragic.

The lack of leadership is a manifest obstacle to cooperation even between those elements which favor the same international policy. The White House has failed signally to keep foreign policy out of politics and has accentuated a deep cleavage between the two major parties.

For, whether President Truman intended it or not, he has, in effect, decreed that the minority party in America must be prevented from knowing the facts about the Government and particularly the facts about our war operations.

Though it will be repeatedly denied, the truth is that the principal offense of General MacArthur was in answering a letter from Republican leader, JOSEPH W. MARTIN. Apparently members of the armed services hereafter must not answer any letters from Congress except those from Democrats.

Two Democratic Senators—DOUGLAS, of Illinois, and LEHMAN, of New York—take the position that the letter which General MacArthur wrote in answer to one from Representative MARTIN was an act of military insubordination and was in disregard of the civil authority of the United States.

This is a strange view for two men to express who are supposed to be liberals and who spend a good deal of their time denouncing the Hitler and Stalin concept of a single political party. Evidently as Senator DOUGLAS told his constituents, General MacArthur had no right to reply to Mr. MARTIN'S request for his views. Senator LEHMAN cites the letter to MARTIN specifically as a ground for dismissal of MacArthur and says thus the "civil authority was challenged."

Evidently the Congress of the United States is not a civil authority—or at least the Republican Party isn't a part of it. Yet in Korea the sons of Republicans are being killed, just as are the sons of Democrats.

There is no hope for unity when two important Senators adopt the view that it is a violation of the military code of the United States to communicate with Members of Congress who happen to be in the minority party and for the latter to make public the letters they write—not on military details, but on broad policy questions.

The letter to Representative MARTIN was a routine answer to what appeared to be a routine inquiry. General MacArthur had said the same things publicly many times before and also in his official reports. But because the press emphasized the incident, President Truman chose to make an issue of it, though he could just as well have ignored the affair and sent for MacArthur so as to argue out the differences, if possible, in a personal conference.

What is more serious is that there are influential members of the Democratic Party who actually believe that America today is and must be governed by a single person. They include in the power of the Presidency the right to stifle discussion and they insist, in effect, that members of the armed services are not to be permitted to say anything publicly which is at variance with the party line as proclaimed by the President or his advisers.

If the minority party has any assertiveness at all, it will accept the challenge and bring the real issue to the attention of the country. It concerns the fundamental right of the American people to get the truth of what is happening in the making of public policy.

The American people do not even know how MacArthur was dismissed and by whose recommendation. An effort has been made to give the impression that the Joint Chiefs did it. Actually Messrs. Acheson, Rusk, and Harriman—the foreign-policy command—are primarily responsible for influencing the President to fire MacArthur forthwith. When the congressional committees put every member of the Joint Chiefs on the stand, as they inevitably must, they will learn that there is no record of military insubordination and that differences of policy alone led to the political decision by Mr. Truman to make a change in command in the Far East.

It is because the Democrats have insisted on distorting the issue and have continually tried to pin a warmonger label on General MacArthur—very much as the Communists do to most Americans nowadays—that the bitterness on Capitol Hill is increasing instead of diminishing.

The National School Lunch Program in Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following letter and report from the Rt. Rev. Cornelius T. H. Sherlock, diocesan superintendent of schools, archdiocese of Boston, Mass.:

ARCHDIOCESE OF BOSTON,
DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Boston, Mass., April 23, 1951.

Congressman THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: I am enclosing an opinion which has been issued by the attorney general's office here in Massachusetts and which, I believe, is of considerable importance. I shall be grateful if you find it convenient to read it, then perhaps file it for use when the occasion may arise.

With every best wish, I am

Yours most sincerely,
Rt. Rev. CORNELIUS T. H. SHERLOCK,
Diocesan Superintendent of Schools.

MARCH 26, 1951.

Hon. JOHN J. DESMOND, JR.,
Commissioner of Education.

DEAR SIR: You have requested my opinion as to whether the forty-sixth article of amendment of the Constitution of Massachusetts prohibits the board of education of the Commonwealth from entering into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States governing the operations of the national school-lunch program in Massachusetts.

You have asked two specific questions which are phrased as follows:

I. "Does the board of education have the authority to agree to section 5, of the proposed Federal-State agreement for the benefit of children attending nonprofit private schools as well as public schools in the Commonwealth?"

II. "Would it be permissible for the Commonwealth to expend moneys appropriated or authorized to be appropriated by the Commonwealth in providing lunches for children attending nonprofit private schools as well as public schools in accordance with the proposed Federal-State agreement, governing the operation of a school-lunch program in Massachusetts under the provisions of the National School Lunch Act?"

In answer to question number 1, it may be pointed out that section 5 of the proposed agreement follows the provisions of section 7 of the National School Lunch Act relating to the apportionment and payment of funds to the various States.

The authority of the board of education to represent the Commonwealth in carrying out the provisions of the act was delegated by the legislature by statute 1948, chapter 548, page 1, which reads as follows:

"The board of education is hereby designated as the 'State educational agency' to represent the Commonwealth in dealing with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States in carrying out the provisions of the National School Lunch Act as enacted into law on June 4, 1946."

The National School Lunch Act clearly contemplates that the State educational agencies designated in the several States shall in general enter into such agreements not only for the benefit of children attending public schools, but also for the benefit of children attending nonprofit private schools within the States as well.

The question has previously been raised, however, whether the educational agency so designated in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts could in conformity with amendment XLVI of the Constitution of Massachusetts disburse Federal funds apportioned to the Commonwealth under the National School Lunch Act to nonprofit private schools as well as public schools within the Commonwealth.

This question was answered in the affirmative in 1947 Opinion Attorney General, page 17. See also 1943 Opinion Attorney General, page 74.

It would appear that no novel constitutional question is raised in question No. I. My answer to that question is in the affirmative.

In answer to question No. II, I submit the following:

The forty-sixth article of amendment of the Constitution of Massachusetts, section 2, reads as follows:

"All moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the Commonwealth for the support of common schools shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is expended; and no grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning, whether under public control or otherwise, wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated, or any other school, or any college, infirmary, hospital, institution, or educational, charitable or religious undertaking, which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers or public agents authorized by the Commonwealth or Federal authority or both, except that appropriations may be made for the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts and for free public libraries in any city or town, and to carry out legal obligations, if any, already entered into; and no such grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any church, religious denomination or society."

An analogous question arose heretofore in 1936 in Massachusetts under a proposed act entitled "An act providing that pupils in parochial schools shall be entitled to transportation to and from said schools in the same manner as pupils in public schools," and also under a proposed act entitled "An act providing for the transportation of parochial and private school pupils to and from school" in 1936. In an opinion given by the Attorney General at that time it was said:

"The intended benefit sought by the proposed legislation, upon which you seek my opinion, is a benefit intended for children attending parochial and other private schools, as distinguished from a benefit intended for the schools themselves. * * * The end sought by the legislation has no relation whatever to the founding, maintaining or supporting of private schools. * * *

"I am therefore of opinion that there is no constitutional objection to either." (1936 Op. Atty. Gen. 40).

With this opinion I agree.

Similar reasoning decided the almost identical problem when it was presented in Everson v. Board of Education (330 U. S. 1), decided February 10, 1947. That case dealt with a situation where a New Jersey statute authorized its local school districts to make rules and contracts for the transportation of children to and from schools by bus. The town acted pursuant to this statute, reimbursing certain parents for bus transportation of their children to parochial schools. It was contended that this violated both the State and Federal Constitutions. The New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals held that the statute violated neither the State nor Federal Constitution. On further appeal the United States Supreme Court, affirming, said of the practice of furnishing transportation to children attending religious schools, at page 17:

"Moreover, State-paid policemen, detailed to protect children going to and from church schools from the very real hazards of traffic, would serve much the same purpose and accomplish much the same result as State provisions intended to guarantee free transportation of a kind which the State deems to be best for the school children's welfare. And parents might refuse to risk their children to the serious danger of traffic accidents going to and from parochial schools, the approaches to which were not protected by policemen. Similarly, parents might be reluctant to permit their children to attend schools which the State had cut off from general government services as ordinary police and fire protection, connections for sewage disposal, public highways and sidewalks. Of course, cutting off church schools from these services, so separate and so indisputably marked off from the religious function, would make it far more difficult for the schools to operate. But such is obviously not the purpose of the first amendment. That amendment requires the State to be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and nonbelievers; it does not require the State to be their adversary. State power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions than it is to favor them."

And further, the court said at page 18:

"The State contributes no money to the schools. It does not support them. Its legislation, as applied, does no more than provide a general program to help parents get their children, regardless of their religion, safely and expeditiously to and from accredited schools."

A similar matter arose in Louisiana where the issue was whether an act of the State of Louisiana which authorized the State to purchase books for school children, including private school students as well as those attending the public schools, was constitutional. In upholding the act the Louisiana court said:

"The appropriations were made of the specific purpose of purchasing school books for the use of the school children of the State, free of cost to them. It was for their benefit and the resulting benefit to the State that the appropriations were made. True, these children attend some school, public or private, the latter, sectarian or nonsectarian, and that the books are to be furnished them for their use, free of cost, whichever they attend. The schools, however, are not the beneficiaries of these appropriations. They obtain nothing from them, nor are they relieved of a single obligation, because of them. The school children and the State alone are the beneficiaries.

These words of the Louisiana court were set forth verbatim in the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Cochran v. Board of Education (281 U. S. 370), which affirmed the Louisiana opinion that the purchase of school books for private school children out of State funds was not unconstitutional.

The cases above cited constitute a class of cases generally recognized today as matters incidental to the private-school education of children, with reference to which the State may exercise the appropriation power without violation of any constitutional mandate. Appropriations to insure the safety of school children in journeying to and from private as well as public schools are held to fall within the domain of the public safety; appropriations for the furnishing of adequate school books to school children in private schools as well as public schools are recognized as part and parcel of the public program of education. Inescapably it follows that the national school-lunch program, embracing private as well as public-school children, is a vital part of the Nation's public-health program. Private-school children, equally with public-school children, are entitled to share in the benefits of such programs designed to advance the public welfare.

The benefit is a benefit obtained by the children as distinguished from a benefit to the schools. The schools do not receive any aid or support. The fact that the money is paid to the school as reimbursement, after the school submits its vouchers and necessary papers for its expenditures, is of no consequence. The vital point is that the school is only a conduit of funds benefiting the pupil. Mere reimbursement of the school for funds expended in furnishing lunches to its pupils is not aid to the school itself as distinguished from the pupils. The school treasury is not benefited or increased in any way, nor is this in any manner support or maintenance of private educational institutions out of public moneys as prohibited by the Massachusetts Constitution, amendment XLVI.

I therefore answer your second question in the affirmative.

Very truly yours,

FRANCIS E. KELLY,
Attorney General.

The Late Arthur H. Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include as an extension of my remarks two editorials from outstanding Mississippi newspapers eulogizing the late great Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg.

They are A Statesman Gone, from the Greenville Delta Democrat-Times, and Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, United States Patriot and Statesman, from the Jackson Clarion-Ledger:

[From the Delta Democrat-Times, Greenville, Miss.]

A STATESMAN GONE

In the death of United States Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, Michigan, Republican, the Nation is mourning the loss of one of its ablest and most efficient statesmen.

His death came when one of his dreams, the North Atlantic Pact, was becoming a reality, and another of his dreams, world amity lay shattered in the acrimonious debate over the MacArthur-Truman episode.

The 67-year-old GOP leader, who was revered by Democrats, too, died in his sleep from a malignant tumor which he had ignored in his intensive efforts in behalf of the Atlantic Pact.

Had his health not failed, he would have easily been the Republican candidate for the Presidency and belief is general that he would have won the election hands down, for none there was to dispute his ability as an outstanding statesman of modern times.

An Arthur Vandenberg as President of the United States would have advanced the cause of universal cooperation many decades, and raised the tobogganing prestige of this Nation many notches.

All the Nation, therefore, feels his loss keenly.

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger]

SENATOR ARTHUR VANDENBERG, UNITED STATES PATRIOT AND STATESMAN

It is doubly tragic, and a double loss to the Nation, that Senator Arthur Vandenberg's death should have occurred at the height of a crisis and a controversy which show the Nation, both the people and their representatives in Washington, to be more evenly and more bitterly divided on foreign policy than ever before.

Senator Arthur Vandenberg had not been able to participate in Senate sessions for more than a year before he died Wednesday. But his voice could still be heard from his sickbed, and his wise and patriotic counsel was available to his colleagues and to the administration.

Death has silenced that voice. Death has blocked any further extension of that wise counsel. Death removes from the United States Senate one of the Nation's few veritable statesmen, and paves the way, perhaps, for the seating of one more partisan politician.

Senator Vandenberg's stature as a statesman was recognized by the Nation. It was recognized and respected by the leaders of his Republican Party, including those who conscientiously and consistently disagreed with him on many fundamental questions. Only the shallow-minded, the violently partisan, and the irresponsible ever ridiculed Senator Vandenberg's knowledge of foreign affairs, his opinions, or his abilities. And his sincerity was unquestioned.

Senator Vandenberg was almost entirely responsible for the degree to which bipartisan support of the Nation's foreign policy, and bipartisan participation in its shaping, was obtained during the past four critical years. He was, for example, largely responsible for Senate approval of the North Atlantic Pact, which would probably have been rejected but for his efforts and influence.

In this new and exceedingly grave crisis and controversy over global foreign policy in general and policy regarding the Far East in particular, the great Republican statesman's influence and counsel will be sorely missed. The Nation needs it more than ever before.

For it still is true, as he contended last January in urging essential unity in facing the Communist threat: "We cannot stand a deadlock in foreign policy until 1952. Many patriots hold divergent views, but we must strive for the greatest possible meeting of loyal minds as swiftly as possible. This is the way to stop a war, or win it."

We hope that this appeal and warning echoes often in the Senate, sounds clearly above the partisan clamor, above all the political fuss, and fustian, above the contentions of the extremists and the ranting of the demagogues, as the United States Senate debates the issues and reaches the decisions on which our Nation's survival may depend.

Meantime, the Nation honors and mourns a patriot and a statesman, Arthur Vandenberg, Michigan Republican, but an American first of all.

Did Truman-Acheson Pass Buck to MacArthur?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann entitled "Agreement and Disclosure." In his searching analysis of the controversy between Truman and MacArthur he points out some interesting facts and raises important questions. I commend it to the attention of all Members:

AGREEMENT AND DISCLOSURE

If, as the earlier reports indicate, the expected Communist offensive has now begun, it is reassuring to find that General MacArthur's view of the outcome is in agreement with that of the Pentagon. They are agreed in thinking that the offensive can be contained in the central region of Korea. "We could hold in Korea," said General MacArthur only last week in his address to Congress, "by constant maneuver and at an approximate area where our supply line advantages were in balance with the supply line disadvantages of the enemy. * * *"

There is agreement also, we may be sure, with his view that though the offensive can be contained we can "hope at best for only an indecisive campaign with its horrible and constant attrition upon our forces if the enemy utilized his full military potential."

The disagreement begins only after the general and the Pentagon have agreed that, while we can defeat the offensive, we cannot by limited war obtain a military victory. The Pentagon, as General Bradley has made clear, prefers a military stalemate to the risks of seeking victory by removing the limitations on the war. General MacArthur prefers the risks of an unlimited war to an indecisive campaign of attrition.

The disagreement is not, therefore, about the battle which is now being fought. Assuming, of course, that the Soviet Government does not intervene directly or indirectly in far greater force than it has thus far, all are agreed in believing that the present battle will be a defensive success, but that it can be no more than that. The generals could all be mistaken, but, if they are mistaken, all the generals will be mistaken together. There is no dispute among them about the present battle. All of them in a position of command—the Joint Chiefs, General MacArthur, General Ridgway, and General Van Fleet—are publicly on record that our main position in central Korea can be held and the offensive stopped, and that this can be done—unless the enemy is heavily reinforced by the Soviets—without taking controversial measures which would expand the war beyond Korea.

The story by Mr. Anthony Leviero, of the New York Times, about what happened at the Wake Island conference on October 15 is an extraordinary disclosure—all the more extraordinary because of what it reveals about the attitude of the President, who must have approved giving Mr. Leviero access to the highly classified documents. Its extraordinary disclosure, I submit, is that the President thinks he can hold General MacArthur responsible for our being surprised by the Chinese intervention in Korea.

Mr. Leviero's story says, "President Truman, as the 10 conferees sat in the aviation hut, asked General MacArthur about the possibilities of Chinese or Russian intervention. General MacArthur said he saw little chance of this." The serious aspect of this is not that General MacArthur was mistaken in his judgment about the intentions of two foreign powers. The serious thing is that the President relied on the judgment of the general in a matter which belongs squarely within the responsibility of the Department of State.

It was Secretary Acheson who was responsible for advising the President as to the intentions of China. It was Secretary Acheson who had daily contact with all the diplomats and with all the information services of this and the other governments that had any access to Peiping and to Moscow. At Wake Island the President should not have been the one who asked General MacArthur to decide whether China would intervene. He should have been the one who told General MacArthur what his and his Secretary of State's judgment was on this critical point.

General MacArthur's comment on the matter is very interesting indeed. It was in the statement given out for him by his military secretary, General Whitney, on Saturday: "The question was basically a political one, involving decisions made in Peiping and quite beyond the reach of General MacArthur's field intelligence * * * as far as I know neither the State Department nor higher intelligence agencies of the Government had the slightest evidence to warn of such a decision. Certainly no such warnings were given to MacArthur. To the contrary, all appeared to discount the possibility of such intervention at that stage."

If this charge can be sustained in the coming investigation, it will throw much light on the crack-up. For it will show how the President and his Secretary of State encouraged, indeed invited, General MacArthur to assume responsibilities which, though not his responsibilities, but their responsibilities they were failing to meet.

The investigation will also make clear that if at Wake Island in October the question of Chinese intervention was basically a political one and quite beyond the reach of General MacArthur's field intelligence, then today the question of Soviet intervention and whether the general's recommendations to Congress would bring on world war III is also basically a political one and quite beyond the reach of General MacArthur's field intelligence.

Truman Reaping the Whirlwind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, some people are not disposed to be overcharitable toward Mr. Truman's removal of General MacArthur; note the following:

Mrs. Walter H. Jensen, of Sioux City, Iowa, unloaded her feelings on President Truman, and was kind enough to send along a copy of the telegram to me. Here it is:

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Since you believe in firing those who do not see eye to eye with you in the way to settle the Korean situation, please fire my son, Marine Pfc. W. I. Jensen, 667061, FPO, San Francisco, Calif.

"He is one of your so-called Marine policemen. He doesn't see any sense in going to Korea, maybe to die if the source of supply for the Commies is left intact. Out here in these parts we don't kill rattlesnakes by stepping on their tails. Maybe you think my loss and grief will be less if he dies in your 'contained' war than if he dies fighting an all-out war on the Commies.

"Please recall Walter at once as he doesn't believe in your and Dean Acheson's method of fighting Commies. Incidentally, my son was a Marine reservist in his second year of prelaw college when you called him up in October, with no delay for him to finish the semester, no tests to gain deferment. He just went in when he was called.

"If my only child dies, don't try to ease your conscience and send me any medals. Since you are an old artillery officer you know what you can do with them. And get Dean Acheson to help you.

"I send this with full knowledge that you are Commander in Chief, but also a vindictive man. But go ahead and dish it out. My son is a Marine and can take anything a former Army artillery officer can dish out. I just read a magazine article about what a good hater you are. I am a good hater, too. I wouldn't vote for you again for an $8,000 pastel-blue mink coat.

"Yours, until next election.

"P. S.: Margaret sings here Saturday night, April 21. I thought sacrifice like charity begins at home. Why isn't she in Korea singing for the GI's?

"If they don't like her long-haired singing she can carry bedpans. That doesn't require any special training. Neither does it bring in $1,500 per bedpan.

"Don't write me any nasty letters as I get riled up about my only kid, too, as well as all the other poor guys in Korea."

Crop Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include an editorial from the Progressive Farmer of April 1951:

CROP INSURANCE: OUR NEXT GREAT FORWARD STEP

More and more this seems clear to us: Crop insurance is the next great forward step needed to put southern agriculture on a sounder business basis.

Any crop requires financing. The money may come from banks, PCA, FHA, or from one's own funds. Regardless of the source, one expects to get it back and a little bit more. If the funds are borrowed, there's interest to pay and usually extra collateral is required to protect the lender in the event of a crop failure. Why not have insurance against crop failure?

No lender would think of making a loan on a house unless it could be covered by fire insurance. Nobody would finance the purchase of an automobile unless it was covered by insurance. Yet most loans for crop production have been made without insurance protection even though the danger of crop failures is always serious.

Crop insurances gives liquid collateral in case of crop failure. That means it turns the crop loss into cash dollars. It pays off all or part of the crop loan. It makes it unnecessary for the lender to carry the farmer another year. It prevents the unscrupulous lender from selling out the farmer's implements or land to satisfy a debt. Crop insurance lessens risks to both borrower and lender alike. And as risks are lowered, interest rates and loan charges will drop accordingly.

Let's consider the four primary types of lenders on farm crops and how crop insurance works:

1. Landlord: Without insurance the landlord stands to lose both his interest in a crop and his advances. If both he and the tenant have insurance, he gets protection from both hazards.

2. Banks: Many banks require an endorser or cosigner for loans. But if general crop disaster hits a section, the endorser may not be able to pay the note. An insurance policy backed by the Government is better security.

3. PCA and FHA: These agencies take liens on crops, work stock, and implements as security. But in case of crop failure they must either carry the farmer another year or take away from him the very tools he needs to make another crop. These agencies now require crop insurance in disaster areas and urge it in others.

4. Time merchant: He usually makes part of his advances through open accounts on his books. When he has to borrow himself, banks usually allow him only about half credit for these accounts. Crop insurance policies are better collateral.

A good friend of ours is a peach grower. For years he carried hail insurance with one of the insurance companies in that line of business. Ordinarily he shipped about 55 carloads of peaches. But 1 year he decided he'd drop the innsurance and spend that money for fertilizer for a young orchard. That's the year the hail struck. As a result he shipped only 5 carloads of poor peaches instead of 55 carloads of good peaches.

Tobacco is a costly crop to grow. But it's nothing uncommon to get $1,500 to $2,000 per acre and more from it. We've seen valuable fields of tobacco completely riddled by hail or drowned out by continuous rains. Much of it wasn't protected by insurance.

Cotton, too, is a costly crop to produce and getting more so. Chopping, hoeing, and picking costs take heavy toll. Then there's the all-season fight with its hosts of insect pests. The costly fight is continuous from the time the seed are treated to prevent damping-off until the defoliant is applied to make the leaves fall off and let the sun shine in to prevent the big green bolls from rotting and to facilitate picking.

The more costly a crop is to produce, the greater is the need for insurance.

Every subscriber lucky enough to live in a crop-insurance county—and every renter who shares in an insurable crop—should contact his county PMA office this week. Act now and make your family safe from disaster or crop failure in 1951.

Effect of Recall of General MacArthur on the Japanese

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN WELKER
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. WELKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article from the Washington Star, dated April 12, 1951, by the brilliant columnist Constantine Brown. I should say to the Senate, Mr. President, that few, in my opinion, are more profound on foreign affairs than this distiguished columnist. In this colunm Mr. Brown calls to our attention facts which should be known to every American. I should say that when Mr. Brown writes, "not officially confirmed" he means that this fact is being kept secret from the public.

Constantine Brown, probably more than any other columnist, has warned the United States regarding the situation of Japan for a long time. On January the 16th of this year he told us:

The possibility of Russia committing an aggression again Japan is more in the minds of responsible officials today than in the past—the Soviet has an impressive submarine fleet and an adequate air force which has not yet been in action.

I remember that on December 6, last, he wrote in his column that there were 15 Russian divisions on the Siberia-Manchuria border, four of which were airborne. At that time, as of now, the information that four Russian-trained Japanese divisions were in the perimeter of Japan was a frightening fact for the thinking of the American people. I feel that Columnist Brown has done a great service to the American people in keeping us advised of the facts in the far-eastern theater. I believe the Senate and America will enjoy reading this column.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOYALTY OF JAPANESE SHAKEN—SMOULDERING INTRIGUES MAY FLARE OUT INTO OPEN NOW THAT MACARTHUR IS NOT ON PEDESTAL

(By Constantine Brown)

Nobody can challenge President Truman's constitutional authority to "break" General MacArthur. But the wisdom of the move can be seriously questioned. The repercussions of this latest decision of the President may have more far-reaching and world-wide consequences than he and his advisers seem to have anticipated.

There will be much partisan speaking and writing about the domestic political repercussions of General MacArthur's dismissal. They are of little importance as far as the security of the Nation is concerned. Whether Mr. Truman's action will further diminish the chances of his reelection 18 months from now is, in the present grave crisis, of only minor importance.

What is vitally important is the effect the summary dismissal may have on the Japanese people and on all the other nations of the Far East.

We are not yet at peace, technically, with Japan. General MacArthur, with his genius for a "show", has impressed the rank and file of Japanese people who, in their oriental way, placed him on an even higher level than they did their own Emperor before the war.

General MacArthur was infallible to them. He, and not the troops with him, represented America with all its power. The Japanese masses are hardly aware of the existence of President Truman, Congress, General Marshall, and Secretary of State Acheson. General MacArthur was it.

The unprecedented prestige of this one man permitted us to move practically all of our occupation forces from Japan when the Korean war broke out. The 75,000,000 Japanese remained quiet and orderly after our four divisions were sent to Korea, not because they were loyal to America, but on account of the veneration for the supreme commander.

The Communists failed in their few attempts to take advantage of the departure of the occupation forces. That was because the conqueror was still in Tokyo. Then suddenly, overnight, the Japanese people heard that their hero was made of clay, that somebody far away in Washington was able to fire him, just as if he were a mere official in a Japanese prefecture.

A peace treaty with Japan has been negotiated but has not been concluded. To all intent and purposes Japan is still an occupied country and must be kept in submission by the United States. All the passions and intrigues that have been smoldering but never came to the surface during General MacArthur's tenure may break into the open now.

There are reports—not officially confirmed but emanating from official sources—that some four Japanese divisions, organized from prisoners of the old Kwantung army and trained for the last 5 years in Siberia, have recently been placed in southern Sakhalin by the Soviet high command.

It is only a short hop from Sakhalin to Hokkaido. There are indications that these free Japanese may wish to liberate their country, Moscow style. So long as the Japanese people stood loyally by the United States, personified for them by General MacArthur, this threat might have been only military. But now that he has been toppled from his pedestal, the activities of Communist cells on the largest island, Honshu, may become a real threat.

There is no telling how much support the Communists, backed by a military force of their own kin, may now receive to make Japan into a satellite. Until a peace treaty has been formally signed the authority of the Tokyo government with its own people is only a reflection of the prestige of the Supreme Allied Commander.

Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, the new commander, is one of the ablest officers in the American Army. But in Japan he is not the symbol of America which General MacArthur used to be. Mr. Truman's impetuosity and feeling of frustration at the attitude of the former allied commander may destroy the careful and constructive work done by General MacArthur, a work which was near to completion.

Production and Marketing of Cotton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have just had the pleasure of reading a radio address delivered by our colleague the Honorable KENNETH A. ROBERTS, of Alabama, over WSB, Atlanta, Ga., on Saturday, April 21, 1951.

In briefly summarizing the problems which now confront the cotton producers as a result of the unworkable ceiling established on the price of raw cotton, Mr. ROBERTS has pointed up one of the major problems facing our economy today. His address is a forceful example of the fine work he is doing on behalf of the farmers of the South and as such to the benefit of the entire economy of our Nation.

Under unanimous consent, I include Mr. ROBERTS' address as an extension of my remarks:

Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to discuss briefly a matter which is close to all of us here in the South. I do not believe that there is a man, woman, or child in any of our Southern States who is not affected in one way or another by the production and marketing of cotton.

During recent years there has been a gradual change-over from cotton to dairying, beef cattle, and diversified farming. This has left our farmers less dependent on cotton production, but it is still one of our leading money crops. It is contemplated by Government officials that during the coming year there will be a demand for the largest cotton crop in the history of this country.

Despite this unprecedented demand the Office of Price Stabilization, under the direction of Mr. DiSalle, has seen fit to place a price ceiling on raw cotton. This order would mean that the maximum price that farmers would receive for their cotton would be 45.76 cents per pound.

This, of course, at first glance, seems like a fairly reasonable price for cotton. It must be remembered, however, that production costs have risen tremendously during the past few years. The price of fertilizer has advanced by leaps and bounds; there is an increasing scarcity of labor due to stepped-up industrial activity and new openings for jobs with national-defense installations. Recently insect infestation, mainly boll weevils, has drastically lowered cotton production and increased the cost by making it necessary for the farmers to spend large sums for poison and dusting equipment. Inflationary prices and high labor costs have advanced the price of farm machinery and equipment to an unreasonable level.

Thus, we see that what at first glance seemed like a good, substantial price for cotton does not look so enticing to the farmer who must make heavy investments and then gamble on favorable weather and a successful fight with the boll weevil. Let us assume, however, that by good management and good fortune, and despite high production costs, our farmers are able to produce a record-breaking crop. What assurance have they been given that the ceiling price of cotton will not be rolled back and despite their efforts they will end up losing money once again? This seems to be a little item that has been overlooked by the Office of Price Stabilization.

With this in mind action is being initiated to assure the farmers of a minimum price for their cotton in keeping with production costs. The Office of Price Stabilization has been requested to issue a statement to the effect that the prices will not be suddenly rolled back in the event that a heavy crop is harvested.

Further assurance of a reasonable price could be given by adopting a policy of stockpiling whatever amount may be produced over and above the present needs. The Government has embarked on a program of stockpiling strategic materials to cope with the increasing but uncertain demands of an expanding national-defense program. Certainly it cannot be denied that an ample supply of cotton is absolutely essential to our defense effort. A policy of this nature would not only insure the farmer a reasonable profit on his crop, but it would also make certain that our defense effort would not be hampered by a subsequent crop failure.

I feel that this is a sound policy and in keeping with the best interests of the southern farmers who made such a splendid contribution during World War II and who stand ready now to produce whatever is necessary to cope with any emergency.

Abandonment of National Security for Cheap Partisan Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the American people are becoming aware now that President Truman has abandoned all responsibility for our national security and is playing the cheapest type of politics with the lives of our men on the battlefield in Korea.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting as a part of my remarks an article by David Lawrence which appears in the New York Herald Tribune of April 26, 1951:

TODAY IN WASHINGTON

(By David Lawrence)

NEW SECURITY COUNCIL URGED, WITH MILITARY EXPERTS ON IT

Is anybody in the Government really thinking about the over-all problems of security of the United States? There is no law on the statute books and no agency of the Government which can give an answer to this question and yet it concerns vitally the safety of the American people against attack and against defeat in war.

Theoretically, it is the military departments which have the job of protection—they have the instrumentality—but actually today in America the military cannot make policy or assure security.

Theoretically, the civilian authority is responsible—but there is no such institution in Washington today which is concerned exclusively with the task of safeguarding the security of the United States.

Theoretically, the President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief, is looked upon as the man responsible for the Nation's security. But he does not and cannot give his whole time to the job. Indeed, there is no specific mandate of law which allows the military men to make the policies that are so closely related to military security.

This amazing defect in America's governmental structure was on the minds of some of our military men during the last war and they thought that, by establishing a National Security Council, the United States would at last have a board or agency which could make long-range plans for the security of the country. But the present law does not include any military men in the set-up of the Council.

The members are the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the National Security Resources Board.

Yet this all-important agency, with not a single member giving full-time attention to the work, has the tremendous duty of executing the following mandate as expressed in the National Security Act of 1949:

"It shall, subject to the direction of the President, be the duty of the Council—

"1. To assess and appraise the objectives, commitments and risks of the United States in relation to our actual and potential military power, in the interest of national security, for the purpose of making recommendations to the President in connection therewith; and

"2. To consider policies on matters of common interest to the departments and agencies of the Government concerned with the national security and to make recommendations to the President in connection therewith."

The National Security Council hardly ever met before the outbreak in Korea and has met only occasionally since then. Until just recently it didn't have a full-time director or a staff.

American policy, as it relates to our security, has been the subject of considerable debate in Congress these last few days but there is no evidence that an American long-range policy to safeguard national security was ever resolved by the National Security Council.

What is more distressing, moreover, is that the principal military advisers of the Government—the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—have no statutory connection with the very agency that is supposed to be responsible for safeguarding the security of the United States.

Apparently what has happened is that President Truman has abdicated his major responsibility for the security of the United States and has allowed the Department of State, under the vague heading "Foreign policy," to determine what ought really to be determined by the military officers of the Government. The safety of America is assured or endangered today only as the Department of State may decide an issue. The amount of military forces to be raised or the use of those forces, and even the weapons such forces shall use and whether they shall attack or stand still and allow our Armed Forces to be bombed are policies decided by the Department of State.

THE CIVILIAN AUTHORITY

This is the civilian authority which so many prominent Democrats in Congress are espousing today, but which they will not espouse very long when their constituents eventually learn that military men have really nothing to say under our statutes about the policies that mean protection or weakness in our security.

General MacArthur has raised some substantial issues. He is supposed to have been unable, according to Mr. Truman, to give wholehearted support ot the policies of the United States and the United Nations. Yet there is nobody in the White House or in the executive departments or in Congress today who can define those policies and show what they were or when they were approved by any statutory body charged with that responsibility. All that can be shown is that a few meetings of the National Security Council were held by members who gave incidental attention to it in connection with their numerous other duties.

What America needs is a National Security Council with military representation on it and one that will be above any one department of the Government. Three full-time civilian members of outstanding ability should be added. The Secretary of State should, of course, be on it and civilians should dominate it. The State Department, however, should not be the sole maker—as it is today—of important policies directly bearing on the future security and safety of the United States.

MacArthur's Strategy of Strength in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oregonian of April 20, 1951:

MACARTHUR'S STRATEGY OF STRENGTH IN ASIA

We think the American people will agree with the fundamental logic of General MacArthur's position, so far as it concerns the war in Korea. He summed it up in his dramatic address to Congress in these words: "War's very object is victory, not prolonged indecision. In war there is no substitute for victory."

This is not to say that there need be complete acceptance of his five-point strategy to throw the Communists out of Korea. Certainly we need not subscribe wholeheartedly to his global policies, which include the division of our limited strength to counter the division of Communist strength all over the world. The grand strategy of the global campaign must remain in the hands of civilian authorities—the President, Congress, and the free countries in the United Nations.

There has been a diplomatic failure to avert and to end the Korean war. No one—not President Truman, who removed MacArthur from his commands, nor the U. N. diplomats who call him a warmonger while refusing their shares of men and munitions—has proposed an alternative to the military strategy advanced by MacArthur. Hence, his military advice will be carefully considered by the people, if not by the Truman administration. It is based on these facts:

War was forced on us when the Communists invaded South Korea, a United Nations protectorate. The United States already has suffered more than 60,000 casualties, and the nation we sought to liberate lies devastated. Red China refuses to negotiate a peace. Our casualties will go on without end if we continue to fight a limited, defensive campaign on the Korean Peninsula, while the enemy gathers his strength in his mainland sanctuary without hindrance by American air attack.

On behalf of the American and Allied soldiers fighting for a free world in Korea, with only a remote possibility of victory by Chinese withdrawal, General MacArthur proposes:

That the enemy's sanctuary in Manchuria be neutralized by aerial bombing; that our economic blockade against China, now ineffective, be intensified; that a naval blockade be imposed against the China coast; that restrictions on air reconnaissance of China's coastal area and Manchuria be lifted; that the Formosan armies of the Nationalist exile, Chiang Kai-shek, be loosed against the Reds on the mainland with logistical support from the United States.

In the last recommendation the general goes beyond the boundary of military strategy and involves himself in American national policy in the Far East. In doing so he he is inconsistent. In the earlier part of his address MacArthur explained and clarified the causes of oriental unrest; the rejection of a dictatorial government; the striving for a better life which left the Chinese open to the rise of Communist control.

Then, in the name of Korean victory, he proposes American aid to Chiang Kai-shek to restore the old dictatorship in all of China. We cannot accept this as national policy, even if such action were not almost certain—decpite MacArthur's denial—to involve the use of American ground forces in the military morass of continental China.

But General MacArthur, with masterful oratory and persuasive diction certain to make a terrific impact on American minds, basically advanced a policy of strength—a policy the Asiatics and the Kremlin would understand and respect—in contrast to the policy of weakness maintained by the United Nations and the Truman administration both before and after the start of the Korean war, and with the single exception of our intervention against the North Korean Reds. We come back to the question: Who has a better military program?

Without bitterness, but with the assurance of his great knowledge of the Orient and of war in all its phases, General MacArthur brought the challenge to the Presidency, the Congress, and the American people. It is: Stand and die; or attack and win. Continued Chinese aggression in Korea—a spring offensive reported building—would leave no other course. And Congress gave him a standing ovation when he noted that his views have been fully shared by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, "including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff."

His powerful presentation of the Korean problem renews the hopes of the people for an early solution and the honorable achievement of our goal: The liberation of all Korea from Communist invasion and the restoraton of free, elective government to the Korean people.

Deferment of College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT E. JONES, JR.
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a letter I received from Dr. E. B. Norton, president of State Teachers College, Florence, Ala., containing a timely commentary, to which I invite the attention of the Members.

Dr. Norton is one of the outstanding educators of this country, and his vast experience makes his observation of even greater importance at this moment.

The letter follows:

STATE TEACHERS COLLEGE,
Florence, Ala., April 13, 1951.

Hon. ROBERT E. JONES,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BOB: It seems unfortunate that so many editorial comments, so many of the pronouncements of columnists and of radio commentators, and so much of the public debate concerning proposals for deferring college students have centered around a false assumption and, indeed, an irrelevant point in the debate.

It does not seem fair either to the administration or to the Congress or, for that matter, to either the Armed Forces or the selective service, nor does it seem fair to either colleges or college students, to infer that the operation of proposed draft procedures for the deferment of college students would create an intellectual aristocracy by exempting college students from their military service obligations.

It shatters the morale of college students who are earnestly seeking to prepare themselves for life as well as for improved service to their country to know that they may be considered as dodging the draft, or as acting otherwise than in the national interest when they remain in college. It is especially obnoxious to them to be thought of as asking special exemptions, because of intellectual ability or economic fortune while less fortunate brothers and acquaintances will be required to don uniforms merely because they lack either the mental capacity to do college work or the financial ability to maintain themselves in college.

This does not seem to be a quick, positive, complete, all-out mobilization for prompt military victory in a declared war. This seems to be a long drawn-out, indefinite mobilization to meet many very critical situations in world affairs including possible military fronts not yet determined.

To take the necessary steps to insure an adequate, continuous flow of trained manpower for competent leadership in the Armed Forces and in all of the critical aspects of our highly complex national life should not be considered as simply showing favoritism to some particular group of young men who may have been fortunate enough to enter college and capable enough to do satisfactory work. If it is in the national interest, not only to permit but actually to encourage all potential college students to get as much college education as possible before entering the Armed Forces and then to perform their full military duty, then let us put the argument on that basis. If such is not in the national interest, then let's face the issue and induct students as promptly as they may be needed and place them where their services are most needed.

The red-blooded, patriotic young men whom I know as students in college will be willing to stay there to equip themselves more fully for better and greater service to their country if they are convinced that it is in the national interest as well as in their own personal interest to do so. They will be very unhapy over remaining in college if the general public gets the idea that by doing so they will be shirking their duty and pushing over onto someone else less fortunate and less capable the responsibility for meeting a military crisis.

In an enlightened country whose very form of government and way of life depend upon moral, intellectual, and spiritual foundations laid definitely by the processes of education, our people should consider what the disruption of educational institutions over a long-extended period of mobilization might mean, not just to those institutions but to the welfare of the country as a whole.

In the official debating and voting on the question of deferments of college students I hope that you will help to keep the issues clarified, and that, regardless of the decisions concerning the appropriate assignments for college students, there may not be involved any impugning of the motives of colleges or of college students regarding a patriotic desire to serve where most needed.

Yours sincerely,
E. B. NORTON, President.

A Study in Contrasts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit quotations from General MacArthur's address to Congress, and quotations from President Truman, given to a writer for the New Yorker, for publications in that magazine. These quotations are for comparison and contrast:

A soldier's farewell (Gen. Douglas MacArthur): "The issues are fundamental and reach quite beyond the realm of partisan consideration. * * * You cannot appease or otherwise surrender to communism in Asia without simultaneously undermining our effort to halt its advance in Europe. * * * While I was not consulted prior to the President's decision to intervene in support of the Republic of Korea, that decision, from a military standpoint, proved a sound one. * * * The above views have been fully shared in the past by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff. * * * I now close my military career and just fade away—an old soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty."

President Truman speaking: "There was one columnist who wrote some lie about my family when I was in the Senate, and instead of writing him a letter I called him on the phone, and I said: 'You so-and-so, if you say another word about my family, I'll come down to your office and shoot you.' He hasn't printed a whisper about them since. I'm saving up four or five good, hard punches on the nose, and when I'm out of this job, I'm going to run around and deliver them personally."

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "St. Lawrence Project and United States Steel Needs," from the Moline (Ill.) Dispatch of March 10, 1951, and an editorial entitled "A Seaway and Mistaken Economics," from the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen of March 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Moline (Ill.) Dispatch of March 10, 1951]

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT AND UNITED STATES STEEL NEEDS

The Nation's growing need for steel to match its defense effort may force the adoption of the controversial St. Lawrence waterway project. One of the oldest issues in Washington, it has been recommended by every President since Harding without result.

The project is making it possible for ocean ships to travel from the St. Lawrence River through all the Great Lakes and to construct a 2,200,000 horsepower electrical plant at Massena, N. Y. At present the system of rivers, canals, and lakes is too shallow and too narrow in places to allow the deeper draft ships to enter from the ocean.

Secretary of Interior Chapman has given the project a push in stating that the Nation needs a better transportation route to the iron ore fields in Labrador, situated on the St. Lawrence River at the eastern tip of Canada.

The Labrador ore has two attractive characteristics. It has a high content of iron and it lies close to the surface of the ground.

And Labrador's strategic position is appealing. If hostilities break open, the ore fields are within the continental limits of the Northern Hemisphere, and the ore could be transported through the chain without fear of submarines.

Proponents of the project, which include Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson and the Joint Chiefs of Staff—feel that the additional electric power from the dams would stimulate the operation of aluminum and other industries in the Northeast.

And further, it is argued that the alternate water route will alleviate the approaching crisis in rail transportation.

How much would it cost? There is disagreement on that.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Association says: "The project would cost only $556,000,000—$192,000,000 for power and $374,000,000 for navigation. All of this will be liquidated by power revenues and navigation tolls."

The Association of American Railroads says it would cost more than that and that the taxpayers of the United States and Canada would be underwriting the deal.

If the project fits into the emergency picture as Wilson says, then the gentlemen on Capitol Hill had best speed things up. The system won't be effected overnight, and we don't want to be in the midst of construction if and when Uncle Joe pulls the trigger.

[From the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen of March 11, 1951]

A SEAWAY AND MISTAKEN ECONOMICS

A man who knows his way in the history of the world's supplies of minerals, ores, and how best to use them asks this newspaper a question it cannot answer. How, the engineer asks, will the United States maintain, in the longer future, its industrial supremacy if access to the vast Labrador deposits of high-grade ore is made difficult or practically impossible?

The questioner was thinking of the refusal of the American Congress to have any part in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. The problem, and it is one of vast economic importance to the American people, may roughly be summed up as follows:

In the late 1930's, American steel companies invested a good many millions in the iron-ore possibilities recently discovered in Labrador near the Quebec frontier. Now the 300 or more miles of railway is about completed from the mines to the Bay of St. Lawrence. The natural, reasonable method of transportation from that point southward is by the proposed seaway. Canada now seems determined to build this waterway, without United States aid if necessary, but if she does the Canadian Government thinks American importers should pay a toll for use of the canal. Such a charge would radically change the economic prospect apparently visible when the original plans were made.

United States iron ores, of high grade, are rapidly reaching the stage of exhaustion. The glories of Mesabi Range in the Northwest are becoming legends. Short sight could gravely injure the American steel industry and its related industries. Or a huge economic, social, and industrial project in ore and in water transportation could be at the least long delayed in fulfillment. And the prime cause would be the same apprehensions which mistakenly met the building of the Panama Canal with prophecies of doom for the railroads. Now it is power utilities and the railroads that join in helping to thwart the St. Lawrence seaway.

Dismissals From the State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "State Department Ousts 55 as Security Risks," published this morning in the Washington Times-Herald.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE DEPARTMENT OUSTS 55 AS SECURITY RISKS

(By John Fisher)

Fifty-five persons were removed from the State Department as security risks last year, secret testimony to a congressional committee disclosed last night.

Of these, 54 were homosexuals and forced to resign, it was learned. The other was discharged as a security and loyalty risk. This brought the total removed during the 3 years ended December 31 to 144 homosexuals and 14 other risks.

In addition, four other sex perverts have been requested to resign this year.

M'CARTHY SUBSTANTIATED

This information, furnished the House Appropriations Committee in closed session and just released, substantiated charges by Senator MCCARTHY, Republican, of Wisconsin, and other congressional critics last year that the State Department had been infiltrated by persons who may be tempted to betray national security, despite administration denials to the contrary.

The Tydings "whitewash" committee named to investigate MCCARTHY's charge didn't even delve into the presence of homosexuals in the Department despite knowledge Soviet espionage has used such perversion as blackmail to extract secrets.

Members of the appropriations committee demanded data on loyalty and security risks in connection with the State Department's request for $283,566,476 in funds for the next fiscal year, an increase of $12,173,329 over the current year.

FOUR CASES PENDING

"We treat homosexuals as security risks," Carlisle H. Humelsine, Deputy Under Secretary, told the committee.

He said 4 cases are pending, an additional 11 persons are under investigation, and 2 individuals are under suspension on other grounds awaiting a final decision on dismissal.

Humelsine vigorously denied charges in a recent gossip book on Washington that State Department funds have been used to provide visiting dignitaries with immoral escorts.

Other testimony disclosed:

1. Intelligence had warned all concerned government agencies for a long time of the possibility of invasion by North Koreans, such as occurred last June 25.

MAC ARTHUR STAND SUPPORTED

2. Assistant Secretary Dean Rusk said "we are determined not to allow Communist aggression to succeed in Korea" and "our objective is to prevent Formosa from falling into the hands of a regime that is hostile to the United States." Strangely enough, these are objectives stated by General MacArthur and for which he was fired. Rusk praised MacArthur for his Japanese policy.

3. Rusk also admitted the fighting in Korea constitutes war, not the police action claimed by President Truman.

4. There are approximately 250,000 American ground, air, and Navy troops involved in Korea, including seven divisions of ground troops.

PROPAGANDA MAGAZINE FAILS

5. The Department spent $630,717 to send 50,000 copies of the propaganda magazine Amerika to Russia for distribution by the Soviet news agency under Government agreements, but the Russians returned 30,000 copies unsold. The Department even had difficulty giving them away free in other countries.

6. The Department requested $1,000,000 for entertainment allowances abroad, an increase of $325,000 over this year.

Conditions in Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I have been very much impressed by an article which appeared in the April 19 issue of the Democrat, of Flemington, N. J., embodying a letter to the editor from Theodore A. Marks. Mr. Marks forcefully reminds us in his thought-provoking observations that in the present crisis we can ill afford to neglect our responsibilities to agriculture.

In the hope that the letter will be read by every Member of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEES CALAMITY AHEAD FOR AGRICULTURE AND THE NATION

NEW MARKET, N. J., April 12, 1951.

To the EDITOR OF THE DEMOCRAT:

The following words are right out of the mouth of Charles F. Brannan, Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture:

"No other major segment of our economy went through such a severe economic setback. Net income realized by farm operators dropped from almost eighteen billion in 1947 to about sixteen and five-tenths billion in 1948; about fourteen billion in 1949 and about thirteen billion in 1950."

You will see from these figures that agriculture lost a net income (I say net) of over ten and one-half billions in 3 years. Who lost this ten and one-half billions in 3 years—the 4,500,000 farmers, small and large, in the United States, and you must not forget that during those 3 years every other branch of the economy of the United States increased every year.

Add to the above losses another two billions which might possibly cover the losses sustained by farmers in the November 25, 1950, windstorm, the loss of 10,000 beef cattle in Florida during the freeze of February 1951, together with tornadoes, hurricanes, floods, and frosts, and you will wonder how any farmer can continue in business.

Mr. Brannan also said:

"Prices of many farm commodities have very little relationship to consumer prices. Several examples give this picture clearly:

"The cotton in a shirt now selling for $3.50 to $4 probably did not bring the farmer more than 30 cents.

"A 16-cent can of tomatoes represents about 3 cents of gross income to the farmer.

"The corn in a can retailing at 19 cents brought less than 2¾ cents to the producer.

"Onions which were selling in stores in November for 5.7 cents a pound had been sold by the farmers for a little over 1 cent.

"When milk leaves the farm, it immediately goes into a distribution and processing system that almost doubles its price in a few hours.

"The wheat in a loaf of bread that sells for 15 to 16 cents brings the farmer only about 2⅔ cents. It is interesting to note that the retail price of bread has gone up 1.7 cents a loaf since June. If this were due entirely to a rise in the price of wheat, it would mean that wheat had gone up $1.12 a bushel. Actually, the farm price of wheat in January was only 16 cents a bushel higher than it was before the Korean outbreak."

In any other line of business when one man loses another gains, so all these losses must have been passed on to others. Did the nonfarm consumer receive any of it? The answer is very little. The middleman and big business received nearly all of it. If it were possible for all the farmers of the United States today to give away everything they produced the ultimate consumer would be benefited very little, and in time the result would be the same as mentioned above. But just as you never miss the sunshine until the shadows fall, so the time will come when—and come it will and very soon at that—when you, the consumers, will either have to pay a whole lot more for the food you buy, and some things you will not even be able to buy.

Farmers and their families are quitting the farms every year at the rate of a half million. The farm population today is 28,000,000 but the growth of the country is over 2,500,000 yearly. In 5 years the population will have increased 15,000,000—equivalent to the population of Canada. With fewer farmers and more mouths to feed you will see what is facing us.

For example take milk. The amount of milk now being produced has been dropping every month for the last year. Farmers are selling out and those who remain are decreasing their herds because they can get better prices, proportionately, for their cows than to feed them and produce milk. If we should have a drought and you can get milk next fall for 30 cents you will be lucky.

The carry-over of the stock of wheat in the United States at the present time will be the shortest we have had in years, and the new crop will be—from present estimates and my personal observation—less than it has been in a generation. In addition, farmers are showing a don't-care attitude because while prosperity exists all around they have never received any part of it.

It is true that farmers are getting today more than they did at the start of the Korean war in June 1950, but from November 1948 until May 1950, the price of all farm commodities had dropped, some as much as 33⅓ percent. Farm prices at that time in a good many instances were back to the level of 1939, whereas all other branches of industry had been increasing during that time, so when prices started to increase in June it found the farmers receiving very little for their products while industry being unionized never gave up anything, but in reality got more. Even at the present time farmers are not receiving as much as they did in November 1948 while industry has had six wage increases.

Notice the next time and you will see comparisons start from the Korean war in June 1950. Somebody is covering up something.

Now you may be tempted to ask how can any business like present-day farming continue to exist? Behind the answer to this question lies the greatest worry confronting the Nation today—in one word, "starvation."

At the present time, when farmers see they cannot make ends meet, they simply quit and go into industry. This they are doing by the thousands weekly. Our present head of the United States Department of Agriculture knows as much about farming as a mocking bird knows about law. He believes the cheaper he prices the farmers' products the better it will be for the nonfarm consumer, not figuring that what might be fun to him is death to others, and so the available supply of food decreases daily.

We have on hand at the present time only enough food to last us until the end of this year, and if we were ever to go to war with Russia, their saboteurs would see to it that nothing is harvested. So in our present emergency and with the same conditions hanging over our heads, possibly for all time, we should have national underground pantries bulging with storable food to last for at least 3 years instead of at the present time until December, and no chance of replenishment if a real emergency should overtake us.

Mr. Brannan has made a bankrupt of agriculture and would not be tolerated in the smallest business anywhere in the United States longer than the first year, according to the results accomplished by him. Why should 152,000,000 people see starvation staring them in the face and still continue with the source and cause of forthcoming disaster?

THEO. A. MARKS.

The Truman-MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, SR.
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me on the Truman-MacArthur controversy, broadcast from Station WWL in New Orleans, La., on Tuesday, April 24, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, since my last report to you over this station, General MacArthur has presented his views to a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives. It was a drama-packed session, the equal of which I cannot recall during my many years of public service. Senators and Congressmen, as well as scores of high-ranking Government officials and visitors in the galleries, listened intently to each word that fell from the lips of the general. Except for the frequent outbursts of applause, everyone remained quiet, almost breathless, and one could hear a pin drop during the entire proceeding. And as the veteran commander of our Asiatic forces brought his speech to a close, the audience was visibly moved—many a tear was shed as MacArthur announced that after 52 years of military service, he was now, like the old soldier in the Army ballad, ready to close his military career and just fade away.

Unquestionably, the general was at his best and delivered a most impressive speech. Many of you, I am sure, heard it over your radios, and have seen rebroadcasts over television. The immediate reaction in Washington to the Asiatic policy advocated by MacArthur was, as might be expected, fairly evenly divided. Many Republicans endorsed his proposal to carry the war to the Chinese mainland, while most Democrats advocated caution and a further exploration of the world political implications involved by such action.

For my own part, I have tried to view this problem objectively, without emotion, or bias or prejudice, but with a high sense of duty. From the very beginning, I have expressed the view that President Truman was clearly within his constitutional rights in removing MacArthur from the far eastern command. And further, that the General's insistent encroachment into the field of foreign policy, in advocacy of a program which was contrary to that laid down by his Commander in Chief, constituted an act of insubordination which should not be glossed over. It is my view that MacArthur deliberately precipitated his own dismissal in an attempt to bring to a showdown the deepseated divergence between his views on the far eastern policy and those held by the administration. In this he has been successful. His dramatic appearance before the Congress has touched off a spirited, and at times, heated debate that will reverberate through the halls of the Senate and House of Representatives for months to come. Forgotten are the "troops to Europe" issue, the "fortress America doctrine," as advocated by President Hoover, and other controversial issues. All interest is centered now on the one burning question: Should we carry the Korean war to the Manchurian and Chinese mainland in the hope of achieving a quick victory, or should we continue our present policy of endeavoring to limit the conflict to the Korean peninsula, and make every effort to attain a peaceful settlement without appeasement?

This question has weighed upon my mind for days and weeks, in fact for months. It has been uppermost in my thoughts ever since the Chinese stealthily marched into Korea and, by the commitment of a relatively small portion of their countless hordes of manpower, snatched from our forces a victory that was almost within grasp. My resentment at the actions of the Chinese Communists was just as strong and burning as that of every other loyal American. Our country has never before been placed in a position where it could not immediately strike back at any aggressor who attacked our soldiers. We have never been prone to present the other cheek when slapped in the face. It is but a typically American reaction that we should want to immediately press the battle home to our new foe. I confess that I have felt and still do entertain that desire. I am sure that most of you feel the same way. The wonder to me has been that the American public has been able to exercise restraint for so long a time.

Why, then, has not President Truman, who is as loyal and patriotic an American as any of us, taken action long ago to strike back at Manchurian and Chinese bases? Why have not our Joint Chiefs of Staff—all loyal, patriotic Americans, and every inch of them a soldier—precipitated long before now a showdown with the Chinese Communists? I do not profess to know what is in the minds of these able military men, but I am satisfied that all of them are guided solely by the one purpose as enunciated by President Truman in his radio address of last week: "To avert the tragedy of an all-out war with China, which in turn, would inevitably lead us into world war III."

This, then, is the basic point at which MacArthur and the President have parted ways. It is the point at which I, too, must part with MacArthur, irrespective of my admiration for him as a soldier and as an administrator. Whether or not our present policy in Korea will prevent another devastating world conflict remains for the future to decide, but I have made my decision to support the President and our Joint Chiefs of Staff at this crossroads in our history only after weighing dispassionately the present position of our Nation in the world political picture.

Militarily, and if we consider only the Asiatic theater, MacArthur may be right. Certainly many of his recommendations with respect to the Asiatic war coincide with my own. I have long contended that we should at all cost hold on to Formosa and not permit it to fall into enemy hands. It forms an integral part of our Pacific defense system, and as MacArthur points out, it completes the circle of military bases which make of the Pacific our outer line of defense. I believe that we should arm the Nationalist forces on Formosa, but unless and until the occasion presents itself and we are prepared to wage all-out war with China, we cannot undertake to transport them to the Chinese mainland.

With respect to the proposed Chinese blockade, I have advocated for many months that our Government make more insistent demands upon our allies to cut off completely the flow of goods to the Chinese Communists. I can see no sense in some members of the United Nations fighting the Chinese in Korea, while trading with them through the back door. Along with this, we should take steps to make more effective our blockade of the Chinese coast, thereby reducing the war potentiality of the Chinese Reds' armies.

As for the fourth point mentioned by MacArthur—that we should remove restrictions on air reconnaissance of China's coastal areas and of Manchuria—I believe that in view of the presence of Chinese troops in Korea, this might be done without provoking an all-out war with the Chinese Communist government.

These, then, are the four steps which MacArthur states he urged upon Washington and which, according to him, were agreed to by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. You will note that, with the exception of using Chinese Nationalist troops in an assault upon the Chinese mainland, the recommendations are confined to reconnaissance and blockade operations. I have long felt that we could undertake these steps without committing ourselves to open warfare with the Chinese on Chinese soil.

Although many commentators have stated that MacArthur in his speech charged that his advocacy of bombing Manchurian and Chinese bases had the prior approval of our Joint Chiefs of Staff, I find no basis for the statement. The general stated only that the four steps which I have just outlined, and which do not include the bombing of Manchurian and Chinese bases, "have been fully shared in the past by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff."

In a radio forum discussion of the Far East controversy in which I participated this week, one Member of Congress argued that by following MacArthur's recommendations we can put an end to the constant attrition of our manpower on the Korean battlefields. If I thought that carrying the air war to Manchurian and Chinese bases, plus the use of Chiang Kai-shek's Formosan troops, would accomplish that purpose, I would not hesitate to support such an undertaking. We would all welcome a relatively easy way out of our present dilemma. But what of the consequences if and when we take these bold steps? I believe that the American people should be fully apprised of the implications involved, and for that reason I shall welcome a full debate in Congress on the subject. I am confident that when all of the facts are before the public, and upon sober reflection of what such precipitate action might lead to, much of the mass hysteria that is evident today will disappear.

Let us examine more closely the possibilities—perhaps I should say probabilities—that will confront us should we assist the Chinese Nationalist forces in invading the Chinese mainland from Formosa. Chiang Kai-shek reputedly has some 600,000 men on that island. Assuming that we can equip them properly without depriving our own forces of much-needed arms and ammunition, and that we succeed in landing them on the Chinese mainland, or on Hainan Island, whichever is the objective, is there any guaranty that they can hold on after they have landed? What if the Chinese Red armies threaten to push them into the sea? Will we stand idly by and let them be annihilated, and thereby incur the eternal scorn and damnation of the Orient, or will we go to their rescue? All of you know the answer. We would throw every man, every ship, every plane that we could muster into a heroic effort to save our allies, and a bloody, never-ending struggle between our boys and the Chinese hordes will have been joined.

I well remember the historic statement of Winston Churchill on February 9, 1941. That was in the early part of World War II, when the United States was still neutral, but England had her back to the wall as a result of France's capitulation. On that occasion Churchill said to the United States: "Give us the tools and we will finish the job." Yes, we furnished the tools, but we also had to finish the job. Later, after Pearl Harbor, Churchill made another statement that will go down in history: "We have lost Singapore, but we have won the United States over to our side." We ended by not only sending tons of supplies, but more troops than all of our allies combined.

There is considerable similarity in our positions then and now. In effect, Chiang Kai-shek is saying to us, with MacArthur in accord, "Give my men the arms and land them on the Chinese coast, and we will do the rest." I cannot forget that this same leader, and these same men, supported by hundreds of thousands of other Chinese soldiers, were once before on the Chinese mainland. Although they started out with control of most of China, they eventually were cut to pieces by Red armies.

As I have stated, there can be no advance guaranty that a landing by Chiang Kai-shek's men on the Chinese coast will be successful, and in fact, its feasibility seems highly questionable. It is my firm belief that we would be courting disaster if we encouraged and participated in such a risky venture. In the long run, we would be drawn into the conflict on an all-out scale, and our casualty list would dwarf the present losses in Korea. We must remember that Stalin would like nothing better than to see us become embroiled in an interminable, costly war of attrition on the Chinese mainland, for then his plans for undermining the democratic nations of Western Europe and Asia could proceed with little fear of interference from us.

In weighing the relative advantages and disadvantages of enlarging the Korean conflict, we must take into consideration also our position in the United Nations Organization. Whether we like to admit it or not, our Nation is no longer a free agent in reaching major international political decisions. If we expect the cooperation and backing of the other free nations of the world, we must consult with them before reaching decisions, and our actions must be supported by a majority of the members, otherwise we will bring about the collapse of the entire structure for world peace that we have so patiently built up since World War II. And with the death of the United Nations will go our chances of preventing the spread of communism over the Eurasian, African, and Australian continents. We may as well face reality; we cannot do the job alone. While many point out that the major part of the burden in Korea is being borne by us, and for that reason we should have a free hand in dealing with the Chinese, still we cannot evade the fact that events in Asia profoundly affect all of Europe. Inescapably, our Western European allies will be drawn into the conflict should Russia come to China's aid, and they will bear the brunt of any fighting on the western front. MacArthur admitted in his speech to the Congress that events in Asia cannot be divorced from Europe, yet at no point did MacArthur mention the United Nations, or the possible repercussions that might develop among our European allies should his views about the Korean war prevail.

It is significant, too, that MacArthur hedged considerably in his statement regarding the possibility of Russia's entering the war should we follow his advice. He said, and I quote his exact words: "The Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves." He may think that the Russians will remain neutral, but he goes no further than that. No doubt he still remembers Red China's intervention in the Korean war. Had MacArthur anticipated that the Chinese Communists would intervene at that time, he certainly would not have permitted his troops to be caught like rats in a trap among the icy mountains of northern Korea, with tenuous supply lines and inadequate reserves. In simple words, MacArthur guessed wrong about the Chinese last fall, and there is a strong possibility that he is guessing wrong now about Russia.

I refuse to believe that any considerations other than the welfare and future safety of our country have influenced the President and his military advisers in resolving the current controversy. They alone have in their possession all of the facts regarding our own military strength, the strength of our allies, and—to the extent that our counterintelligence has been able to provide—the strength of our enemies and potential enemies. The course that they are following in Asia is not appeasement. It is no more than an honest, sincere effort to avert a death-struggle between ourselves and Soviet Russia. If we cannot avert this costly, devastating conflict, at least we must try to choose the time and place for it.

I have faith in Marshall, Eisenhower, Bradley, Collins, Vandenberg, and Sherman. They are all mature, able, experienced military strategists and they alone are in a position to plan our Nation's military strategy. I shall follow closely the hearings now being conducted by the Senate Committees on Armed Services and Foreign Relations, which are meeting jointly to hear testimony from our Defense Secretary and the Chiefs of Staff. A great deal of their testimony will of necessity be confidential. There will be much information of highly secret nature that they cannot even impart to the committee members. I am confident, however, that the two committees will bring to light the views of our military leaders on the MacArthur proposals. I shall present to you in subsequent broadcasts as much of this information as I am permitted to divulge, and in the meantime I urge all of you to be calm. Do not permit your emotions to stifle your better judgment on this vitally important question, but let us all be patient and await the development of the true facts before we reach definite conclusions.

Remember, I need your advice and counsel. Your constructive criticism is appreciated.

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by me to the people of Pennsylvania on April 23, 1951, entitled "Happenings in Washington, Program No. 39."

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON

(Program No. 39)

(Text of broadcast by United States Senator MARTIN, of Pennsylvania)

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital and bringing you another discussion of Happenings in Washington.

Since I talked with you 2 weeks ago momentous events have taken place.

The American people have been shocked into realizing the grave dangers we face from a confused and uncertain foreign policy.

While the whole world awaits the final outcome of the sudden and shocking dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur I am confident that the United States will benefit from the investigation and open discussion of our policy in the Far East.

It is good to bring out into the open the many vital questions that have been worrying every one of us because we were denied full knowledge of the facts.

During all the developments which led us into armed conflict in Korea the people have been kept in the dark.

The Members of Congress have been kept in the dark, despite the pretense of the Truman administration that we were acting in accordance with a bipartisan policy.

Now, to some extent, the situation is being revealed.

General MacArthur's appearance before the joint meeting of Congress brought to a climax the most eventful week in many years.

In all my long experience in public affairs I have never witnessed a more spectacular uprising of resentment and indignation than that which followed the dismissal of General MacArthur.

Let me review briefly what transpired here in Washington when the news of President Truman's action was made public at 1 a. m. last Wednesday a week ago.

Most of the Members of Congress were unaware of what had happened until morning. But it didn't take long to find out that only one thing was being talked about.

There seemed to be a feeling that a great tragedy had occurred. As I traveled to the Senate Office Building I noticed small groups standing about, reading newspapers, obviously intent upon the one big news item of the day.

In the corridors of the Senate Office Building similar groups were discussing what had occurred. Many expressed their opinions in strong language. No one seemed able to get down to work. The atmosphere was thick with gloom.

When I stepped into my office all four telephone lines were busy. Calls were coming in, not only from all parts of Pennsylvania but also from distant points throughout the country. I had calls from military associates and civilians from San Francisco, Los Angeles, Long Beach, Calif., San Antonio, Tex., and several points in Florida.

Telegrams began pouring into my office. Practically all of them called for the impeachment of the President, the dismissal of Secretary Acheson, and the reinstatement of General MacArthur. Many demanded that General MacArthur be summoned home to report to Congress.

All day long the telegrams kept pouring in. They continued the next day and the next. As the flood of telegrams subsided letters were delivered to my office by the thousands. In all I received more than 1,500 telegrams and approximately 15,000 letters and post cards.

Out of all these 16,500 communications less than 100 approved the President's action in stripping General MacArthur of all his commands in the Far East.

At this point let me express my appreciation to those who have wired or written to me.

It is my custom to acknowledge promptly all communications from constituents. It will be difficult, however, with my limited staff, to make individual replies to the heavy volume of telegrams and letters I have received relative to the MacArthur dismissal. If you do not hear from me I am sure you will understand the reason.

The galleries of the Senate Chamber were jammed when the session was called to order. The corridors were filled with people. There was an air of suppressed excitement which broke into cheers and applause from the galleries when Senator JENNER, of Indiana, in a speech, denounced the President for his action and called for his impeachment. Vice President BARKLEY, who was presiding, rapped sharply for order and warned the galleries that applause is in violation of the rules of the Senate.

That evening President Truman went on the air in defense of his action.

On Friday the Senate Armed Services Committee, in executive session, voted to conduct an inquiry into the military situation in the Far East and the facts surrounding the dismissal of General MacArthur. The committee is made up of seven Democrats and six Republicans. The vote for the investigation was unanimous.

The next scene took place at the Jefferson-Jackson dinner where 5,300 of his faithful followers paid $100 each to hear President Truman charge that everyone who agrees with him is a patriot and those who disagree are playing politics. It was a highly profitable dinner. It brought over $400,000 into the campaign fund of the Democratic Party.

This was followed by the unanimous action of the House and Senate, inviting General MacArthur to address a joint meeting of the Congress.

The enthusiastic reception which greeted General MacArthur on his return to his native land after an absence of 14 years was a real tribute to his greatness as a soldier, statesman, and diplomat. The tremendous ovation he received here in Washington, from Republicans and Democrats alike, gave assurance that patriotic appreciation of our Nation's heroes still lives in the hearts of our people.

Those who have defended President Truman's dismissal of General MacArthur contended that he was exercising his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

In my opinion there can be no question that the President has a legal right under the Constitution to do what he did. But when we talk about the constitutional authority let me point out that President Truman in his radio address abandoned the use of "police action" and frankly called the fighting in Korea a war.

Thus he officially acknowledged that a state of war exists between the United States and Communist China. Sixty thousand American casualties confirm that fact.

Mr. Truman knows that the Constitution specifically provides that Congress shall have the sole power to declare war. Yet he has not come before Congress to ask for such a declaration and the authority to prosecute the war.

In the same address the President said that we are ready at any time to negotiate for the restoration of peace in the Far East. He declared we will not engage in appeasement.

But while he was saying that Great Britain, through her foreign minister, was suggesting a negotiated peace by admitting Communist China into the family of the United Nations, turning over Formosa to the Communists, and recognizing the Chinese Communist Government as a partner in drafting the peace treaty with Japan.

Mr. Truman laid great stress on his aims for peace, declaring that the objective of his policy in the Far East was to repel attack and to restore peace.

But instead of helping in the cause of peace the military plans he outlined actually removed the greatest factors that might restrain further aggression.

In effect, he made it clear that the Communists in Manchuria and China need have no fear of attack on their home soil—that there would be no bombing raids to destroy their property, their supply lines, or bases. Mr. Truman gave assurance that there would be no invasion of China by the Nationalist forces now on Formosa.

With these assurances why should the Communists want to negotiate a peace? What kind of military strategy is it that tells an enemy that he can retreat safely behind a boundary line to reform, regroup, and resupply, while our boys wait for their return?

What kind of military strategy dictates that air power can be used only to defend troops but not to destroy the bases from which the enemy launches his attack?

Mr. Truman had high praise for what he called collective action among nations in Korea as a workable means of resisting aggression.

But the fact is that while we have 250,000 ground troops in Korea no other member of the United Nations has more than 5 percent of that number. Most of them have contributed no soldiers at all; some have given token help only.

Mr. Truman reported that there are signs that the Communists are building up their ground forces and air strength for a new mass offensive. He expressed the hope that this new attack would be turned back but he gave no indication that our troops are being reinforced to meet this attack.

I shall not discuss the President's speech at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner because that was purely political.

The question that is in the minds of many Americans is the extent to which the removal of General MacArthur was influenced by other nations.

They are wondering how much of Mr. Truman's foreign policy is dictated by secret commitments and demands from abroad.

It raises the question of whether the appeasement of those foreign countries was worth more than unity at home.

Five years and seven months ago General MacArthur took his place at the head of the Japanese Government as Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers.

He had absolute power over a conquered people, a proud people, who worshipped their Emperor as a god.

General MacArthur faced a difficult task but through his outstanding ability he succeeded in gaining the respect and confidence of the Japanese people and was winning them to a free way of life.

Previous experience in the Philippines prepared General MacArthur for his distinguished service in Japan. He not only developed the Filipino military force but he taught the people the ideals of the United States.

General MacArthur's fame will go down in history, not only as one of our most brilliant military leaders, but as a great statesman and diplomat.

Regardless of whatever justification the President may have thought he had, the dismissal of General MacArthur was a brutal, irresponsible, and uncalled for procedure against one of the greatest Americans who has given a lifetime of distinguished, heroic, and patriotic service to his country.

If we are to have peace in the world it will be established on strength, not on weakness.

It will not be achieved through appeasement. It cannot be bought through doubledealing or secret betrayal of innocent people in the hands of Soviet tyranny.

So long as communism conspires behind the iron curtain to enslave the world there can be no compromise with Moscow.

So long as the Red dictators look upon the United States as their ultimate target for destruction we must fight aggression with every weapon at our command.

To restore peace we must fight to win. Half-way measures will not preserve the American way of life.

If our objective in Korea is anything less than victory over the enemy we should bring our boys home before more precious lives are lost.

General MacArthur has been working for peace. Now a great wave of political propaganda has been started to picture him as a warmonger. But I know the American people will not be deceived. They realize from tragic experience that appeasement of aggressors is encouragement to war.

General MacArthur was building a road to peace. We must be resolute in our determination to complete that road.

This is Ed Martin, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Senator Blair Moody

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, a freshman Senator has come to the Senate with the particular good wishes of the people of Rhode Island and of Brown University, where he studied and made a distinguished mark both in athletics and in scholarship for 4 years. I had the opportunity of making his friendship then because we were members of the same college fraternity. Since then we have always been friends. It is with particular gratification that I find that the Providence Journal on April 25, 1951, published an admirable editorial relating to Mr. MOODY's selection to be Senator from Michigan. I ask that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR BLAIR MOODY

BLAIR MOODY was always a man to surprise his associates. A natural athlete, hefty, speedy, and a dangerous adversary, he won letters at Brown in three major sports. Since an athlete is not always noted for his skill with books and in the classroom, he caused a lifting of eyebrows when he was named a Phi Beta Kappa scholar for attainment in studies. It was presumed he would make a career in teaching, with coaching as a sideline, and his sojourn at Moses Brown seemed to bear this out. But again he surprised by showing up as a reporter—and a good one—for the Detroit News. He had not majored in English at Brown, which was then the gateway to newspaper work, and the English majors of his time at college were surprised at his choice of occupation. But the greatest surprise, even to his intimates in Washington newspaper work, was his appointment by the Governor of Michigan to succeed the late Arthur Vandenberg as United States Senator. If his past surprises are a criterion, he should make the Senate—and newspaper fellows—sit up and take notice in the eminent position he now enjoys. His many friends around this community wish him well—and more surprises.

The MacArthur Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "MacArthur Practices an Adroit Deception," by Mr. Robert L. Riggs, of the Courier-Journal Washington bureau, which appeared in the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of Sunday, April 22, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR PRACTICES AN ADROIT DECEPTION—WITHOUT REALLY SAYING IT, HE PLANTS THE IDEA THAT TRUMAN FORCED THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF TO GO AGAINST THEIR BETTER JUDGMENT IN KOREA

(By Robert L. Riggs)

WASHINGTON, April 21.—You get a measure of the political adroitness of Gen. Douglas MacArthur in the success he has had in making it appear that President Truman has overruled the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

As a result of his speech to Congress, MacArthur has many people convinced that the Joint Chiefs and he are in complete agreement that the way to fight the Korean conflict is to help Chiang Kai-shek invade China and to bomb beyond the Yalu River in Manchuria.

He has created the belief that he and the four members of the Joint Chiefs all disagree with Truman; that the Joint Chiefs haved bowed their necks to the President in order to save their jobs, while only he is courageous enough to accept ouster from command in order to save his country.

A PICTURE CREATED

He has created a picture of Truman, under the domination of Secretary of State Dean Acheson, cracking the whip and forcing obedience from Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff; Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff of the Air Force; and Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations.

It is a tribute to MacArthur's finesse that he has painted this picture of cringing military leaders without ever saying that they have been lashed into submission.

He has led the country to believe that the four staff chiefs are on his side and against Harry Truman—without ever saying that that is the situation. He has made it appear that, if they had his courage, they would be just as insubordinate as he has been.

Yet he has said no such thing. What he did say was that the Joint Chiefs share his thoughts on the best way—from a military point of view—to bring about victory in Korea.

FACT OVERLOOKED

What he failed to mention is that they reject completely his belief that to carry out his military propsals would not involve us in full-scale war with China, and probably with Russia.

In one degree or another, it is likely that most military people—as well as nonmilitary people—share some of MacArthur's views on the way to achieve victory in Korea.

Of course, it would help our fighting men in Korea if 600,000 of Chiang's men poured onto the Chinese mainland from Formosa and set up a second front. That is, it would help our soldiers in Korea if Chiang's people showed any greater disposition to fight the Communists than they showed when they were on the mainland before.

Of course, it would help our troops in Korea if our Air Force could drop bombs on Chinese troop concentrations across the Yalu River. That is, it would help our men unless it caused the Chinese and Russian Air Force, which has let our ground troops pretty much alone, to retaliate.

These questions of military movement undoubtedly find little disagreement between MacArthur and the Joint Chiefs. It would be reasonable to assume that both Truman and Acheson would agree that those proposed moves would—if certain other things didn't happen—bring quick victory.

THE CONTROVERSY'S NUB

But there is no reason whatever to believe that any of the Joint Chiefs agree with MacArthur that Chiang's invasion of the mainland and our dropping of bombs beyond the Yalu would fail to bring Russia into the war.

There you have the nub of the entire controversy between Acheson, Truman, and the Joint Chiefs on one side, and MacArthur, Herbert Hoover, Robert A. Taft, and Kenneth S. Wherry on the other side.

The conflict is over the political decision, as distinct from a military decision. Yet there are times when military factors are important parts of political decisions.

One small boy may decide, as a matter of tactics, that he can whip another lad. But it is a matter of strategic importance for him to know whether or not the other boy's big brother is going to appear and join in the fight.

It is equally important for him to know if his neighborhood gang will be behind him if the other lad's big brother appears.

MacArthur is virtually ready to give a guaranty that Red China's big brother in the Kremlin won't join the attack if we move against the Chinese mainland. As he puts it, the Soviet Union "will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves in Korea." In other words, Russia will not necessarily intervene if we join up with Chiang and send our bombers into Manchuria.

SHERMAN "MUTTERED"

It is well known, and probably will be emphasized before congressional hearings next week, that the Joint Chiefs have reached a different conclusion. They believe Russia may intervene if we take the course advocated by MacArthur, and thus set off a new world war.

On his political decisions, as opposed to strictly military theory, the Joint Chiefs have been out of sympathy with MacArthur for some months. It is an open secret that Navy Chief Sherman has muttered that had MacArthur been an admiral instead of a general, he would have been relieved of command long ago.

MacArthur's predictions as to what Russia and Red China will or won't do if we extend the fight come at a time when he is not in very good standing as a prophet.

He was a lot more positive, in October, about his prediction of what the Red Chinese would do in Korea than he was this week about what Russia would do.

He assured his superiors last fall that if he pushed the United Nations forces up to the Yalu River, his move would not bring the Chinese into Korea.

HENCE WAKE ISLAND

Washington knew, of course, that Chinese soldiers were concentrated by the thousands across the border in Manchuria. The Pentagon feared that a sweep of Allied forces from the 38th parallel to the Yalu would bring those hordes into Korea.

That was why Truman flew to Wake Island to confer with MacArthur.

It was at that conference that MacArthur assured the President the Chinese would not intervenue in Korea—just as he now is assuring the country Russia would not intervene.

It was, of course, a brief time after MacArthur gave Truman the Wake Island assurances that the Chinese troops were swarming into Korea.

On the question of helping Chiang Kai-shek invade the Chinese mainland, MacArthur told Congress—as TAFT and other followers of that school have been saying for a long time—that such a venture would not involve American ground troops.

As MacArthur himself phrases it, "no man in his right mind" would favor sending American troops to invade China. But what he does advocate is that we give them "logistical support."

COULD WE QUIT?

This means, presumably, that we not only would provide Chiang's men with guns and tanks, but that we also would ferry them from Formosa to the mainland.

It means, presumably, that we would keep the sea lanes open to Formosa by use of our surface fleet, and that we would provide the air cover needed to get the invaders onto the beach.

If we take the MacArthur thesis at its face value, this country would be expected to wash its hands of the enterprise, once we got the troops and their supplies ashore.

But, of course, having sunk millions of dollars in equipment, having committed a large part of our Air Force and a goodly portion of our Navy to that enterprise, it is hard to believe we could wash our hands of it without assuring it success.

If, as predicted by many, Chiang's soldiers should fold up in the face of the Communist armies, once they got to the mainland, there would be, so the argument goes, no way for us to avoid taking over the whole affair.

Having set out to put Chiang back in power, this country, the anti-MacArthurites declare, would have to see him through to the end, regardless of how many ground divisions of American troops the action would require.

THE BIG QUESTION

The Pentagon and the White House are convinced they have plenty of arguments to answer everything MacArthur said before Congress, though no one has any illusions the administration can put on so good a show as the general staged.

The administration—as well as the MacArthur-Taft-Wherry spokesmen—will have full opportunity to present arguments in hearings which begin next week.

The question, of course, is how well can the administration counteract the effect of MacArthur's dramatic appearance? Can it show the flaws which it insists are contained in the MacArthur theses?

If it hopes to do so, it will have to overcome the present tendency for military leaders to duck into executive sessions of committee hearings every time they discuss delicate matters.

If the country is to be swayed by Gen. George C. Marshall, by Bradley, by Vandenberg, and by Sherman, they will have to talk to the congressional committees with as little inhibition as MacArthur displayed before the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congres. And they will have to talk on—not off—the record.

Editorial From the St. Louis Star-Times on the Address of General MacArthur to Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, in all the mass of comment on General MacArthur's address to the Congress last week, an editorial in a great St. Louis newspaper, the Star-Times, is of special interest and merit because of its thoughtfulness and cool judgment in evaluing and analyzing what the general said. I commend this fine editorial to the attention of the Members of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S ADDRESS

All Americans, regardless of party or opinion, should feel gratitude to Douglas MacArthur for the elevated level upon which he kept his address to Congress yesterday. In the angry mood of the hour the general could have done incalculable harm by feeding the flames. In spite of the intensity of his feelings, which he communicated to his audience, he tried not to do so. He tried to stick to issues and to have them resolved on the highest plane of national interest.

The very dignity of his demeanor, however, makes it more difficult for the American people and their Congress to take the next step: to separate the issues from the personalities involved, the highly popular and dramatic martyr-hero and the President who fired him. Nevertheless, this must be done.

With much that General MacArthur said yesterday it is impossible to disagree, particularly his estimate of the present military situation. His confident and masterly presentation of the purely military situation was in sorry contrast to the administration's indecisive and confused handling of the political situation since the Korean involvement, though, of course, this does not mean that General MacArthur has the political answers either.

As he said, the military situation in Korea is now a stalemate. The American people share MacArthur's anguish and anxiety as the casualty lists grow longer. These now exceed 60,000 and no end is in sight.

MacArthur said, "While I was not consulted prior to the President's decision to intervene in support of the Republic of Korea, that decision, from a military standpoint, proved a sound one." This statement is proof that Truman committed the United States to war in Asia without consulting the general in charge of that area, the man with the responsibility of winning the war. Perhaps, as MacArthur said, it turned out to be a correct military decision, at least until the Chinese Communists entered it. But MacArthur's testimony proves conclusively that Truman committed this Nation to a major war without full military consultation, just as he did so without a congressional declaration of war.

But the question is, what should be done now? The administration is taking the chance that a political settlement might be reached in Korea without enlarging the theater. It must be recognized frankly that this chance might not win. The Red Chinese have little hope of driving the U. N. forces out of Korea now unless they get considerable air support from Russia. If they get that air support and begin to advance, the U. N. forces may have no choice except to be driven out or to strike against the bases in China.

Douglas MacArthur doesn't want to continue taking that chance. He wants to take a different chance. He advocates four steps: "(1) The intensification of our economic blockade against China, (2) the imposition of a naval blockade against the China coast, (3) removal of restrictions on air reconnaissance of China's coastal area and of Manchuria, (4) removal of restrictions on the forces of the Republic of China on Formosa, with logistical support to contribute to their effective operations." An interesting omission is his former recommendation for bombing centers in China.

General MacArthur said that it was his understanding "that from a military standpoint the above views have been fully shared by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff." This amounts to a charge that the views for which MacArthur has been criticized were held also by the President's chief military advisers. The fact on this point should be made clear.

Military considerations, of course, must be balanced with other considerations. General MacArthur said yesterday, "War's very object is victory, not prolonged indecision." True. But what is victory in the Korean war? Would victory in Korea have any meaning or value if it triggered off the general war it is being fought to prevent?

MacArthur mentioned this and dismissed it briefly. He said, "the Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves." This is certainly true. But the assumption that the Soviet Union will not honor its obligations under the Sino-Russian mutual assistance treaty of 1950 is not one to be made lightly. General MacArthur does not know what the Russians will do. He may be guessing wrong, just as he did when he judged that Red China would not intervene in Korea. His statement that the Chinese Communist intervention was "not contemplated" is an admission that he guessed wrong, because President Truman implied that he relied upon MacArthur's assurance on this point.

Another huge question is whether the United States could use Nationalist troops on the mainland and limit its aid to what General MacArthur called logistical support. Such support would have to include sea transport with supply and air cover. What would happen if the Nationalist soldiers proved as ineffective as they did before being driven off the mainland? Could the United States then avoid doing what MacArthur said "no man in his right mind would advocate"—sending our ground forces into continental China?

This raises the question of the effectiveness of Chiang's forces on Formosa. MacArthur complimented the Nationalists' government of that island, a view which is not borne out by the reports of dispassionate observers. The failure of Chiang's government and armies on the continent cannot simply be attributed, as the general seemed to try to do, to malicious gossip. How many of Chiang's 600,000 men are well trained, fit, and even moderately well equipped? How much and how long would it take to prepare them for a continental invasion? After they landed, would the United States be committed to restore Chiang to rule over the half billion Chinese whose misery and discontent MacArthur described so well? These are just a few of the facets of the problem that must be considered.

After yesterday's drama loses some of its punch, the American people and their Congress should do a lot of hard-headed questioning of the assumptions and arguments of both General MacArthur and the administration. MacArthur ended his speech by saying that he, like the old soldier of a ballad, would now just fade away. This is one thing that one can say with confidence isn't likely to happen. But it would be good if much of the emotionalism of the past 10 days would fade away. It would be particularly helpful if two treacherous words would just fade away. One of them is "warmonger." The other is "appeaser." General MacArthur isn't a warmonger because he frets against the stalemate in Korea. President Truman isn't an appeaser because he is striving to avoid the expansion of the Korean war into a larger war.

General MacArthur Favors Statehood for Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Douglas MacArthur reaffirmed his support of statehood for Hawaii again on April 17 upon leaving Honolulu for the mainland.

The general's reference to this subject came in the course of his farewell address.

Under unanimous consent, I incorporate in the RECORD an article from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin of April 17, telling of this occasion. It is as follows:

MACARTHUR FAVORS STATEHOOD; LEAVES FOR WELCOME AT SAN FRANCISCO

(By Moray Epstein)

Gen. Douglas MacArthur left Hawaii this morning with a warm farewell from 3,500 persons at Honolulu airport and his expressed hope to see the Territory become a State.

Rested and refreshed from their 33-hour stop-over, the general and his party took off in their plane Bataan at 9:30 a. m.

They are scheduled to arrive at San Francisco's municipal airport at 6 tonight, Hawaiian time.

Then will begin an expected tumultuous welcome from coast to coast.

All during the 10 minutes he was at the airport this morning, the general was genial and smiling.

As his car stopped on the runway about 15 feet from the visitors' enclosure, people behind the fence began to applaud.

He said his farewells to a line of top military officials—with a smile and a handshake for each—was introduce to Duke Kahanamoku, then was surrounded by newsmen.

General MacArthur looked around, allowed each radio announcer to identify himself for their broadcasts, then spoke.

HEART-WARMING WELCOME

"The welcome of Honolulu was heartwarming and marvelous in every way," he said. "In behalf of Mrs. MacArthur and all the members of the party, I thank you.

"We will not forget. When we meet again, I hope Hawaii will be a full-grown State of our beloved country. Aloha."

Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, close personal friend of General MacArthur, laughed, "I just want to say 'California, here we come.'"

The little group broke up and General MacArthur went to where his wife was standing. They turned to face the people behind the fence, and waved as a hundred camera shutters clicked.

WAVE FAREWELL

Everyone headed for the plane. The passengers went aboard with the MacArthurs last. There was a pause as the family stopped just outside the door to turn and wave a farewell.

Then they were inside and 2 minutes later the Bataan moved away to the east end of the field for its take-off.

An unexpected switch in plans Monday night moved the departure time ahead half an hour and shifted the point of take-off from Hickam Air Force Base.

A Navy spokesman today gave two official reasons for the airport change.

WANTED PUBLIC ADMITTED

1. The Bataan had to take off from Honolulu Airport because it requires a longer runway than is available at Hickam.

2. General MacArthur said he wanted the departure to be open to the public as much as possible.

Honolulu police officials assigned enough officers to the airport to maintain order and many compliments were heard from spectators, newsmen, and others for the way in which civil authorities handled the departure.

In addition to Mrs. MacArthur and their son Arthur, the Bataan carries as passengers seven military and personal friends of the general, all of whom arrived in the plane.

First stop is San Francisco. Arrival is scheduled in Washington, D. C., on Wednesday night to give General MacArthur time to get ready for his talk to Congress the following day.

THEN TO NEW YORK

Then after the congressional hearing, General MacArthur will leave for New York.

Advance reports of the receptions planned for the general tell of an exuberance of excitement in the big cities he will visit.

The general was received in Honolulu Monday with warm and sincere greetings.

There were rounds of applause along the route of his tour of Honolulu Monday afternoon.

There was flag waving and handkerchiefs, smiles were everywhere. But on the whole, it was a reserved welcome, more of an expression of respect than adoration.

Fourteen motorcycle policemen, 12 security police, 100 dismounted policemen—1 at each intersection on the route—and 10 transportation officers, made the tour go without a single hitch.

MORE THAN FOR PRESIDENT

More police officers were assigned to the tour detail than were used during President Truman's visit 6 months ago.

Everywhere along the road from Pearl Harbor to Punchbowl to the University of Hawaii and back to Pearl Harbor via Waikiki cars and busses were stopped to permit the procession to pass without delay.

Along Kapiolani Boulevard cars were stalled in a double row for a mile and a half.

MORE THAN ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND SEE

Police Capt. Alfred S. Harper estimated that close to half the population of Honolulu—more than 100,000 persons—lined the roads on which the general's party traveled.

The first stop after the nine-car caravan left from the Makalapa guest house where the MacArthurs stayed was in the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific in Punchbowl crater.

Army enlisted men stood at attention 50 feet apart along the entrance road to the cemetery.

The general's car stopped quickly in front of the cemetery flagpole. He pulled himself out, took a 4-foot orchid wreath from an Army aide, and stepped up on the raised platform around the base of the pole.

General MacArthur leaned the wreath against the pole, took a step backward, and stood stiffly in military salute.

For nearly a full minute he and other officers nearby held their salute.

When the general lowered his arm the several hundred persons watching the ceremony began to applaud.

TRIBUTE TO DEAD

General MacArthur stepped away from the pole, and, with a look of regret in his eyes, moved to the edge of the platform.

"I did not know the dignity of their dead," he said, slowly and deliberately to the newspapermen and photographers standing there.

"But I do know the glory of their death."

Then he walked to his dark green convertible with the five-star general's flag standing up from the front bumper. The caravan continued around the outer cemetery road up to the lookout pinnacle and back out of the crater.

Next stop was at the University of Hawaii, where more than 5,000 persons waited to see the general receive an honorary doctor of civil law degree.

But before the academic ceremony in Arthur L. Andrews Theater, the general went with University President Gregg M. Sinclair, Governor Stainback, Federal Judge J. Frank McLaughlin, and other dignitaries to the president's office.

ENROLLED AS SHRINER

There, Hosmer Rolph, potentate of the Aloha Shrine Temple, presented the general with an honorary life membership in the order.

He handed General MacArthur a red fez hat of the organization and the general put it on briefly.

After signing Dr. Sinclair's guest book the general and the group began to form the processional line to go into the stadium for the doctorate award.

Afterward, General MacArthur walked to his car, followed by the others in the tour party. And as his car moved out of the university gate, he turned to a group of Filipinos standing nearby.

"Mabuhay," he waved to them.

"Aloha," they shouted in return.

STOPS FOR SPECIAL LEI

There was only one more stop before the tour ended. On Kam highway just before Puuloa Road the caravan stopped for several minutes so that Mayor Wilson and members of the Honolulu Board of Supervisors could present the general with a lei wrapped in ti leaves.

As to the question of who provided the open car in which General MacArthur rode, the answer is that the Navy found it for him at the Waikiki U-Drive Co. It was a dark green 1951 Cadillac convertible.

The general—or the Navy—didn't pay any charge for it, incidentally. It was donated.

Gen. Charles G. Dawes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Gen. Charles G. Dawes," published recently in the Wall Street Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GEN. CHARLES G. DAWES

A great many people will remember Charles G. Dawes as the man who blew up a congressional investigation by pounding the table and shouting "Hell 'n Maria."

The fact is that General Dawes was a public servant and a statesman of high order.

Long after he retired from public life, we sat in a little group where the discussion turned on international affairs and General Dawes spoke from the experience of having been Ambassador to Great Britain and the head of the American delegation which took part in the negotiation of the Dawes plan, one of the landmarks in the settlements after the First World War. We recall one of his statements.

"Successful international negotiations must begin," he said, "with the representatives of each nation having uppermost in mind the interest of their own nations. Along with that there must be the determination to adjust those interests to the common good of all."

We wondered then and we still wonder if the position of this country and of the world would not be better if some of our later day negotiators could have absorbed that advice.

Disaster in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR A. JONAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, at the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, a prominent Chicago citizen and a veteran of World War II, now commanding the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade of the Illinois National Guard, answered the question, "Why MacArthur did not return." Having served under General MacArthur in the Pacific during World War II, and author of On the Eve of Victory With MacArthur, General Klein has time after time stressed MacArthur's great devotion to his country and his refusal to return until his job was done.

Now, after devoting a lifetime to the interests of his country, the great general and patriot, MacArthur, has been relieved of his command before his job was done.

General Klein aptly describes the feelings of all true Americans when he stated, upon being informed of General MacArthur's dismissal:

Not since Bataan has this Nation suffered a greater humiliation. We needed General MacArthur's leadership then—we need it now. The country is with him, and his vindication is assured.

The article written by General Klein entitled "Why MacArthur Did Not Return" follows:

WHY MACARTHUR DID NOT RETURN

Recent developments in Korea have solved the so-called mystery in connection with Gen. Douglas MacArthur's determination to remain at his post in Tokyo. In my report On the Eve of Victory dispatched by me in August 1945 from Manila to the War Department for publication in the Army and Navy Journal, I stated that MacArthur would come home only if and when his job in the Far East was finished.

Two things are obvious: One, that General MacArthur alone understood that his job was not finished; and two, that he alone foresaw today's events in Korea.

Now, at the impressive age of 70, the supreme commander is resolved to make sure that our men who gave their lives at Guadalcanal, Midway, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa, on the Normandy beachheads, at Anzio, and the Bulge, did not give their lives in vain.

Ever since the surrender of Japan, the American people have sought an answer to the question, "Why doesn't MacArthur come home?" He will return when his job is finished and when he is able to report to the American people, "mission completed."

A Faithful Citizen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago an Oakland, Calif., volunteer Federal worker spent a few days in Washington. He is a sufficiently remarkable man that his activities merit comment. He will be 90 years old during the present month. His name is John A. Davis.

At the outbreak of World War II, Mr. Davis was 81 years of age. Although he was active and alert both mentally and physically, he could not find employment because of his age. Desiring to assist his Government, he volunteered to contribute his services to the Office of Price Administration. Because he had 15 years of experience as a village postmaster his services were gladly accepted and he was placed in charge of the mail room of the Price Administration office. At the conclusion of hostilities he continued to perform the same service for the rent-control office and is still working at that office daily at the age of 90.

During World War II and the postwar period he has contributed more than 15,000 hours of service to his Government without compensation therefor, notwithstanding the fact that he does not have an independent income and must live frugally.

In commenting on his work for the Government, Mr. Davis has stated:

I have been pleased to render this service because it has given me an active interest during the later years of life; it has shown that older men and women can render real service to the Government and to private enterprise in case they are given an opportunity to do so. I am glad that provision has been made to take care of the aged, sick, and destitute, and I am happy that they are no longer sent to poorhouses. I believe that the greatest service that could be rendered to older folks by the Government, State, and people of the communities in which they live would be that of giving them an opportunity to earn their own living. Through my contributed service, I have had an opportunity to use my head and my hands and I have an interest in life that has kept me healthy, happy, and active.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Davis has been commended by many for his fine public service. I wish to add my commendations and thanks for the good work which Mr. Davis has done.

Veterans of Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team Told Good Citizenship First Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include therein the text of a speech made at the eighth anniversary banquet of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team at Waikiki Lau Yee Chai, Honolulu, Hawaii, on April 7, by Masato Doi. It follows:

The years have flown, and it is 8 years now since the occasion arose out of which grew the bond which binds us today. The crisis called forth the man; the response was not wanting. We knew then that no man is an island unto himself.

In a few weeks, as we watch the film "Go for Broke," we shall relive those years which saw us in the thick of battle. To each of us will return the strenuous times in the dripping heat of Shelby and the rugged hills of Italy. Perhaps we shall even smell the acrid stench of death and powder. And we may feel again that sense of impending danger about us. Before each of us will rise the faces of those we can see no more.

And there will be happier memories. The spicy, rollicking adventures which belong only to a soldier on furlough, the sudden gleam which lights a ragged Italian infant's eyes at the sight of a candy bar, or the pleasant friendships made with simple French families.

Above all, there may swell within us a deep pride as we recall our part in the fierce and valiant struggle to maintain a free world.

But, for most of us, that day of combat in the field of screaming shells and chattering guns is past—at least for a time. What remains is the continuing obligation to realize that way of life which was so bravely defended.

We were then citizens rising to meet the call of duty; we are now citizens still, though with a record of achievement under fire. Though the character of our obligations may have changed, the fundamental duty remains the same—the duty to live up to the promise of America. True, for us there was the peculiar task of proving our right to unsullied citizenship; but let us not forget that proving that point was only a part of the larger fight to be able to return to a community where we can live a free and full life.

Battle is not, never was, never will be, an end in itself. It is the cause for which the sword is borne that counts. And what good the heroic deeds of war if the reason for those deeds turns out to be but a hollow dream?

Four years have now passed since the incorporation of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Veterans Club. We were formed not only to preserve the memory of our fallen comrades and to keep intact the strong bond forged in the heat of battle, but also to continue the high traditions of the combat team in our activities in the community. The first flush of exciting organizational work is done. The community has responded generously to our appeals; the memory of the war years was not forgotten by it. And the club is now on firm foundation.

But we stand at the threshold of a critical period. We are the decorated Captain Hero come home to his former life as Plain Joe. Other days are come, and other heroes are born. And as a club, this fact strikes us full in the face. This is not to say that the record of the war years is a useless shadow. There are none who would take away from the glory inscribed in blood by all the veterans from the islands. But the laurels of the past are sandy ground on which to rest the promise of the future.

The task before us individually lies in the difficult and oftentimes onerous job of active and voluntary participation in the life of the community. The only reward may be an inner satisfaction of a life richly and freely lived. But it was for this opportunity to so live that so many of our comrades gave their lives. And we are yet too young to pasture like an old war horse.

It needs but little thought to see that the distinctive mark of the American way of life to which we pledged ourselves is that it is built on choice. Indeed, it was to be able to return to a society of choices that we "shot the works." But what good the fight if the opportunity to choose be not grasped?

This past week has brought splendid and encouraging news that statehood for the Territory may not be far off. Though already great, then more than ever will the significance of the ballot come to the fore. Then more than ever will there rest upon us the duty to keep faith with the dead and wear the mantle of unlimited citizenship with the distinction with which we served in war. As individuals, let us shoot the ballot with the same unerring accuracy and vigor that we shot the bullet.

Our organization is pledged "to honor and esteem the supreme sacrifice made by the deceased comrades." What better way to realize this aim than to foster and encourage an active awareness among the members to all community processes. The Four Hundred and Forty-second Veterans' Club is not and cannot be a partisan political group. This is far from saying that its hands are tied on vital issues of the day. To let them go unnoticed is to live outside the life stream of the community. Perhaps the mark of valor may not mean the wisdom of ages, but surely the badge of the veteran signifies a serious and mature mind. It is not only our privilege but our obligation to use this great asset for the benefit of the community.

The past week has also brought portents of gloom. High figures talk in terms of approaching war and wholesale destruction. Already we see more of Hawaii's youths don the apparel of combat, and once again we look into the face of sorrow bent over a hero's grave. But disaster may strike closer and strike harder. Who more fit to meet this consequence than he who has already braved the bursting bombs?

I repeat again from John Donne that "no man is an island unto himself." Words more apt could not have been spoken of a group such as ours. The very heritage we bear is grounded on that concept. And the heritage points the star to which we must cling. If the Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team has gained the respect and admiration of the community from which it sprang, it has done so only because it served a cause with valor. If the Four Hundred and Forty-second Veterans Club is to retain that respect, it can only do so by clinging to the high tradition of unselfish sacrifice set on the battlefield.

Of course, the life of the club is not that of the lighthouse which fails to shine on itself. It cannot be that if it is to have a strong and active membership. And a weak and crumbling structure serves no purpose—to itself or others. The intricacy of life today compels the individuals to look in unfamiliar nooks for answers. The club must hold its resources ready to aid the member to find them. No job can be too small, and none too big, for the club to tackle for its membership. In past years, the club has successfully carried on intensive athletic and social programs. A job referral system is in operation. Blood-bank benefits have and will continue to relieve the unfortunate. And contemplated activities include forums on practical matters of interest, and financial aid to members in need. These benefits, and others as the need arises, must be extended in order that the club remain a virile unit.

Thus the future of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Veterans Club lies in "going for broke" both in extending tangible benefits to the membership and in participating in community affairs and serving community needs. Practical wisdom dictates the first; mature reflection compels the second.

I close with this parting word: We are pledged to uphold the high tradition of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team. Assuming the name Four Hundred and Forty-second in itself casts upon us a trust to live up to the record. Our heritage tells us that the key to the future lies in the realization that we are citizens first and veterans second.

Food for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two excellent statements on the food-for-India proposal.

One of the statements has been issued by the committee on international policy of the National Planning Association, a nonprofit, nonpolitical organization, devoted to the study of public-interest questions. A list of the officers and sponsors of the organization subscribing to the statement on India is attached.

The second statement for insertion in the RECORD is addressed to the Rules Committee by the Citizens Conference on International Economic Union, headed by Mr. Louis Heaton Pink, an outstanding and high-minded citizen of my State.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INDIAN CRISIS

For the first time the Government of India has officially approached the United States for assistance in procuring grain needed for the food crisis in India. India's situation is precarious. The Government of India must prevent further deterioration of the standard of living if India is to maintain its economic and political stability.

India, a newly independent republic in Asia, remains noncommunist and antitotalitarian. Its per capita income is, however, desperately low—estimated at between $50 and $60 a year. Many of its 350,000,000 inhabitants are poor, underfed, ill-housed and inadequately clothed. Its standard of living has declined 16 percent from prewar levels. Aggravating this situation, the people of India are now faced with mass suffering and starvation due to the lack of food grains.

I

Food grains comprise the bulk of the Indian diet. The government of India has carried on a grow-more-food campaign designed to make India self-sufficient in food, to reduce the drain on its foreign exchange resources, and to free its limited resources for procurment abroad of goods needed for essential development to prevent further deterioration of its economy. Grain drawn from surplus producing areas in India is distributed through the rationing system to the deficit areas. The additional amount needed in the deficit areas is imported by the government of India. India's rationing system is one of the largest and most effective in the world. Ration prices are substantially below market prices. The ration system currently supplies additional food grains to 125,000,000 people, 45,000,000 of whom receive the "full" ration and the remainder a "partial" ration.

Last year the Government of India imported slightly more than 2,000,000 tons of food grains for distribution through its rationing system. It was hoped that import requirements would be less in 1951. In the summer of 1950, however, the prospects for good harvests which would be consumed in 1951 first dimmed and then vanished. Earthquakes, floods, droughts, and locust plagues cut domestic production of food grains by 6,000,000 tons. As the result, India was faced with a need for greatly increased imports of food grains from abroad. It is estimated that in 1951 over 9,500,000 tons of food grains are required to maintain the meager ration and to extend it temporarily to new areas. About 3,500,000 tons of food grains can be procured domestically for rationing purposes, leaving over 6,000,000 tons to be obtained from abroad.

India is purchasing 4,000,000 tons of food grains from countries all over the world, ranging from Pakistan and Burma to the United States. But it does not have the available foreign exchange for the remaining 2,000,000 tons. On December 16, 1950, Madame Pandit, the Indian Ambassador to the United States, officially requested aid in obtaining this amount from the United States Government.

II

Indian food consumption seems pitiably small by comparison with our standards. The average Indian caloric intake is put at 1,760, a figure lower than the internationally accepted subsistence level of 1,800; while the comparable figure in the United States is 3,244 and in Japan 2,050. For lack of grain in the ration-distribution system, grain rations were recently reduced from 12 ounces (approximately 900 calories).

Two million tons of food grains would be the ration requirement for 23,000,000 people for a year. In terms of the avarage caloric intake, 2,000,000 tons of food grains would represent the total food intake of about 15,000,000 people in India. If the 2,000,000 tons of food grains are not forthcoming, it will not mean that 15,000,000 people will be without food while all others receive the average amount, since the grain shortage will fall upon all recipients under the rationing system. Rather, it might be said that 15,000,000 units of starvation or deaths by starvation will be distributed over the total population, receiving food rations. The consequence of such action will be to weaken a larger part of the population by malnutrition. Resistance to disease will be less and a great number of people will die, indirectly if not directly from starvation.

The people of India have looked to the west—to the United States—for aid in their time of crisis. India's very existence as a democratic and independent country may well be dependent upon our response to this request. While the Government of India has been emphatic in its control of communism in that country, the Communists have taken advantage of every opportunity to play upon the poverty of the Indian people. They are not missing this opportunity presented by the hunger of the people.

III

India is expending its foreign exchange in the procurement of food grains. It has resumed trade with Pakistan and in so doing has advanced over 300,000 tons nearer the goal of 4,000,000 tons which it is purchasing from abroad for 1951. It proposes to pay the ocean freight charges on the additional 2,000,000 tons.

On February 12 the President addressed to the Congress a message proposing emergency food aid for India. In view of the urgent need for assistance, he proposed that funds be appropriated immediately for 1,000,000 tons, deferring appropriation of funds for the remaining 1,000,000 tons until the situation has been further clarified.

Careful consideration of the appropriate terms upon which aid should be extended would involve investigation of India's ability to pay for the additional 2,000,000 tons of food grain in terms of India's economic position in coming years. In considering terms of aid, it must be recognized that the grain would not generate foreign exchange which could be used to repay the aid.

Since World War II, India's foreign-exchange earnings have been inadequate to meet import requirements. This has been true, despite the fact that, over most of this period, India has exercised rigorous import controls and has held consumption to relatively austere levels. India's international balance of payments for 1951 will probably show a small deficit, allowing for trade with Pakistan and India's payment of ocean freight for an additional 2,000,000 tons of grain. While India has met past trade deficits by drawing upon accumulated foreign-exchange assets, totaling about $4,900,000,000 in 1946, these assets have shrunk to less than $1,800,000,000 as the result of trade deficits, devaluation, and the partition of what was British India. This sum includes an estimated minimum requirement of $1,000,000,000 for currency backing and working capital.

If India is to halt economic deterioration, it must carry out its present plan for essential economic development in the shortest possible time. India's program to prevent further economic deterioration calls for a 6-year effort from July 1, 1951. This basic program (under the so-called Colombo plan) requires a total expenditure of almost $4,000,000,000, or an average of about $650,000,000 a year. While this is large in absolute terms, it is scarcely more than enough to assure maintenance of present low standards of living. Approximately $1,700,000,000 (about $290,000,000 a year) of the programed expenditures must be in foreign exchange. Drawing against reserves and utilizing current savings will provide about $100,000,000 annually, leaving a gap of around $190,000,000 annually in foreign exchange, which will have to come from abroad in the form of loans.

Already India owes $100,000,000 to the International Monetary Fund and $62,500,000 to the International Bank. It is estimated that an additional $1,250,000,000 of foreign capital is invested in India, involving substantial annual service payments. Consequently, India will have great difficulty in servicing fully the annual increment of about $190,000,000 in foreign loans needed for the program. The cost of the additional 2,000,000 tons of food grains needed by India is placed at $190,000,000. It is obvious that if India has to borrow this amount in order to obtain the food aid, the burden of loan service which would be imposed would cut heavily into the size of the development program which India could undertake.

India's present need for emergency food aid is in addition to its need for a 6-year program. The former serves to emphasize the need for halting the downward trend in India's standard of living so that India will be able to withstand possible emergencies in the future. In view of the urgent need for a development program and the critical nature of the time, it is important that India's present plan not be deterred. A loan to purchase this emergency requirement of food grains would prejudice India's ability to carry out its 6-year program and, thus, would strike at the stability desperately needed by India if it is to remain democratic.

IV

It is the considered judgment of the Committee on International Policy that the American people should respond promptly and in a spirit of Christian charity to the appeal from India for grain to feed her starving people. We do not believe that the welfare of this country will be served in any way by conditioning our response to political objectives or to recent differences of opinion expressed in the United Nations. On the contrary, we feel that hundreds of millions of Asiatics, both inside and outside of India, will regard the action which we take on this matter as a sure sign of our future intentions in the Far East.

We averted starvation, unrest, and the rise of communism in Europe by our bold and generous actions under the Marshall plan. We cannot afford to ignore the threat of starvation, unrest, and communism in India. We cannot afford to fail to take those limited actions which are asked of us to help the Indian Government meet this tragic situation. And in providing the funds necessary for the grain requested, we cannot afford to ask India to accept a loan which will delay her desperately needed development program by 1 year.

It is recommended that receipts in India from the sale of grain given by this country should be set aside as counterpart funds. The United States Government can properly ask to have the equal voice in the expenditure of these funds that it now has in the use of the counterpart funds of European countries participating in the Marshall plan. In this way, we can, in effect, use twice our appropriations for food for India: First, to feed the starving and, second, to aid India in her much needed economic development program.

Members of the NPA Committee on International Policy adopting this statement are: Frank Altschul, chairman, chairman of the board, General American Investors Co.; Louis Brownlow, vice chairman, Washington, D. C.; Solomon Barkin, director of research, Textile Workers Union of America; John F. Chapman, vice president-publisher, McGraw-Hill International Corp.; Charles C. CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC UNION,
New York, N. Y., April 23, 1951.

To the Rules Committee, House of Representatives:

The Citizens Conference on International Economic Union earnestly urges that you release to Congress for action the bill providing 2,000,000 tons of grain for India, which has been before you since March 5.

We urge that the United States do the right and obvious thing by seeing that this grain gets where it is needed as promptly as possible. It is of prime importance that Congress does not weaken or destroy the virtue of our act by trying to make this assistance a matter of barter, or a loan instead of a grant, or subject to political conditions which would make it difficult or impossible for India to accept this needed help.

There is no question of the great need; much of the land of India which produces grain and rice has gone dry. Floods and earthquakes intensify the problem. No one questions that millions suffer from hunger. Informed sources report that the famine will probably equal if not exceed that of Bengal in 1943. It is admitted that we have sufficient grain in storage and can afford to send the 2,000,000 tons asked for without injury to our economy.

India has bought all she can get with the exchange which is available, from the United States, Australia, Canada, and other nations, but it is not enough. If India had the means or the dollar exchange she would undoubtedly prefer to buy grain, rather than ask for it on special terms. Prime Minister Nehru properly deprecates too much outside help since it means you do not strengthen yourself. But because India faces a crisis Nehru joins his people in asking for a grant from the United States.

Former President Hoover, experienced in aiding people in need, says that this is not politics, but Christianity. It is also an expression of our good-neighbor policy, to which we are rightly committed. Undoubtedly the majority of both parties in Congress will vote for this aid if given the chance.

It is intended that this grain be distributed by the ECA, experienced in such matters, under regulations similar to those used in Europe. There is no danger that our aid would be wasted or abused. The Government of India, while one of the newest in the world, has long years of British training behind it and has already demonstrated not only its interest in democracy but its capacity for administration.

The Committee on Rules will render a great service not only to India but to the United States, and to international cooperation and good will, if it promptly reports the bill before it, so that Congress can take action in the interest of India and of our relations with Asia and the rest of the world.

CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC UNION,
LOUIS H. PINK, Chairman.

More Information on India's Attitude

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, there is appended hereto the text of an interview with Madame Pandit, India's Ambassador to the United States, regarding India's policy by the distinguished editor, Dr. Manfred George, published in the German-English newspaper, Aufbau, on Friday, March 30, 1951. This newspaper enjoys wide circulation and makes a distinct contribution to American democracy. It brings to bear upon our national and international problems the experience and intellect of many who have experienced the Nazi totalitarianism and lived through it, to help us to deal with modern-day Communists and other totalitarians:

The United States is rich, richer than many of its citizens know. India is poor, poorer than many people all over the world imagine. They think only of maharajahs and the luxury of their courts, of the legends and stories of rulers and princes.

This India has been disappearing; another India, slowly freeing herself from colonial rule, has taken her place. The new India is independent and proud, but poor, terribly poor.

Since the United States lost China, India is our most valuable remaining ally in Asia. We do not want to go into the problems of Asia in this connection, as they are very similar to those confronting us in Germany. India is a free country. Although close cooperation between two free and democratic countries such as the United States and India seems a matter of course, Congress has very ungraciously delayed the shipment of 2,000,000 tons of grain for India's starving population.

Certain circles in the United States have been disappointed by the attitude taken by Prime Minister Nehru. Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH recently pointed out that although India repeatedly voted against us in the United Nations, she has voted more often for us. Yet, it is her latest vote that is being remembered. Senator SMITH, of course, is for India. But her statement reports the attitude that prevails among, unfortunately, certain Members of the House and Senate who advocate the policy of "do ut des"; they cannot tell humanitarian measures from political bargaining, and they feel that India must pay for 2,000,000 tons of grain by complete political subservience.

Close cooperation between the United States and India is one of the prerequisites of world peace; the jungle of misunderstandings between the two great nations must be cleared away. For this reason, I have asked the Indian Ambassador in Washington, Mme. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, to grant Aufbau the following interview.

In the waiting room of the Indian Embassy in Washington there is a picture which immediately attracts the attention of the visitor. It is the portrait of a man with intelligent and radiantly warm features—of Dr. Rajendra Prasad, President of the Republic of India. Like Gandhi, Nehru, and the present mistress of the Embassy, he has shared the fate of those who fought for India's independence. He suffered privations, and he spent years in jail. But his face does not show any bitterness; it reveals warmth, clouded by worry, and kindliness, shaded by sorrow. It is the face of India.

Facing a petite, grey-haired woman with a warm smile in the Ambassador's office, we thought of the day when the sister and close collaborator of India's Prime Minister clashed with General Smuts in the United Nations.

"When you scored your great victory over the policy of discrimination in South Africa in your capacity as leader of the official Indian delegation to the United Nations," we reminded her, "you delivered a speech before the General Assembly in which you said: 'We move in spite of difficulties toward a closer cooperation and the building of a world commonwealth. * * * The peoples of the world look with satisfaction to their fulfillment. Let us realize that human emotions and the needs of the world will not wait for an indefinite period.'

"At that time, the entire world seemed to share these feelings. Yet it now looks as if the Governments of the United States and of India were much farther apart than their peoples would like to see. May I ask a few questions about the misunderstandings which apparently have caused this situation?"

Answer: "Certainly. But don't forget that I am speaking only as the Indian Ambassador, and not for Prime Minister Nehru."

Question: "Do you think that there has recently been a shift in Indian public opinion which is unfavorable to the United States?"

Answer: "There has been no shift of any appreciable scale in Indian public opinion unfavorable to the United States. India is a democratic country and has a free press. The opinions and criticisms expressed by Indian newspaper editors do not always represent either the views of the government or the sentiments of the people. Similarly, it may be agued that editorial comments in some United States newspapers do not represent the views of the Government or the sentiments of the American people. Nevertheless, it is true that in recent months there have been misunderstandings as a result of apparent divergencies in the policies of the respective governments in relation to specific issues; for instance, the recognition of the government of new China. But these misunderstandings are trivial when viewed against the basic identity of interests as well as aspirations of the two peoples. This misunderstanding is also partly due to lack of information on which sound judgment can be based. The efforts of the United States State Department to secure congressional approval for the grant of food to aid India constitute the most eloquent testimony to the underlying bond of friendship which characterizes the relations between the two governments."

Question. "When Prime Minister Nehru recently called for the support of South Korea, he stated that 'the West lacked in subtlety and took the wrong approach to the mind and hearts of Asia.' Do you also think so, and to what did the Prime Minister specifically refer?"

Answer. "I believe the Prime Minister's reference to the lack of subtlety in the West's approach to the minds and hearts of Asia was of a general nature and did not cover the entire ground of East-West relationships. The Prime Minister has often spoken about the vast changes that have taken place in Asian countries in recent years and are bound to take place in the future, and has often stressed the fact that the understanding of Asia is one of the major tasks that confront western statesmanship. I do not know if the Prime Minister had any specific issue in mind when he made the statement quoted by you, but if he did, the reference could be to American policy in regard to the recognition of the People's Government of China."

Question. "I understand that 'western imperialism' is one of the most hated ideologies in Asia. Given the fact that the so-called imperialistic nations are pulling out of Asia, is she not bound to come under the influence of Soviet imperialism, in transforming her colonial countries into independent states? Will the Asiatic countries be strong enough to uphold their newly won national independence through social reforms, or are the social revolutionary forces stronger than the national forces?"

Answer. "It is, in my view, wrong to assume that the gradual withdrawal of imperial control from Asia will create a political vacuum which can be filled by communism alone. In fact, nationalism is today a much stronger force in Asia than communism. But nationalism is a political idea, and it does not fill empty stomachs. Asian nationalism, therefore, requires to be fortified by economic aid provided by those who are in a position to do so. The bad economic situation in many Asian countries recently liberated from imperial control should not be ascribed entirely to the fault of the peoples of those countries. Centuries of exploitation have laid the economy of those countries prostrate and have grievously circumscribed their power of recovery. The leadership of these countries is genuinely interested in the economic welfare of their peoples in a democratic and peaceful manner. Only thus can the forces of social disruption and violent agitation be held permanently in check. It is the feeling of Asian peoples that the United States is in a position to fortify the forces of nationalism by rendering them material aid in their economic difficulties. A lasting alliance between American democracy and Asian nationalism can thus be forged."

Question. "Although communism is unpopular in India, there seems to be sometimes lack of apprehension that it could possibly endanger India, or any other Asiatic nation. Is this correct, and how will and can India protect herself against communism?"

Answer. "There is an awareness in India of the possible dangers of communism and it is for this reason that the government is straining its resources to the utmost to better the economic condition of the country and raise the living standards of the people."

Question. "Is there any other way in which you combat communism?"

Answer. "We fight the idea. While we do not suppress the Communist Party as such, we punish those individuals who abuse the freedom granted them under the new constitution."

Question. "Aside from India, are there any other Asiatic nations strong enough to develop so-called third forces and act as buffers against the two great world powers?"

Answer. "India does not look upon herself either as a third force or as a buffer state between America and Soviet Russia. India wishes to remain on the friendliest terms with the United States, as she does also with other countries."

Question. "Considering Korea which is of deep concern to the entire world—if morality has to choose between two evils—between war or appeasement—which in your opinion is the lesser evil?"

Answer. "The alternatives in my opinion are not between war and appeasement, but between war and peace through conciliation. If India believed in appeasement, she would not have voted in support of the U. N. resolution branding North Korea an aggressor."

Question. "Some western circles find it extremely difficult to correlate their views and recent developments in Asia. Let me just refer to some statements made by General MacArthur which I think rather controversial. He spoke of the necessity of a strong will in the approach to the oriental mind. Which, in your opinion, is the main difficulty that must be overcome in this respect?"

Answer. "I do not think there are any great difficulties. It seems to me that the West will have to give up its old concepts of Asia, and to acknowledge the fact that tremendous changes have taken place. One cannot look at the problems of Asia with the eyes of yesterday. New independent states have come into existence. What the west needs, is a fundamental change of attitude, a change of heart, so-to-speak. Mainly, however, it will have to deal with Asia on terms of equality."

Question. "To sum up with a basic question: Which, in your opinion, is the basic difference in the attitude toward world peace between the mentality of India, or rather, Asia, and that of the West? Which—if any—is the common ground on which the two can meet, and how can such a meeting pave the way for an understanding with Russia?"

Answer: "This is a difficult question to answer in categorical terms. I think India's sympathies in the East-West cold war lie fundamentally with the West. India is opposed to totalitarianism and dictatorship, but her approach to the problem has such wide social and economic implications that no satisfactory solution can come out of global atomic warfare. Ways and means must therefore be constantly sought for securing a meeting ground between the two hostile camps. It is the Indian view that this quest should not be given up under any circumstances, and we feel that it is not yet too late to achieve this seeming miracle."

We then discussed general problems of Asiatic policy. In particular, I referred to two resolutions now pending before the Foreign Relations Committee of the House of Representatives; one, submitted by Congressmen JAVITS and RIBICOFF, suggests the foundation of an organization for far-eastern economic cooperation, a kind of Marshall plan for Asia; the other, which has the support of eight Republican and Democratic Representatives, advocates a Pacific pact for the common and mutual defense of far-eastern territories along the lines of the Atlantic Pact.

According to the Ambassador, India is deeply interested in any kind of cooperation; however, Madam Pandit feels that there are no prerequisites for the military side of such a pact, as the stature of the nations concerned is too unequal. She also pointed out that the ground for such close cooperation has been laid by history with the strong political, cultural, and philosophical ties between the peoples in question. Practical outlines were sketched at the India Relations Conference which was held in New Delhi several years ago. Similarly, the Colombo plan very actively contributes to the political and economic reorientation of Asia.

We left the Embassy with a feeling of deep satisfaction. This was a representative of a nation destined to play a leading role in world politics, who seemed to combine the wisdom of Asia with the liberal humanism of the west. This was a woman—with an entire nation standing behind her—so deeply concerned with the ideal of peace that she did not allow herself even the shadow of a doubt that peace could not be preserved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following item by the National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service which appeared in the Tidings, Los Angeles, Calif., of Friday, April 20, 1951:

NO OSSERVATORE VIEW ON MACARTHUR GIVEN

Last weekend there appeared in Osservatore Romano an article making reference to the removal of General MacArthur. The article expressed the opinion that the dismissal of the general could be regarded as a step indicating a desire for world peace.

General press accounts said that Osservatore Romano itself had made these observations, and reference was made to editorial comment by Osservatore Romano.

Osservatore Romano, while published in Vatican City, is not the official organ of the Vatican, except to the extent that from time to time it runs a column containing official Vatican pronouncements, always under the same heading, so that those familiar with the paper know that unless the material appears under this heading, it is not official.

Actually, the MacArthur comment was contained in an article which appears regularly twice a week in Osservatore Romano and is written by Giorgio Luigi Bernucci.

This regular article does not contain Vatican official views, but the views of the writer. It is headed Acta Diurna, and undertakes to review various news developments around the world.

The NCWC news service has been informed that in this instance, definitely the comment on the MacArthur case was the writer's own, and does not necessarily represent the views of Osservatore itself.

Time for Americans To Speak Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Tidings of April 13, 1951:

TIME FOR AMERICANS TO SPEAK UP

The time has come for every American to speak up and help save his country, Father Bernard J. Hubbard, S. J., said here Tuesday night.

Lecturing before 4,000 persons in Shrine Auditorium at the very moment when the news of General MacArthur's dismissal was breaking, Father Hubbard characterized the general as "the greatest living American today."

"More than external aggression I fear internal cancer," the 63-year-old Jesuit explorer told his audience in reviewing United States postwar policies.

He described Dean Acheson, George Marshall, Owen Lattimore, and Alger Hiss as "architects of disaster."

WORSE BLUNDER

These men, said the Alaska veteran, "have already made a worse blunder than losing Asia by becoming spiritually and mentally underprivileged" and refusing to admit their blunders.

"Marshall," he declared, "is now just part of a machine. He is neither physically nor mentally the man he was several years ago."

Included in the lecturer's criticism of what he termed the "internationalists" was Ambassador at Large Philip Jessup "who shouldn't be at large."

The Jesuit authority on Alaska and the Arctic declared that America's major postwar errors were:

1. Refusal by the administration to permit Gen. George Patton to accept the Nazi surrender on grounds that such a surrender was to be received by the Russians instead. "This was the first appeasement," said Father Hubbard.

2. The Marshall mission to China which attempted to force on Nationalist China a coalition to the Communists.

YALTA INCIDENT

Referring to Yalta, Father Hubbard alleged that General MacArthur had sent a personal emissary to President Roosevelt there with the recommendation that Russia under no condition be allowed to enter the Pacific war.

The emissary was prevented by Alger Hiss and others from seeing the President and delivering MacArthur's recommendation.

Further errors which the lecturer attributed to the State Department included its refusal to utilize a total of 27 divisions of European patriots in exile who have a stake to fight for. These include Hungarian, Czech, and Polish soldiers with their officers.

He assailed the Department's refusal to permit use of 22 Spanish divisions, soldiers who have defeated communism in battle. If use of this total of 49 divisions were permitted, many of our 18-year-olds would be saved.

CASUALTIES QUESTIONED

The Jesuit priest questioned the accuracy of official Korea casualty figures, citing a high-ranking but unnamed private source which held that as of December 29, 1950, American casualties were already 60,000.

Other straightforward observations by the gray-haired weather-tanned priest were:

"I do not fear world war III if we teach China a few lessons. After all, there are troubles behind the iron curtain too."

"If we started war tomorrow the Russian Army would revolt. I have good reason for saying so. * * * The Russians, further, do not have enough petroleum to undertake a war." Father Hubbard said Russia's Baku oil fields were going dry, new wells were not producing anything, and consequently the Soviets had taken to exploratory drilling in the Arctic tundra.

As for any Russian threat to Alaska, Father Hubbard said no military operations against the Territory have any chance of success because of the morass, vast wilderness, and impossible conditions.

The Present Administration and the War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled, "The Treason of 'Liberalism,'" written by Forrest Davis and published in the Freeman for February 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TREASON OF LIBERALISM

(By Forrest Davis)

The definitive word on the administration's funk over its unacknowledged war was spoken the other day by a visiting cattleman. A plain man from the plains, unversed in the polemical subtleties of Capital shop talk, he found himself amidst statesmen from his own range country at a noggin party on Capitol Hill. What he heard caused this booted and usually self-contained man growing agitation. The company agreed that the President's attempt to smuggle Fair Deal socialism into his back-breaking defense budget was a piece of immature chicane. It was agreed that the administration's global military policy was so fantastically distorted that we could lose the war of the west before George Catlett Marshall discovers that Mao Tse-tung, not Chiang Kai-shek, is the enemy. It was suggested that the administration, by seconding Great Britain's ignominious project for a cease-fire parley with the enemy over Formosa and Japan, had betrayed an inner weakness signifying a profound malady of the spirit. At this point the cattleman broke into the practiced phraseology of his hosts, drawling with deadly earnestness:

"I reckon the time has come to take this Government away from the boys and hand it over to the men."

The cattleman could be forgiven for supposing that he had been whisked unaccountably to Lilliput. Events since last June have, in truth, dwarfed the chief men of the administration. Why, the visitor was asking, must a resolute people with its terrible swift sword still undrawn, immeasurably strong in field and factory, be so feebly yet so refractorily led? Why must our chief of state be so palpably unequal to his task, mistaking pugnacity for strength of character, mistaking Congress for the enemy, sheltering himself behind a timid, evasive United Nations; hearkening so uncritically to far-eastern defeatists and a London brazenly ready to violate the unity of the west to serve its abject appeasement of the common enemy in China? Why must the President still be advised on the highest levels by the friend of Alger Hiss and by the pessimistic, procrastinating septuagenarian General Marshall, sunk in reverie and failing to spur the arming of America as he had, when vigor and conviction were on him, in 1941?

Yet an inventory, no matter how explicit of our rulers' weaknesses and follies comes short of giving us a true understanding of what ails our Government in an hour of high destiny. The answer to the moral confusion, the flabby tone, the unwillingness to meet with a knightly spirit our appointed task of manning the marches of the west against the barbarian, lies deeper than personality. Should not the debilitating malaise which gives to life in Washington its sense of negation, empty of honor and dignity, be diagnosed as a failure of the liberal spirit? Is it not the prevailing political liberalism of the midcentury, that potpourri of indiscriminate do-goodism trending into statism and Marxism and blending so indistinguishably with treason, that is the deepest enemy of the traditional America and the west? It is this liberalism which, since World War I, has under the guise of welfare surrendered society after society into black reaction.

The unnerved, indecisive liberal socialism of Prince Lwow and Kerensky, instead of standing the implacably malign Lenin before a firing squad, allowed him to seize power and go on to blight a whole era with a senseless, murderous political adventurism known as communism. So it was with the liberalism of Weimar, shrinking from the decapitation of Hitler and the Communist traitors and ending in nazism. It is liberal socialism that has produced the unrecognizably neurotic Britain, disloyal to the West. Above all, it is liberalism which, motivated to whatever degree by treachery, has cost us China, has enfeebled our offensive spirit and blunted our strategical judgment about our vital interest in the western Pacific. That liberalism, preached with the fervor of a Byzantine heresy by glib intellectuals tired of the west, unequal to its overwhelming culture, eager to efface the masses whom they fear in the Leviathan state, is, I submit, behind our defensive faltering before the senior totalitarian state.

There is a deceptiveness about the facade of affairs in Washington. The administration calls men to the colors, it busies itself with a gradual, somewhat grudging mobilization of the economy. Intent on Europe first, it quarrels with its critics, evading the grim lesson that our No. 1 strategical problem is the western Pacific; that, if we lose Japan, we lose Alaska, and Europe. The administration still bristles at suggestions that it root out the fifth column that has demonstrably betrayed us. It hesitates to summon the people to make a cause out of the war that has been forced upon them. Where is our dedication, where our determination (as in the case of our determination to destroy Hitler) to rid the world of the wicked men in the Kremlin, to free the peoples, including their own, whom they have enslaved, so that the world may return to peaceful ways?

In a sense not too remote, the troubled observer may be reminded of the contrast between reality and semblance in the Petrograd of 1916. The ministers of the provisional government went through the motions of ruling mother Russia; they dispatched troops, they issued manifestoes, yet all they did was misdirected. And, while foreign diplomats reported the government secure, the conspirators at the Smolny convent forged their iron coup unmolested.

We are indebted to Leon Trotsky's History of the Russian Revolution for a description of the paradoxically normal scene as Russia drifted into ruin: the great bureaucracies of empire functioning, trams running through the dirty October snow, guards mounted at the winter palace, the ballet, the theater, the schools, the cafes, the shops pursuing their wonted course. The press, from Tsarist to Bolshevist, appeared as usual on the morning after Lenin had appropriated the strategic centers with no recognition of that cataclysmic occurrence. We do not face insurrection, our extremity is presumably less grave, yet it may be legitimately doubted that our rulers are nearer the core of reality than the uncomprehending statesmen and citizens of Petrograd in its final hours of freedom.

The great bureaucracies of Washington function, the trolleys run, but the somnambulism is broken only by strong, heartening utterances in Congress and an occasional lonely journalistic voice. For, if the behavior of the administration's chief men is definitely disturbing, the chorus of their journalistic mentors and spokesmen is downright frightening. The administration organ, the Washington Post, cravenly advises the Government to buy off Mao Tse-tung with Formosa. Walter Lippmann and Marquis Childs, Post columnists, warn their friends in the Government to accept Communist command of China as a fait accompli which must on no account be questioned.

True it is that the Post has invariably upheld the liberal abandonment of China, unfailingly sought to shield officials accused of subversion. In the voluminous lexicon of liberal journalism there is no word for treason. It is true also that Mr. Lippmann is an equivocal Mercury and Mr. Childs brings to world problems the dewy ardors of a sociology instructor or a Sri Nehru. Yet these journalists exercise enormous sway in the upper reaches of the administration and, with Drew Pearson and the fratres Alsop, are the chosen instruments through which the propaganda of Secretaries Acheson and Marshall reaches the public.

To top all this, the Alsops recently disclosed a state of mind amongst the administration's leaders so shocking that in ruder times it would have called out the fury of Congress and people. What they noted was the bitter fact that these highest functionaries were hoping that our beachhead in Korea will be untenable. The leading men of our Government, the Alsops were saying, hoped for the defeat, humiliation, and death of our forces and the forcible abandonment of our only position on mainland Asia. How defeatist, we are entitled to ask the President, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Defense, can you get?

There is, of course, a direction to all this scuttle: the unwillingness to free MacArthur to wage war in the enemy's back areas, to take offensive action against Communist China, to arm our long-suffering friends, the Nationalist Chinese; to make the martial Japanese our allies, to face up to our grievous peril and our real opportunities in the Far East. To draw our strength and attention away from the western Pacific, mastery of which contains Soviet power on that flank, shielding Alaska and the homeland, is prima facie in Soviet interest.

The Kremlin knows, if the administration does not, that the loss of the western Pacific would be almost, if not quite, as calamitous for us as the loss of Western Europe. (See Why Stalin Needs Asia in the Freeman of January 22.) What has happened, among other things of lesser import, is that the "liberal" world, to which belong the administration, the British Socialists, Nehru, and much of the seaboard American press, long ago decreed that the Soviet world should have China and be undisturbed in possession. Worse than that in moral terms, under a hypocritical cloak of inconceivable impertinence, the "liberal" world pretended that the welfare of the Chinese masses would be somehow advanced under the murderous Soviet terror.

Where did this "liberal" commitment to Chinese communism cross the line into treason? How near does this corruption reach into the heart of the government? Where in all this sorry situation is the President? It is freely supposed in Washington that Mr. Truman is ruled in matters of high policy by Acheson and Marshall, as in domestic questions such professional "liberals" as Max Lowenthal instruct him. If the protractedly juvenile Louis XIII had his Cardinal Richelieu and Father Joseph, Mr. Truman, it is said, has his eminence rouge in Acheson, his eminence grise in Marshall. The character of Mr. Acheson's "liberal" statesmanship was exhaustively treated in the Freeman of last December 11. The stages by which the President's gray eminence advanced from professional soldier to "liberal" statesman merit an equally close study if he is to remain in public life. (The persistent reports that Marshall is to give up the Defense Department are often coupled with the prediction that the President is to place him in an even more intimate relationship to national policy as his personal chief of staff.)

Although General Marshall's attitudes to the major strategy of World War II earned him the "friendship" of Stalin and Voroshilov (see p. 783, "Roosevelt and Hopkins" by Robert E. Sherwood) and constitute a provocative pattern from the second-front agitation to the prolongation of the Japanese war, it is sufficient unto the day to remember that his postwar mission to China was perhaps the most disastrous piece of diplomacy ever undertaken by an American. When General Marshall went to China the Nationalists (as Maj. Gen. Claire L. Chennault reviewed the situation in his Way of a Fighter) were everywhere victorious and bade fair soon to end Communist military power in China. When General Marshall departed 15 months later, after imposing a truce, opening the Kalgan Pass, denying further military assistance to Chiang Kai-shek and demanding Communist inclusion in the government, it was apparent that the Reds were to have China. While it would be as bizarre to suggest that the general was actuated by improper motives as to accuse a most reverend archbishop of secretly practicing heresy, yet he must bear equally with the President and the red eminence the blame for the Chinese statecraft that has brought us face to face with Soviet power in Asia. If it is our fate to redeem China from Bolshevism, as I believe it to be, how can we ride that river with General Marshall?

Left to himself, Mr. Truman is without doubt as sincere and uncomplicated a patriot as the Midlands produce. Had he more acumen, more familiarity with dialectical mendacity, and greater self assurance in the field of ideas, he might very well have seen through the gigantic "liberal" imposture over China, the hoax of "liberal" agrarianism. The honest Missouri farmer in him, if unnetted in the "liberal" web, would have rooted the potential quislings from his administration and would have been affronted by the infamous Tydings investigation. Such a Truman would not have lost China.

If it is a national misfortune, it is no less a personal tragedy that the epochal issues of these times have been crowded upon Mr. Truman. If no man ever brought fewer gifts to the Presidency, no President ever less sought the office in the first instance. We recall with retrospective pathos the scene at the Chicago convention when, munching a hot dog, the unambitious Senator from Missouri heard with incredulity, aversion and, it may well be, foreboding that he had been chosen to run with the already stricken Roosevelt.

My own recollection goes back to a spring day in 1944 when, at the end of a lengthy private talk with President Roosevelt at the White House, he let it be known by indirection that he would run for a fourth term. His reasons, which strike us with a wry irony these days, were summed up in his candidly avowed belief that no other American was qualified to carry the country through the war and the coming peace. Mr. Roosevelt discoursed upon his own qualifications, his unique familiarity with the conduct of the war, with the great world of international affairs and, owing to frequent visits and many personal friendships there, with Europe. It was no secret that he was contrasting his competence with that of his prospective opponent, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, a rival whom he affected to hold in lighthearted scorn as a young upstart in world matters.

"We can't, you know," Mr. Roosevelt recapitulated, "we really can't have an ignoramus for President."

In his work, "Roosevelt and Hopkins," Mr. Sherwood recalls another painfully prophetic incident of the 1944 campaign. Helping Mr. Roosevelt write a speech, the author proposed that they use a recent observation of Winston Churchill's that the United States now stood "at the highest pinnacle of her power and fame." This the President vetoed, explaining, to Sherwood's mystification, "What Winston says may be true at the moment but I'd hate to say it because we may be headed before very long for the pinnacle of our weakness" (sic). We are all the losers because Mr. Sherwood, as he confesses, improvidently failed to inquire what lay behind the astonishing utterance. Mr. Roosevelt was an extraordinarily complex human being with deep intuitions. Did he at the moment possess second sight? Was he being clairvoyant about the inability of the "liberal" mentality to contain the Soviet menace? Did he apprehend that his own world policy would inevitably plunge us into confusion and decay? In a presentiment of his own approaching death, did he suffer a twinge of compunction over the succession? Or was there perhaps a premonition of the dire consequences recorded in "Lalla Rookh," when

"Treason, like a deadly blight
Comes o'er the councils of the brave
And blasts them in their hour of might?"

Mr. Roosevelt left the American people a number of legacies, among them Mr. Truman. Another is the United Nations, a typically frivolous liberal improvization; a pretentious and, as it now turns out, a dangerous instrumentality of world order foredoomed, as was apparent to any penetrating mind in 1945, by the utter irreconcilability of the two worlds, free and slave. Still another Roosevelt inheritance is the policy of surrender to the Soviet Union in Asia. At Teheran and Yalta the President restored to Stalin what the Czars had lost in 1905, ascendancy in Manchuria.

It is true that Mr. Roosevelt, exemplifying the divorce between rhetoric and reality too frequent in his career, did not intend actually throwing China to the Communist wolves. Sumner Welles, writing in the current Foreign Affairs, quotes him as observing during a pre-Teheran conversation in 1943 that "a stable China, recognized as one of the great powers, would be a barrier to Soviet ambitions in the Far East and serve as a centripetal force in Asia." This would also, Mr. Roosevelt reasoned, be of the "utmost value in limiting the effects of the revolutionary tidal wave already looming in the Far East." If only Roosevelt the strategical thinker, not Roosevelt the suitor for the bloodstained Stalin's good opinion, had prevailed at Teheran and Yalta.

The late President had an easier time of it with his war than Truman with his. The "liberal" Roosevelt could prosecute a wholehearted war to spare the world nazism because "liberalism" single-mindedly hated nazism. The "liberal" Truman finds his reluctant will to wage war on the Bolshevik motherland hampered by all sorts of psychological reservations because toward nazism's hideous parent, bolshevism, the liberal is at least subconsciously of two minds. In practical terms, he thinks himself against bolshevism in Europe, while encouraging it in Asia.

The failure of the liberal to safeguard the towering edifice of the west at this stage is not so much because of vacillation, a crisis of nerves or bewilderment in his choice of values but because, in embracing the welfare state, he is compromised with evil. He has looked upon the face of evil and found it half good. How can he save a truly liberal, fluid, traditional society which he has sworn to destroy from Socialists, no matter how brutish, in whom he finds mirrored his own desire for the all-encompassing state that inevitably consumes the individual? If one fears for his country he scarcely dares contemplate the contrast between the clear-sighted, cunning, and remorseless stratagems of the thuggerei of the Kremlin and the shallow, halfhearted, and ambivalent statecraft of Washington and London.

So it is that at the pinnacle of our weakness so many distressed Americans have come deeply to mistrust their Presidential leadership. The unprecedented volume of their mail since early in December to the White House and the Hill bespeaks their conviction that there is something rotten in Washington. If the intelligentsia is baffled and distraught, the people are not. They are liberals in the old sense. For three and a half centuries they have been operating a welfare society—not a welfare state. If Mr. Truman will forgive a gratuitous piece of advice, it is this: Why not give up the unreliable liberal intellectuals and throw in with the people?

The introspective gray eminence revealed, while launching his Marshall plan at Harvard some time ago, that he was troubled by his reflections on the Peloponnesian wars wherein the democratic Athens went down before the totalitarian Sparta. In his musings on the fate of Athens he must have encountered the brilliant and perfidious Alcibiades, who betrayed his country. May I suggest that a fitter subject for the meditations of an old soldier—and of the President of a country entering a war of hemispheres—is that stern patriot Cato the Elder. If Alcibiades was a liberal, Cato was a Tory. Besides identifying the enemy of his country and his culture, Cato exhibited no patience with the liberal innovations being lugged into his society by the Greeks. (Read Russians for Greeks.) In a time of trouble there is something comfortin,, about the simple patriotism of an upright Tory.

Behind the tumultous verbiage of these days there is one fundamental question for an American to answer: When this war is over do you want the writs to run from Washington, or Moscow, to the ends of the earth? It will be one way or other. The Tory answers that question without hesitation.

It was in the Cato vein that Senator LYNDON JOHNSON (Democrat, Texas) spoke in mid-December in a speech far too little regarded. Senator JOHNSON is chairman of the Military Preparedness Subcommittee. He said:

"Is this the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light before an endless night shall envelop us and all the Western World? That is a question which we still have it in our power to answer. If we delay longer we can expect nothing but darkness and defeat and desolation. If we answer the challenge with courage and confidence, and with the ability of which we are capable, we can, I am sure, triumph over our foes."

At this hour, when we are experiencing history at its most intense, the Congress, on both sides of its aisles, is affording a leadership worthy of its best traditions. If the President cares to turn to and fight a war, he might profitably draw upon that source of strength. Why not draft Senator JOHNSON for Secretary of Defense? And if he wants a Secretary of State who understands the question of Asia, there is Senator PAUL F. DOUGLAS (Democrat, Illinois) who, although a practicing liberal, transcends that aberration when he allows the marine of his World War II days to take possession of him.

Privilege of Statehood Requested by Soldiers From Hawaii on Korean Battle Front

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to present a letter from Maj. Bert N. Nishimura, United States Infantry, that was written late in March while he was serving on the Korean battle front. The author of this letter is a native-born American citizen of the Territory of Hawaii who has served in the Korean action since the outset and also served in World War II.

The letter addressed to "Mrs. President" speaks for itself, and is as follows:

SOMEWHERE IN KOREA.

DEAR MRS. PRESIDENT: The other day a group of us was seated around a hutment stove. We were discussing the inequalities and injustices surrounding some minor military matter. The icy wind sweeping down from the Manchurian wastes and the spasms of homesickness probably accounted for the universal agreement among us warriors now stranded in Korea. All of a sudden someone suggested we write our complaints to our various Congressmen. We thought that a capital idea, so we retired to our corners to begin our epistles.

While mentally arranging my thoughts so that my letter would not sound too incoherent I stumbled upon a gigantic blunder. I had no Congressmen to whom to write.

No Congressman to whom I could address my complaint.

No Congressman who could represent me and my gripes on the Senate or the House floor.

This was catastrophic.

This was more horrible than taxation without representation. This was downright un-American. This was discrimination.

I could write to our honorable Delegate from the Territory, who is a good personal friend, and he could take it to the floor of the House. When it comes time to vote, however, he will have to remain silent. He could tramp the Senate Chambers and speak informally to the elected representatives, but he cannot cast a vote. He can speak. He will be heard. But he cannot vote.

This is the reason I am addressing this letter to you, Mrs. President.

We, who were at Pearl Harbor when the first bombs fell that fateful December morning in 1941 and whose blood flowed red, are Americans who cannot write to our Congressmen because we have none. We who stormed hill 609 at north Africa and were repulsed at Cassino in Italy have no one to vote "aye" or "nay" in the congressional halls of our great Nation. We whose brothers are buried beneath neat white crosses in the National Cemetery at Punchbowl in Hawaii after having fallen forever in the lonely atolls of the Pacific and the wooded hills of France cannot cast a vote to help elect the chosen head of our great Nation.

Our parents came from the far corners of the world—the warm shores of the Azores, the islands of the Philippines, the Continent of China, the dimunitive land of Japan, the mountainous ranges of Korea, and are offsprings of the seekers of liberty from the tyrannies of Europe. We attended the schools of democracy. We early learned to pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States. We swatted a baseball on the diamond, chewed gum, and ate hotdogs in the bleachers, and we raced our hot rods on the streets of our native lands. We bowed our heads in reverent prayer, each free to worships the God of his own choosing. We are Americans, were taught Americanism, and are living as Americans.

In this far-off heretofore little-known peninsula of Korea our men are bearing arms in defense of American principles. The names belonging to these men represent Americans of all racial origins—Thurston, Medeiros, Kealoha, Smith, Torres, Takamura, Wong, Kim, Du Montier, and MacAllister. These men are a United Nations themselves.

Hawaii has been waiting for a long time to attain statehood. America was fighting against the principle of taxation without representation when the Sandwich Islands were discovered by Capt. James Cook in 1778. The traditions of Americanism, brought into the islands by the missionaries in 1820, were nurtured and given meaning in the years that followed. In 1900 the Territory of Hawaii became an integral part of the United States, by choice and election of the people. Fifty years have passed since Hawaii entered into apprenticeship for statehood. During that period two wars have been fought, the second so that nations may be permitted to choose their own form of government without undue influence and interference from without. Now, we are joined with other freedom-loving nations in stopping aggression which threatens to engulf the entire world.

Hawaii has made her choice. Hawaii has indicated her desire to become the forty-ninth State. She has fulfilled her obligations. Her citizens have demonstrated, beyond the shadow of a doubt, their capacity to discharge the full responsibilities of citizenship. They are entitled to the privileges of full membership in the Union of States.

Mrs. President, I could write to the honorable Delegate from Hawaii. He has reiterated these statements so often he knows them by heart. I could write to Mr. President, but he is engulfed with the problems of state, of the world, of civilization. That is why I am addressing this to you.

Write to my Congressman? I cannot. I have none.

As we were discussing, a group of us men now fighting in Korea * * *.

I have forgotten why we were going to write. It has become unimportant now. It is trivial. It has become another passing gripe of a war-weary lad. I was there on December 7. I was there in Italy and in France where I saw my comrades fall. I was there in Japan when the tenets of democracy were being preached during the occupation. Now, I am here in Korea.

Before this is over, may I, will I, have a Congressman to whom I can refer my silly little gripes?

BERT N. NISHIMURA,
Major, Infantry.

The $64 Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the April 23 issue of Freeman:

CAN WE ESCAPE FROM VICTORY
(By William Henry Chamberlin)

It is a fact of tremendous historical irony that America's survival as an independent world power depends on the speed with which it can escape from the consequences of its victory in the late war. This victory has become a trap deadlier than the one which the Chinese Communist troops almost closed around the Marines in the wild hills of North Korea.

Never in history has a great war been fought for so many demonstrable illusions. Never has retribution for succumbing to illusions been so swift and so terrible.

It was an illusion that Chiang Kai-shek was worth backing to the limit against Japan—and not worth raising a finger for when he was threatened by the Kremlin-sponsored Chinese Communists. It was an illusion that these Communists were nice agrarian reformers, Jeffersonian democrats who scarcely knew there was such a place as Moscow. It was an illusion that the totalitarian threat to America could be banished by helping the oldest and largest totalitarian power in the world swell far beyond its legitimate ethnic and historical frontiers.

It was an illusion that a combination of appeasement and personal charm could melt away designs of conquest and domination that were deeply rooted in Russian history and Communist philosophy. It was an illusion to believe that a powerful Soviet Union would play the role of cooperative do-gooder in a shattered and impoverished Eurasia. It was an illusion that a curtain of dollars would be a counterweight to a curtain of iron. It was an illusion to believe that the balance of power could be destroyed in Europe and Asia without setting the stage for world war III.

The fruit that is harvested from seeds of illusion is always bitter. How bitter may be judged by one startling, simple, incontrovertible fact. Only if we succeed in reversing virtually every major aim and decision of Franklin D. Roosevelt, only if we make a rubbish heap of the assumptions of Teheran and Yalta, Cairo and Potsdam, is there a prospect that we may breathe free from the nightmare atmosphere of terror that has descended on us since the Korean debacle.

It has now become a commonplace for men in the highest and most responsible official positions to say that we are in a far more dangerous situation than we were at any time during the Second World War. Winston Churchill recognized this almost 3 years ago when he wrote in the introduction to his memoirs of the war: "We lie in the grip of even worse perils than those we have surmounted." (What a commentary on the hollowness of the victory that was celebrated in 1945.)

During the intervening 3 years the situation of the free world has deteriorated catastrophically. China has been lost to implacably hostile Communist rulers. The Soviet Union has broken the American monopoly of the atomic bomb. The Kremlin has felt strong enough to heat up the cold war appreciably. Until 1950 no army, in the postwar period, had marched across a clearly defined frontier. Soviet methods of aggression had been indirect: The support of an exhausting civil war in Greece, the blockade of the western sectors of Berlin. Along with these active steps went the methodical consolidation of Communist police-state terrorist methods of rule in the East European satellite states and the routine incitation to internal strife, sabotage, and treason in all non-Communist countries.

The Politburo in 1950 felt sufficiently confident to throw first its North Korean satellite, then its Chinese satellite, into open large-scale warfare. No one can know how long it will be before armadas of Soviet airplanes take off on missions of destruction, before Soviet tanks begin to roll into Western Europe, Yugoslavia, Turkey, or Iran. But the breathing space may be uncomfortably short, far shorter than the span of several years which has been comfortably reckoned with by our military and diplomatic planners.

The Korean crisis in a swift blinding flash showed a picture of appalling American national weakness. The greater part of the United States combat army suffered defeat, not at the hands of the Red Army, but from a Soviet dependency with a fraction of Soviet war potential.

By one of the ironies of the calendar the Red Chinese attack on American and other U. N. forces in Korea closely coincided with the ninth anniversary of Pearl Harbor. The toll of casualties was much heavier in Korea than at Pearl Harbor. The speech which Wu Hsiu-chuan delivered at the United Nations simultaneously with the unleashing of the offensive in Korea was more abusive, threatening, and truculent than the Japanese note which was delivered in Washington at the time when Pearl Harbor was bombed. But no Cordell Hull arose to tell him off.

After Pearl Harbor the most severe critics of Roosevelt's foreign policy recognized that there was no alternative except to fight back. The war service of such prominent isolationists as Charles A. Lindbergh, Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Hanford MacNider, and Philip La Follette was outstanding.

But the reaction to Red China's Pearl Harbor was pitiful in its weakness. The United Nations, instead of promptly branding the Peiping regime as an aggressor and a war criminal, devoted all its energy to thinking up schemes of appeasement that could be passed off as something else.

The United States refrained from the most obvious effective measures of self-defense: Bombing of Chinese military, industrial, and communication centers, acceptance of Chinese Nationalist troops as full allies, prompt rearming of the Japanese. If the fiction of Chinese volunteers could be maintained, why not Japanese volunteers on the other side? And Korea is far more essential to the security of Japan than it is to the security of the United States.

Senator TOM CONNALLY, leading the fight to beat down Senator KNOWLAND'S proposal to appropriate funds to aid Chiang Kai-shek, posed the strange question: "Do the Senators want an all-out war with Red China?"

Some of the hard-pressed men on the Hungnam beachhead might be pardoned for asking what the Senator's idea of an all-out war is. If throwing hundreds of thousands of men into a concerted offensive designed to destroy the U. N. forces is not all-out war, words would seem to have lost their meaning.

To appreciate the full measure of United States humiliation, imagine that, after Pearl Harbor, we had pleaded through an intermediary for a cease fire with Japan. Or suppose that Great Britain and France, after the fall of Poland, had asked Hitler for a cease fire. The French had a word for this last suggestion. They called it "le Munich sanglant," the bloody Munich. It is the immense political and moral disaster of a bloody Munich that the United States and the United Nations assumed when they failed to react promptly and decisively to the challenge of the Chinese Communist attack.

The most respectable excuse for this bloody Munich is an ominous confession of weakness in the face of dire peril. It is argued that the bombing of Chinese bases would provoke the intervention of Soviet air and naval forces and perhaps touch off undisguised war with the Soviet Union. Because our battered forces in Korea represent the greater part of our combat army, so the argument runs, we should try to buy time at almost any price. But there is a double edge to this argument.

If we must refrain from normal measures of self-defense in the face of Chinese Communist aggression, for fear of provoking Soviet attack, is not any move calculated to build up American national power likely to provoke such an attack? We have been blackmailed in the Far East. We are being blackmailed in Europe with the threat that the Soviet Union will not tolerate the long overdue rearmament of free Germany. Tomorrow this method of blackmail may be extended to the point of suggesting that any strengthening of our own Armed Forces will be regarded as provocative in the Kremlin and will not be tolerated. Once a nation starts down on the slippery slope of appeasement, or surrender to blackmail, it is hard to know where the process will stop.

The tragic irony of our present plight is that it stems directly from measures which the Roosevelt administration held up as goals of victory, to be achieved by the sacrifice of American blood and treasure. Eight of the more important of these measures, and their consequences, may be summarized briefly as follows:

1. The two chief characteristics of Roosevelt's policy toward Germany were the unconditional surrender slogan and the Morgenthau plan. Design of the first was annihilation of Germany as an independent power. Purpose of the second, even as watered down in the Potsdam Declaration and the early occupation regulations, was the economic strangulation of Germany by the destruction or drastic limitation of many of its important industries. It was assumed also that Germany would be completely and permanently disarmed.

But the conditions of 1950, only 5 years after the Carthaginian peace that was sketched in outline at Potsdam, forced the United States to plead with the Germans to consent to be rearmed, with some restrictions. I have never talked with a military expert who considered Western Europe defensible without the use of German ground forces.

However, after they have seen their military leaders indiscriminately branded as criminals, their war potential systematically destroyed, their country left defenseless, except for a thin screen of occupation troops, the Germans are understandably cool toward the idea of assuming the risks and burdens of rearmament except on a basis of full political and economic equality.

2. Another total victory that has worked out badly is the destruction of the Japanese Empire and of all Japanese armed force. The new Japanese constitution, written in General MacArthur's headquarters and translated back into Japanese, solemnly renounces the use of force in international relations. But so long as this admirable idea is not shared by the masters of the Soviet Union, and of Communist China, east Asia is as indefensible without the participation of Japan as Western Europe is without the full association of Germany.

A Japanese army, keeping the historic watch against Russia on the Yalu or, better yet, on the Amur, would be a godsend to the harassed military planners in the Pentagon today. Had Korea and Formosa been left in some form of association with Japan, with provision for more liberal administration, Japan, checked in its extravagant design of ruling all east Asia, could have resumed its useful role as an element of check and balance against Russian imperialism and Chinese communism. And the United States need never have been sucked into Korea at all.

Our peace plans, in Europe and in Asia, were sadly deficient in the cool horse sense of old-fashioned diplomats like Castlereagh and Metternich and Talleyrand. How these men would have laughed at the naive assumption that nations could be divided into aggressor goats and peace-loving sheep.

3. We are now trying to escape from one of the fundamental principles of the United Nations Charter: The right of any of the Big Five powers to veto enforcement action. It soon became evident that the UN was condemned to futile impotence, because the Soviet veto could be and was used to mask aggression not only by Moscow, but by any of Moscow's satellites.

The most serious move toward checkmating Soviet aggression, the North Atlantic Pact, was made possible only by stretching to the limit elastic article 51 of the Charter, which affirms "the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense." Action by the U. N. in the first phase of the Korean conflict was only possible because of the Soviet boycott of the Security Council at that time. This tactical error probably will not be repeated.

So an escape route from the rigid rules of the charter was provided by the Acheson plan. This permits the Assembly to make recommendations for action against aggression, in the event that the Council is unable to function because of the veto. Here again there is an attempt to get away from a false assumption of Dumbarton Oaks, Yalta, and San Francisco: that the Soviet Union would be a reliable cooperator for peace.

4. The tangled confusion about the disposition of Formosa represents another attempt to escape from an ill-advised wartime decision. Roosevelt, Churchill and Chiang Kai-shek at Cairo in 1943 signed their names to a moralistic declaration that "all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China."

Despite the immense strategic and economic value of Formosa, Truman and Acheson, up to the outbreak of the Korean fighting, professed to feel bound, in the light of the Cairo Declaration, to let the Chinese Reds take over Formosa, if they could launch a successful invasion. This gave Wu Hsiu-chuan one of his best talking points, as one could judge from the amount of space devoted to this subject in his speech before the U. N.

How much better, from the standpoint of American interests, if the Cairo statement had never been made and the disposition of Formosa left over to the conclusion of a peace treaty with Japan. Here again there has been an attempt, although a rather clumsy and half-hearted one, to back away from victory and toss Formosa into the lap of the United Nations.

5. A decision of Yalta and Potsdam which we certainly would wish undone was the arbitrary mutilation of the normal ethnic frontiers both of Poland and of Germany. By annexing the eastern half of Poland and then assigning German territory east of the Oder-Neisse frontier to Poland Stalin acquired several trump cards.

He gave the Polish people, oppressed and pillaged as they are in other respects, a stake in the maintenance of the status quo, for fear of losing the ethnically German lands which were assigned to Poland. And by thrusting some eight million destitute German refugees into bomb-wrecked, overcrowded West Germany the Soviet dictator created an enormous source of chronic social unrest and discontent, a serious handicap for the reconstruction of West Germany.

6. One of the many evil deeds of Yalta, the consequences of which are still plaguing us, was the agreement to hand over to Soviet vengeance Soviet citizens in western zones of occupation. General Vlasov, leader of the strongest anti-Communist movement which developed during the war, was the most conspicuous of many victims of this inhuman policy.

Some students of the Russian problem believe that the best hope of averting a third world war lies in a revolt of the Soviet peoples against their Communist rulers. This hope would be considerably brighter if from the beginning the western powers had given asylum and encouragement to anti-Communist refugees, instead of sending them back to death or concentration camps.

7. Inept negotiating by the late John G. Winant and General Eisenhower's failure to accept Churchill's suggestion and push on to Berlin in the last days of the war led to a most disadvantageous situation for the Western Powers in Berlin. The western sectors of the former German capital are an island in the sea of the surrounding Soviet zone. Both the occupation troops and the German population of west Berlin, which ranged itself courageously on the side of the west during the blockade, could be submerged overnight by a Soviet surprise attack.

8. Spain, from the beginning, was excluded from the United Nations and a Soviet-sponsored resolution in 1946 called for the withdrawal of ambassadors from Madrid. For this discriminatory attitude there was never any basis in morals or expediency.

A United Nations comprehensive enough to include Stalin's Soviet Union could scarcely exclude Franco's dictatorship, which is certainly preferable to a people's democracy on the Polish, Czechoslovak, Bulgarian, Rumanian, Hungarian, or Chinese model. It represents no threat to American security. It has been resolutely and consistently anti-Communist. It disposes of a substantial, if poorly equipped army. It controls one of the most strategic positions on the Continent of Europe.

Yet it is only very recently that the inescapable logic of the cold war has been recognized and that some hesitant, tentative steps have been taken toward including Spain in a European defense picture.

So virtually every assumption on which the war was fought and the peace was shaped has been proved a fraud and a hoax. Almost every major decision taken during and after the war has turned out to be an extremely bad security risk. America's overriding problem today is to escape from the reckless misuse of victory.

One cannot reasonably attribute our present plight to any exceptional cunning of our enemies. The Communist design of world conquest is one of the most open conspiracies in history. How much better our position would be today if the men responsible for guiding our foreign policy during the last decade had believed Lenin when he wrote:

"It is inconceivable that the Soviet Republic should continue to exist for a long period side by side with imperialist states. Ultimately one or the other must conquer. Meanwhile a number of terrible clashes between the Soviet Republic and the bourgeois states are inevitable."

Or Stalin, when he pronounced the dogma:

"It is therefore the essential task of the victorious revolution in one country to develop and support the revolution in others."

Or William Z. Foster, when he told a congressional committee:

"When a Communist heads the Government of the United States (and that day will come just as surely as the sun rises) that government will be not a capitalistic government, but a Soviet government, and behind this government will stand the Red Army to enforce the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Or Mao Tse-tung, when he declared as recently as July 1, 1949:

"To sit on the fence is impossible; a third road does not exist. * * * Not only in China, but also in the world, without exception, one either leans to the side of imperialism or to the side of socialism. Neutrality is a mere camouflage and a third road does not exist."

But during the war and for some time after the war the men in high places in Washington, with a very few honorable exceptions, preferred to hug illusions that were based on a compound of ignorance and wishful thinking. Maybe Lenin and Stalin didn't really mean what they said. Maybe Stalin was at heart an amiable character, handicapped by a somewhat unreasonble Politburo. Maybe the Chinese Communists were not really Communists at all. Maybe.

Then came the brutal shock of Korea. Now we are desperately trying to retreat, to escape from a victory that was so appallingly misused that it was becoming a deadly trap. But will we have time to repair the abysmal follies of Tehran and Cairo, Yalta, and Potsdam? Can we accomplish what the wise old Greeks said was impossible: to make the past as if it had never been?

No one can answer these questions with absolute assurance. But it is an imperative of American national survival to escape as fast as possible from this trap of an abused victory and a bungled peace, to get rid of the evil consequences of Roosevelt's foreign policy as fast as we can.

Toward the end of the Civil War a northern soldier, viewing the tomb of John C. Calhoun in Charleston, observed: "The whole South is the grave of Calhoun."

Perhaps a time will come when historians will write:

"The whole free world, including the United States, became the grave of the disastrous illusions of Franklin D. Roosevelt."

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Who Is Letting Our GI's Down?" written by Erle Cocke, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, and published in the May 1951 issue of the American Legion magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO IS LETTING OUR GI'S DOWN?

(By Erle Cocke, Jr., national commander, the American Legion)

In the light of such distractions as basketball scandals and crime investigations, the public sems to be foregetting that we are engaged in a war. Not a "police action" as certain propagandists would have you believe, but a full-blown, bloody war in which we have a quarter million soldiers committed, and have already suffered close to 60,000 casualties.

Apart from the South Koreans themselves, most of the men fighting this war are Americans. We can kid ourselves all we want about this being a great United Nations offensive, but as usual in these vast international projects it's the American people who are carrying the burden, and, South Koreans again excepted, it's our boys who are doing most of the fighting and dying. I know because I've just seen much of the Korean battle front.

I've found out something else. The men overseas are beginning to get the idea that someone or something is selling them out. They feel they've been forced out on a limb and the limb is being sawed off.

KILL OR BE KILLED

Contrary to the notions of some of our heavy thinkers safe in the States, our men in Korea do know why they are fighting. In fact, they know it a lot better than some of our self-styled intellectuals at home. Since it is a matter of "kill or be killed," they are fighting for their lives. It's just as simple as that.

In this respect they're one up on the confused thinkers safe in the United States who are still arguing that we ought to give the murdering Chinese Reds a place in the United Nations, and who deplore any attempts made to curb the activities of traitorous Communists within our midst. Those stateside experts safe at home can't grasp the obvious fact that the Communist is out to kill Americans, individually and collectively. The GI has learned this the hard way.

The GI is a step ahead of these people in another way. Knowing that you can't argue with a Communist, and being well aware of the treachery of Reds generally, he is disgusted that so many of our leaders have permitted themselves and this mighty Nation of ours to be tied down by parliamentary Lilliputians in the United Nations.

Our present-day Benedict Arnolds may glibly argue that it is necessary to keep Chiang and his armies blockaded on Formosa, but these arguments make no sense to our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines who have to do the fighting and dying. They see in Chiang's vast armies a way of saving some of the 250 American lives that are being needlessly sacrificed each week because certain furtive people expound that Chiang isn't the right sort of person, and therefore we cannot accept his aid. Our fighting men are not impressed by these false prophets because they haven't forgotten that these same people not long ago were lauding Mao's murdering hordes as "agrarian reformers."

For the life of them—and life is meant in a very literal sense—they can't understand why our State Department and the United Nations make it necessary for them to be slaughtered by Red armies which swarm down on them from territory which our own heads of Government make sacrosanct. Our fighting men have the simple idea that in wartime when the enemy tries to kill you, you are entitled to pursue him till you've caught him and done away with him. The influential meddlers who keep maneuvering our men into untenable positions don't seem to understand this, possibly because they've never been required to face danger themselves. To them, this sort of impasse is something to be placed on the agenda of the United Nations, to be argued at leisure in comfortable surroundings.

Agents of the Kremlin, sitting in the councils of the United Nations, in Washington and elsewhere, must laugh up their sleeves at our utter idiocy. But you may be sure that our GI's are not amused. They see the picture as clearly as the Soviet agents do, but, unlike our stateside leaders, they see the results of this criminal skullduggery in the blood they shed and in the mangled corpses of their buddies.

What they cannot understand, though, is the strange apathy of the people back home. As they listen to radio reports of what is happening thousands of miles to the east of them, they are puzzled. Isn't the American public aware of what is going on? Don't they realize that their sons and husbands and sweethearts are fighting a ruthless enemy who has them at a terrible disadvantage, thanks to stupid or traitorous advisers and inept diplomacy?

MUST SHAKE OFF APATHY

In Korea I saw many caskets, waiting to be moved on the first lap of the long voyage home. Is this the only thing that will awaken America? Do thousands more boys have to lay down their lives needlessly, before an aroused public demands that our fighting men be given an even break?

It is high time that all America snapped out of its apathy. Certainly, it is deplorable that crooks are bribing basketball players; no one one wants to take the public's attention away from grafting politicians and syndicates of gangsters; and let's not overlook transactions involving pastel mink coats and fancy fees for influence. But let us not be diverted from the fact that our No. 1 problem today is a struggle for our existence.

Let's simplify it so we won't continue to be mixed up by those masters of confusion who got us into this mess. Regardless of diplomatic niceties, we are at war with Soviet Russia. The simple and undeniable proof of this is that the Kremlin could stop this bloodletting tomorrow, if it so desired. Russia is using the Chinese, the North Koreans, and others to do her fighting for her. In our own United States Stalin has thousands of stooges doing his bidding. These people are working as diligently for the murderers of the Kremlin as any units of the Red Army or the Soviet secret police.

Aiding these unspeakable traitors is a much larger group. Some of them are almost but not quite full-fledged Communists; others are poor, deluded people who fancy themselves as intellectuals, liberals, or what have you. Some of these characters maintain that they abhor communism, but by their confused thinking and acting they serve as the Communists' best friends. Indeed, in some ways they are even more dangerous than admitted Communists since at least we know where the Communists stand.

These are the people--the avowed Communists and their feather-headed friends—who have got us into the most dangerous predicament in the Nation's history. And not only have they got us into jeopardy, they keep making our position worse. Now anyone can understand why the out-and-out Communists do this—whether they be Mao's brutal "agrarian reformers" or the traitors who call themselves American Communists. But what few Americans can understand is why people who presumably are not Communists continue to peddle a line that has proved disastrous, and has sent thousands of Americans to their deaths. It is even harder to understand these people when it is considered that they have worked themselves up to high positions in Government, teach in our great universities, write for important publications, and have the facilities of great radio networks at their disposal.

CONFUSED THINKING

It would be foolish to say that all or even most of these people are Communists. But it would be equally fallacious to believe that, because they are burdened with Phi Beta Kappa keys and academic honors, they are equally loaded with honesty or common sense. In many cases they are befuddled folk who are educated far beyond their capacity, but they are looked up to as "experts" and "advisers" by others who should know better. In some cases these people have a fuzzy notion that the world's problems will be solved if we scrap our own system of government and turn ourselves over to an all-powerful world government. Others feel that we can make some sort of deal with Stalin, if only we let him have his way. Still others, and there is quite a school of this thought, are convinced that we should defer to the British Foreign Office in our dealings abroad, and ought to ape the British by establishing a socialistic government at home.

The best you can say for such people as this is that their patriotism is of a negative nature.

Years ago, in the time of our Revolution, another American gave his allegiance to a country overseas. The name of that man, Benedict Arnold, is now reviled and scorned by American patriots. But today, there are many among us who have injured this country far more than Benedict Arnold, and from segments of the soft-headed public these traitors actually get ovations when they make a smirking appearance before the very people they've sold out.

EXPOSE FALSE PROPHETS

Curiously, the mental make-up of such sell-out artists is such that they will never concede that they were wrong. So they keep bulling their way through, shamelessly trying to explain the unexplainable. But after all, it isn't their neck. Let more thousands of American soldiers, sailors and marines be sacrificed, so long as the ego of these unspeakable characters is not damaged.

Since these people haven't the sense or the grace to stop their meddling, I call on Americans generally to demand that they be thrown out of any place where they can exert any further influence on the conduct of the war. If they are in Government, or if they are still advising those in Government, the public must raise such an outcry that even the most apathetic politicians will have to take action to break their death-grip on their jobs. If they are poisoning the press, the speakers' platform or the airwaves, they must at the least be answered, point for point, and those responsible for giving such people a forum must be held strictly accountable by the American people. The time is long since past when we can afford the luxury of listening to false prophets, fools or traitors.

The GI has been let down not just by those characters in high places, but by all the rest of us who have tolerated them and permitted them to become powerful. Now it is up to us. It is time to let the war be fought by our military people, not by politicians in Washington or the United Nations, or by others who have axes to grind and influence enough to get themselves an audience.

If we can keep these erstwhile experts out of the present war long enough for the United States to win it, we can consider ourselves lucky. That's the first job we have to tackle here at home. I can assure you that our military leaders know their job, and so long as they are allowed to fight the war without restrictions imposed by stupid people, traitors or politicians, they'll do all right. Further, they'll do the job with the least cost in American lives.

But so long as the stateside busybodies continue their meddling, the best we can expect is a stalemate. Maybe, for reasons of their own, our busybodies want it that way. But patriotic Americans ought to begin asking themselves what about it. Their sons and brothers in Korea are certainly asking themselves a lot of questions, and I for one would not want to have to answer to them at some future date.

Symington: A Faithful Public Servant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, in these days of bitter controversy, it is heartwarming to see the services of a good and faithful public servant recognized. I believe the appointment of W. Stuart Symington to head the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is such recognition of faithfulness, ability, and loyalty to the Nation.

Mr. Symington is a man of great personal integrity and unchallenged ability. His appointment is a guaranty that the tasks of the RFC will be carried out in the light of the highest public interest.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks, the following editorial from the Daily Metal Reporter of April 20, 1951:

SYMINGTON'S APPOINTMENT TO RFC AN EXCELLENT CHOICE

President Truman's appointment of W. Stuart Symington to head the Reconstruction Finance Corporation comes like a breath of spring into an atmosphere where the air has been none too pleasant or too healthy.

Symington's personal integrity, his keen business acumen, his record of achievements in the other executive positions that he has held in the Federal Government, have gained for him the admiration, the respect, and the confidence of businessmen, Congressmen, and Senators, irrespective of their political leanings. One thing is certain, that with Symington as the head, there will be no scandals in the RFC and the agency will function as a well organized and efficient business enterpise should.

One of Symington's greatest assets is that he has never curried political favor. Consequently he is under no obligations to return such favors. He has not sought office as a means of personal gain. On the contrary, during the years that he has held public office, he has made great personal sacrifices, and he has done so because of his strong sense of duty and patriotism. That Symington did not seek the new post to which President Truman has appointed him, is evident from his letter of acceptance in which he said that it has been his personal desire since 1949 to return to private life. However, "because of the grave world situation," he wrote the President, "if you believe I can serve you and the country in this new position, I would be most honored to accept the appointment."

If the public's confidence is to be restored in the RFC, if this agency is to render the services for which it was originally created, there is no one better qualified to be its chief than Mr. Symington. His appointment to the job is a natural. Before entering the Government's service, he was a successful manufacturer in St. Louis. As head of the War Assets Administration following World War II, as Secretary of the Air Force, and as Chairman of the National Securities Resources Board, he established and enviable record for himself and the departments he headed. Being a man of vision, a great organizer and as a practical businessman, he insists on all the facts before reaching a decision, and then stands ready to face anyone who may challenge his decision. He has done this in the past and he may be counted on doing so again in his new job.

Because the RFC has been mismanaged in the past is no reason for believing that it has outlived its usefulness. Symington is the man to breathe new life into the agency and make it a vital force in the economy of the Nation. The President is to be congratulated on his selection.

The Defense Production Act and Farm Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the challenge to city consumers in food prices rising higher than prices generally is a real one. The prospective reenactment of the Defense Production Act must, if it be realistic, deal with this question. When the act was first considered, I sought to amend the very section which gave special consideration to agricultural commodities in the knowledge that the city consumers were bound to face food prices rising more than the general average as a result.

I hope very much that it will be possible to find a suitable solution which will not have a disastrous effect on the long-standing agricultural policy of our country and at the same time be cognizant of the fundamental problem of the families with moderate incomes who live in the cities.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorials from the New York Times on the subject:

[From the New York Times of April 19, 1951]

NO ROOF FOR FARM PRICES

Officials of the National Farmers Union have announced their opposition to any change in the Defense Production Act which would place farm prices on the same basis as others for purposes of over-all price control. Headed by James G. Patton, their president, these officials called at the White House and urged Mr. Truman to continue the provision in the emergency law which exempts farm commodities from ceilings if they are selling below either parity or the level prevailing just before Korea.

The arguments advanced by the Patton group, like most of those put forward to justify this inexcusable provision of the law, virtually answer themselves. "The freezing of farmers at subparity income levels," declared Mr. Patton, "might very easily make it impossible for them to produce needed increases in food and fiber supplies." Taking farm prices as a whole, there is nothing that is subparity about them. On the basis of 1910–14 as 100, farm prices in the aggregate had a purchasing power ratio in March of this year of 111.

In terms of comparative income the farmer is even better off. Mr. Patton points out that the net income of farm operators declined from $17,800,000,000 in 1947 to $13,000,000,000 in 1950. But in 1947 the head of the farmers union has, of course, selected a completely abnormal year. It was a year in which no more expansibility was left on the supply side in agriculture and when heavy domestic demands coincided with correspondingly heavy postwar relief demands from the rest of the world. We can best get a measure of the abnormality of 1947 by noting that the $17,800,000,000 net farm income figure to which Mr. Patton refers represented an increase of practically 300 percent over the last prewar year, 1940. In the same period, by comparison, the total national income rose by only 144 percent.

What Mr. Patton is arguing for is not parity of farm prices and farm income as a whole, but a guarantee of parity for each and every farm commodity before it becomes subject to the general application of the law. This attempt to extend the parity concept under cover of the defense emergency suffers from two transparent weaknesses. In the first place, its advocates, while urging parity for commodities selling below that figure, ignore the logical sequel of that proposal, which would be to demand a roll-back to parity of those commodities selling above parity. But even more important is the fact that this proposal ignores the whole function of price freezing, which is to break the continuity of the spiral of prices and wages. Obviously no such effect can be achieved by halting the rise in half the prices in the country while permitting the other half to continue their advance.

[From the New York Times of April 25, 1951]

THE FARM BLOC'S TURN

When does the taxpayer's turn come to stage a demonstration in Washington and threaten a walkout on the defense effort?

Union leaders—the United Labor Policy Committee—put on such a show 2 months ago, and it has paid off handsomely. Now the farm bloc in Congress apparently has decided that if a demonstration such as labor's can pay such a quick dividend it would be a good idea to put on a show of its own. The House Committee on Agriculture, therefore, has opened hearings which feature a parade of witnesses testifying in favor of that section of the Defense Production Act which provides that farm commodities be specifically exempted from the treatment accorded commodities in general under price controls.

Two things are especially worth noting about these hearings before the Agriculture Committee. The first is that they have no legislative function. They are strictly in the nature of a show. In an opening statement Representative HAROLD D. COOLEY, Democrat of North Carolina, said that they had been prompted by "an avalanche of propaganda in the press and radio to the effect that farm prices are responsible for the unreasonable increase in the cost of living."

The second point is that the administration itself has provided the principal performer in this publicity performance in the person of the Secretary of Agriculture—and this despite reports that the President is going to send a message to Congress today on the subject of farm prices. Mr. Brannan was the first witness called by the committee, and he offered statistical support for the farm bloc's thesis.

Mr. Brannan's statistics add nothing to the controversy except to show that one can prove anything with figures if he is permitted to choose his own points of reference. When it is set up the parity concept Congress chose as normal, the period 1910–14, although the country had never in its history up to that time enjoyed any other 5-year period comparable pricewise to this, the golden era of American agriculture. Now, however, Mr. Brannan has decided that 1947, the peak of the explosive inflation that followed the war, was the real normal. Which is like saying that prices on the New York stock exchange were normal in the late summer of 1929.

In any event, the issue here is not a matter of statistics. It concerns the simple question of whether all prices are to be frozen under the defense emergency laws or all prices except farm prices, and it concerns the equally simple question of whom the administration represents in this inflation debate—the farm bloc or the Nation as a whole.

The Great Debate of MacArthur Versus the Constitution Continues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that few Members of the Congress missed the sparkling editorial in the New York Herald Tribune dated today, April 26; but to make sure that it has the full circulation of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I include the editorial, under leave, as a part of my remarks. I wish to emphasize that the Herald Tribune is a genuinely Republican newspaper, brilliantly edited, and reflecting the virtues of contemporary journalism and, if such there be, of the Republican Party.

The text of the editorial follows:

INDIRECT DISCOURSE

Since the President has a two-star general installed as military aide in the White House, it is perhaps natural that MacArthur should have installed a two-star general of his own to operate from the publicity office of the Waldorf-Astoria. Apparently, Major General Vaughan is more often seen than heard; Major General Whitney, on the other hand, is heard thunderously by millions who do not see him. It is still doubtful whether one officer is any more of an asset to his chieftain than the other.

While Olympian silence has reigned on the Waldorf's thirty-seventh floor, General Whitney, busily functioning as oracle in the publicity office, has been getting the foot in the mouthpiece with singular regularity. In a press statement on Saturday, insisting that to foresee Red China's intervention last fall was "quite beyond the reach of General MacArthur's field intelligence," he cut the ground from under MacArthur's present contention that the Soviet Union will not intervene—a similarly political matter which must equally be beyond reach of MacArthur's information and responsibility. At Monday's press conference, the Whitney pronouncement that MacArthur had not the faintest idea of why he was relieved could serve only to put MacArthur in a ridiculous position. The Tuesday press conference not only brought the evasion of a question on the ground that "I am not going to expose General MacArthur's hand in its entirety"—with its inept implication that the general is engaged in some kind of hidden game or intrigue—but also the citation of the Biblical passage on Christ's reply to the doubting Thomas, which suggests implications so extraordinary that one hesitates to pursue the subject further.

In the far depths of the Pacific, the official spokesman, informed sources, authoritative quarters, were doubtless convenient media of contact between the general and his public. Here, in the rough-and-tumble of American public life, where the people are accustomed to get their leadership at first hand, one suspects that the general himself will soon come to question their utility. General Whitney's press conference yesterday seemed somewhat subdued.

LETTER TO MY CONSTITUENTS

Mr. Speaker, I am including also the rough draft of the letter I propose to send to my constituents who wrote to me on the subject of the great debate between General MacArthur and the Constitution. I include this, not out of vainglory, but at the urging of a highly placed official who felt, and very kindly said, that the message, subject as it is to final revision and condensation, was worthy of wider circulation than in the Nineteenth District of New York. I do want to be explicit in saying that before this letter actually goes in the mail it will be shorter and smoother.

With that qualification, the letter follows:

DEAR FRIEND: You are one of hundreds of residents of the Nineteenth Congressional District of New York who wrote to me regarding the relief of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur from his commands in the far-eastern theater of operations.

To those of you who approved of the President's wise, decisive, and courageous action in removing General MacArthur before he had done any further damage, I offer my congratulations. You demonstrated a sturdy devotion to the democratic principles of representative government; you showed your immunity to the temptation to follow the glamorous but false political gods of military dictatorship.

To those of you who wrote to me in support of General MacArthur, I speak in sorrow and disappointment.

I hope that you will review your words. I hope you will consider carefully and decide in mature deliberation if you really are ready to desert the Constitution of the United States and the democracy we all profess to love and defend.

Above all, I hope that you will think long and carefully of what it would mean to precipitate an offensive war against Communist China or Soviet Russia, or both. We are 150,000,000 people, already beginning to run short of our once bountiful supplies of natural resources.

Of our allies, we could scarcely count firmly on the support of more than an equal number of productive individuals, and somewhat less than an equal amount of natural resources and manufacturing facilities. We would be pitted against a foe capable of mustering 750,000,000 people, and deficient only in technological facilities.

That would mean unending years of total warfare, in which we would serve nothing but the war machinery. Our material comfort, our liberties, our politics, our religion would be sacrificed to destruction; our young men and young women would be under arms; our farms and factories would be manned by the very young and the very old; our toll of dead and wounded would be heartbreaking and suicidal.

General MacArthur's real accomplishments in a lifetime of military service speak for themselves; he needs no deification now, for he has proved himself an able soldier and an able administrator.

When, however, he arrogates to himself powers of policy making which are reserved by the Constitution to the responsible elected officials of our Federal Government—the President and the Congress—and to the President's Secretary of State and Secretary of Defense; and when, not content with this assumption of authority he openly flouts the directives of his Commander in Chief, his usefulness has ceased and he has laid himself open to suspicions of insubordination and disloyalty.

There are certain facts which must be remembered in attempting to judge the farflung struggle of the Western World for the minds of men.

The first fact is that this is the year 1951; for better or for worse, we cannot turn back the clock, nor can the United States evade the responsibilities and duties which accompany power and authority.

The second fact is that we are governed by a written Constitution which has guarded us against civil or military tyranny over a period of nearly two centuries; and the constitutional reservations have been strengthened by statutory enactments. The struggle for freedom can never end, for when there is no conflict there is no freedom.

The third fact is that the free world is fighting every kind of political enslavement. It is as pointless to oppose the authoritarianism of communism and accept fascism (by any name) as to fight fascism and accept communism. Ideological chains of political or economic slavery are made no lighter by changing their names.

The wisdom, the propriety, and the necessity of President Truman's action are attested by the approval of the world's greatest leaders in every field: by prime ministers of other countries, by national delegations to the United Nations, by the Pope, by our own most distinguished national leaders, and great independent newspapers.

I am certain that upon mature reflection those of you who have offered support to General MacArthur in terms running all the way from mild criticism of the administration to vicious and libelous attacks on President Truman, Secretary Marshall, and Secretary Acheson will realize that no other course lay open to the President as far as General MacArthur's overt actions were concerned.

This does not by any means close debate on the foreign policies of the United States. These issues are and must be open to unending review and debate. Of all the alternatives which our Government might choose, it seems to me, on the record, it has followed that which is most realistic and tenable in Asia. I continue critical of the appeasement of fascism in Europe and Africa.

I hope you will always feel free to write to me on any subject relevant to the public business. When I am forced to use a form letter, bear in mind it is only so that I can carry on the duties you have given me, and that I read your letters with attention and with gratitude for giving me the benefit of your views.

Fruits of "Unity"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD an article by Garet Garrett, Fruits of "Unity," which appeared in the January 22 issue of the Freeman:

FRUITS OF "UNITY"
(By Garet Garrett)

"Let there be unity," says the voice of panic. "In unity there is strength." But there is the voice of danger saying, "Many are the strong that have perished before us. There may be unity for national suicide."

Unity has no gift of seeing. It may be blind. It has no wisdom in itself. It may be both valorous and stupid.

We have had unity, seldom entire, of course, but to a degree never before imagined in a democratic republic. There was unity enough for measures short of war, reinforced by the image of Hitler stepping across the Atlantic to conquer the Americans, although as it turned out he could not pass 30 miles of English Channel to finish the British when they were prone after Dunkerque.

Then for fear of disunity there was complete unity for the war itself. And whatever may have been one's suppressed thoughts at the time, or the afterthoughts since of revisionists like Beard, victory was its own justification. It was much more than physical victory. The torch of civilization had passed to the hands of a romantic people who dreamed of universal peace and brotherhood and wanted nothing else for themselves from their day at Armageddon.

At the end of the war the United States was incomparably the great military, economic, and moral power in the world. Its word was final. It had only to say no, and there could not take place anywhere in the earth an act of aggression. To whatever it said yes, that was a gilded thing and people held forth their hands to receive it, unable at first to comprehend such generosity and yet in a little while taking it for granted and demanding it as a right, because the Americans were so rich, the British Socialists saying that as capitalists the Americans were under a necessity to give their surplus away to save themselves from drowning in it. Reporting to the President in 1945 the Chief of Staff said: "The security of the United States now is in our own hands."

How long ago was that? Five years.

Has it been for want of unity that in 5 years we have lost not only our authority in the world but control of our own destiny? Has it been for want of unity that terror now gripes the entrails of our cities, fear is the theme of Government propaganda, and we talk of survival?

Think back a little. Was it in the first place for fear of disunity that Roosevelt reversed American foreign policy and recognized the Soviet dictatorship, and then permitted Stalin's agents to create cells of treason in the executive agencies of Government? That was in time of what we believed to be peace, and although it was very embarrassing when Stalin went over to Hitler, his agents nevertheless continued to sit in the councils of American Government, up to policy-making levels. All embarrassment ceased when Hitler turned on the Russians. Then Stalin became our preferred ally, with priorities in lend-lease dictated by Harry Hopkins, who, in the words of President Roosevelt, got along with Stalin like a house afire. Those who knew better wrote books about it afterward, but while it was going on there was silent unity. To criticize Stalin was an offense against unity.

So then later it was not want of unity that obliged the Roosevelt government, nor the Truman government that succeeded it, to embrace Stalin as a peace-loving collaborator in the postwar world, to betray into his hands our ally China, to give him all that part of Europe that lies now behind the iron curtain, and to put the American neck into a noose at Berlin. For 2 years more Stalin was Mr. Truman's good old Joe, who sometimes behaved badly because he was the prisoner of wicked men in the Kremlin; and as for Stalin's agents in the executive agencies of Government, people who kept talking about that were hysterical, to say the least of them, and at the worst they were enemies of unity and played a game with red herrings. He was not worried about communism. Let nobody else worry about it.

Since there was nothing to worry about, it would be safe to disembowel the Military Establishment, which was done, to make more funds for the welfare state. The Navy went into mothballs, the Army was demobilized, the Air Force was wrecked—and there was unity for all of that.

Then Mr. Truman's official economic advisers turned the people's attention to the fascinating bauble of perpetual boom, to be maintained by scientific inflation; and there was unity for that.

Meanwhile our efforts to save Europe from chaos had been frustrated. The Socialist Government of Great Britain had devoured a loan of $4,000,000,000, with no benefit but an increase of appetite. It was perhaps wrong to try doing this thing piecemeal. So the Truman government invented the Marshall plan to do it all at once. If the countries of Europe would get together, add up their estimated deficits for a series of years, and send us the bill, we would pay it.

And in this at first there was no thought of filling peoples' bellies to keep them from going Communist. That came later. At first Russia was expected to come in, like everybody else; she was invited. But the Kremlin declined to come in and forbade her satellites to come in, for no reason given at the time.

For all of that there was unity. We lived with the hynotic fiction that the conduct of American affairs abroad was above politics. Was there not a bipartisan foreign policy?

Thus the country was conditioned and prepared to lose the cold war. Although we did not know it, the cold war was already lost when in 1947 the Truman doctrine was announced, by the President alone. The immediate occasion for it was that the British Government had suddenly thrown Greece in our lap, fairly sure that we would not let it roll on the floor. And they were right. This might have been handled as a limited commitment to help Greece repel Communist aggression, and it might have included also Turkey; but no. It had to be done with a grand gesture. It had to be something bold and brave, and something at the same time that would shrewdly serve a political end. Apparently by that time Mr. Truman had become aware of Communist aggression in the world as a fact; but that was not all. He was aware also that softness toward Soviet Russia had become a serious political liability. Now, therefore, he would do it properly. That is how it happened that what might have been a limited adventure in the Mediterranean world came to be clothed in the Truman doctrine.

In his message to Congress asking for the means to aid Greece and Turkey he declared that the United States hereafter would act to stop totalitarian aggression anywhere in the world. He did not explicitly say Russian aggression, but there was no mistaking what he meant; there was no other kind of aggression to stop.

Well, there was unity for the Truman doctrine, too. Its terrific total implications were almost entirely ignored. Mr. Truman himself could hardly have been aware of them. One of the few who saw them clearly was Dr. Virgil Jordan. This, he said, was in fact a declaration of war upon Soviet Russia. The Russians would so understand it. Therefore, go on with it. Say to the Russians, "You go home, and we will come home and let people alone"—and say it at once while we still had sole possession of the atomic bomb. He said these things before a dinner of distinguished persons at the Waldorf, and his words were received with horrified and unbelieving silence.

The consequences of the Truman doctrine were these:

1. For the first time in history a sane nation had assumed unlimited political, economic, and military obligations in the world—and it had done this with no premeditation whatever and no appraisal of the possible cost in terms of its own resources. However, if you ask, "How shall you weigh your resources against an unlimited liability?" the answer is that you cannot do it. And that's the point.

2. In a world at war, or about to be at war, a nation had abolished its frontiers—for if you are going to stop aggression everywhere, where is your frontier?

3. We had thrown away the first prerogative of a militant nation, which is to choose its battleground—to say where, when, and on what terms it will fight. The power of initiative was delivered to the enemy. The aggressor would be able to name the time, the place, and the conditions, as we were to find out later to our sorrow.

4. The Atlantic Pact, by which we undertake to put both equipment and fighting manpower into Western Europe for the defense of countries that have not really made up their minds to defend themselves, and might sooner appease the Russians than become the battleground of a Russo-American war.

Our one incurable weakness is manpower. We are only 150,000,000 people. We are 100,000,000 fewer than the combined people of those European countries that expect us to defend them against the Russians. Therefore, as any tenth-grade boy would know, we should avoid meeting Stalin's Asian and Eurasian hordes on the ground. Nevertheless, at last the Truman government was maneuvered into accepting war on the worst terrain in the world—as in the tube of a funnel, with the Chinese hordes pouring themselves in at the top.

As we may now recall, there was unity behind Mr. Truman when he made the decision to enter Korea. He expected the country to be thrilled, and it was. The decision was consistent with the Truman doctrine, morally obligatory thereunder; but people were as vague about what it was going to mean as Mr. Truman was, or as they had been about the implications of the Truman doctrine in the first place.

What Mr. Truman thought was going to be a "police action" turned into a war that in 6 months had already cost us half as much as the cost of our total exertions in World War I; it turned into a war that dangerously stripped the home base of its defenses, leaving the country, in the words of Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, without the strength to defend itself against attack; a war in which we found ourselves swapping American lives for Asiatic lives; precisely the kind of war we could never win, said Hanson W. Baldwin—"a land struggle on the Asiatic Continent in a theater where no decision is possible against the hordes of Asia."

The enemy had picked the place, had chosen his own time, had named the conditions.

Now mobilization: There must be unity for that. Certainly there will be unity for that. It is the sequel, and imperative. And yet the people may be permitted to ask, What is this mobilization for? The President says it is in order "that the full moral and material strength of the Nation may be readied for the dangers which threaten us."

Everybody perceives the dangers that threaten us, including one that Mr. Truman cannot see, namely, the self-admiring, grimacing incompetence of that same leadership which has cost us the world and our authority in it, which has involved us in these perils, which continues never to doubt its own rightwiseness, and still demands of the people unity.

How shall these dangers be met? It is no answer to say, as Mr. Truman says, that we must make ourselves strong enough to meet them. Five years ago we were strong enough. As we build up our military strength again, what shall we do with it? Mr. Truman does not say. So far as the people know, there is no plan. Therefore, they are asking: Shall we go on in Asia, swapping American for Asiatic lives; and if so, to where? Shall we come home; and if so, to what? Shall we forget Asia, or appease the enemy there, and put our strength in Europe, as the Europeans say we should, trusting that if it comes to final war with Russia our boughten European allies will not go out from under us?

In any event, how shall this country recover the power of initiative, so that it will be able to say where and when and whom it will fight? Is there a plan for doing that? If we cannot do that, then we shall not get back control of our own destiny. The Kremlin will deploy our manpower and dispose of our resources; the Kremlin will determine the size of our military budget and the condition of our internal economy.

We know the taste of humiliation. It is strange and exceedingly bitter. But worse than anything else that has happened to us is something that now we are doing to ourselves. We are talking of survival. A nation with a world of its own, supreme custodian of a hemisphere embraced by oceans, having an industrial power of its own roughly equal to that of all other peoples combined, so rich that the next richest country is by comparison poor—that Nation talks of survival.

A Senator asks: "Is this the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light before an endless night shall envelop us and all the Western World?" These sickly words, hag-ridden by fear, so perfectly expressed the mood of the Senate that everybody forgot how they would sound, echoing around the world, in the ears of both our allies and the enemy.

Survival is a false and craven word. There may be many questions in the crucible but survival is not one of them, except we put it there ourselves. This Nation, said Lincoln, must endure forever unless it commits suicide.

Let the supreme question be one of alternatives, such as, for example, the alternative to create in this hemisphere a military power the like of which the world has never seen—dedicated to American defense, with assistance only to other nations who may be going our way, and only to these upon lines definitely demarked, which we mean to hold by our own strength.

The strength of a giant is in his own loins. Yet the mightiest giant may be bled to death by many unrequited wounds, not one of which by itself would be mortal. This American giant, for all his wonderful armor, may be dangerously tied by Asiatics who climb on his tanks and tear at the doors with their bare hands. He may be bled in another way by allies who take more than they give and want even more. He has already wasted more blood than he could afford to lose by walking backward into traps and fighting the bear where the bear is not.

The compulsion to this folly is the tragic theme song of our foreign policy. Everywhere we must go on doing it, and in order that we may go on doing it we must make blood faster and faster.

If only we were trading blood with the enemy, that would make a kind of heroic sense. But the enemy, with much more blood to spare than we have, is saving it. Fighting the enemy in Asia, we kill Koreans and Chinese—no Russians. As we help the French fight him in Indochina, or the British to fight him in Malaya, we help them to kill natives—no Russians. Recently the country shuddered at the thought that to meet a Russian-prepared Communist demonstration in Berlin we might be obliged to kill teen-age Germans. Again, no Russians. What did the Berlin air lift cost the Russians? Nothing. In 6 months the war in Korea cost us more than $10,000,000,000. What did it cost the Russians?

Even yet we but dimly comprehend the nature of the intelligence that is acting against us. It is perhaps the first absolutely free principle of evil that was ever set free in the world—free because it is bound by nothing, not by its word, not by conscience, not by its own people, not by any moral sense whatever, not by its own ideology, which is a weapon, nor by superstitions such as did once somewhat restrain the barbaric horde. This intelligence has outthought us, outwitted us, outmaneuvered us, in both diplomacy and battle. With Machiavellian cynicism it has exploited our fundamental faith in the decency of all people.

Yet voices are heard among us intoning the intellectual idiocy that this is a struggle for the heart and mind of mankind. There is an ancient proverb which says that people may be so stupid as to baffle their own gods.

The Court Rules on the Loyalty Oath

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the California State District Court of Appeals has found unconstitutional the so-called anti-Communist affirmation required by the University of California regents.

The order of the regents of the University of California requiring members of the faculty to take an oath or make an affirmation that they were not connected with Communist Party or Communist-front organizations rocked the State of California.

I think the Alameda Times-Star editorial is an excellent one and expresses the thought of a great number of the people of California. The editorial follows:

THE COURT RULES ON THE LOYALTY OATH

It is a pleasure to see that the State district court of appeals has found unconstitutional the so-called anti-Communist affirmation, required by the University of California regents.

Wholly aside from the matters of academic rights, constitutionality and allied questions, the ruling is important because it strikes hard at the affirmation which would have been of direct benefit to any Communists who wished to infiltrate the university.

Though it has been said countless times by this paper and many others, we say again that a prime weapon of the Communists is the lie. It is a mandatory weapon or instrument for them whenever the situation demands. And when they can lie under oath it is all the better in their eyes for the simple reason that a lie under oath is obviously an egregious lie and, because of the conditions surrounding it—the solemnity and all—it is consequently much more likely to go undetected.

But the ruling of the court yesterday will unfortunately not be enough. The matter may very well go to the State supreme court.

And even if that body upholds the lower court, there is still the matter of the constitutional amendment demanding a loyalty oath which has been passed by the legislature for submission to the voters in the general election of 1952.

Don't Throw the Baby Out With the Bath Water

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following pamphlet on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation:

THE RFC MAKES MONEY

Because of the publicity attendant on the present investigation many people have received the impression that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation through the years has not been a sound banking institution. The record, however, refutes this impression. The record of the RFC, over the years, is a good one. The RFC has made over 600,000 loans averaging $35,000 each. The total sum which has been loaned is about $21,000,000,000. The above figures include the financing of mortgages on veterans' houses carried out after the war. Losses and reserves for losses amount to some $200,000,000. The RFC has earned in interest and other income $1,400,000,000. Of this amount over $300,000,000 has been paid to the Treasury as dividends and the remainder is being utilized in RFC's lending activities. The taxpayer has thus profited by $600,000,000 from the operations of the RFC.

It should also be particularly noted that over 90 percent of the business loans made by RFC are to small business enterprises in amounts of less than $100,000. In 1950, a total of 5,506 of these small loans were granted. Of this number, 4,904 were for under $100,000. Almost 3,000 were for under $25,000. This is a record not to be disregarded.

THE RFC AND THE DEFENSE PROGRAM

1. Defense lending program under the Defense Production Act of 1950.

2. Defense-related lending program under the RFC Act, as amended.

3. The entire Government synthetic rubber program under the Rubber Act of 1948.

4. The entire Government tin program under Public Law 125, Eightieth Congress.

5. The entire Government abacá program under Public Law 683, Eighty-first Congress.

Draft Deferment Policy for College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by President Ralph Cooper Hutchison, of Lafayette College, which was made in defense of President Truman's Executive order establishing a college student draft-deferment policy based on high scholarships:

THE DRAFT DEFERMENT POLICY FOR COLLEGE STUDENTS

(A reply to President James B. Conant, Harvard University, and President Harold W. Dodds, Princeton University, by Ralph Cooper Hutchison, president, Lafayette College)

Despite the well-reasoned statements of the President and General Hershey, the distinguished university presidents Dodds and Conant still insist that "a system of calling up all members of an age group who are physically fit is in accord with American ideals of democracy." They deplore the deferment of college men with high qualifications, a deferment which is only to prepare these men for more effective service in the Armed Forces. This insistence is distressing because these university presidents are taken by the public to speak for American education. They themselves make no such claim but their very eminence and distinction serve to create that impression.

American democracy has never claimed that all men should be regimented in the same pattern, do the same thing at the same time, assume the same precise responsibilities in an emergency, or be enslaved by equalitarian socialism. American democracy has, on the other hand, insisted that each man should do his part, that part for which he is best fitted, and in the time and manner which best serves the needs of our Nation and our society.

We are in what is either an all-out war or a protracted mobilization calculated to prevent world war. For the winning of either and the establishment of world peace, we know we must have unprecedented industrial production. This conflict may be won by the nations achieving the greatest scientific progress based upon the soundest and most extensive research. The fire power so produced and the transportation to be developed will require the finest and most mature skills for their strategic use. Moreover, it is clear that the ideological aspects for this conflict may be the dominant force and the determining factor. As none before, this will be a contest of production, science, research, skill, and leadership in action and ideas.

This means that any immediate expedient which cuts off the development of such skills and leadership is suicidal. First and primary consideration in planning for victory and for the successful preservation of our freedom should have been the unhampered and uninterrupted training of scientists, production men, medical men, engineers, and qualified leaders for the Armed Forces and for the civilian programs. First measures on the part of politicians, militarists, citizens, and educators should have preserved that thin red line of training of the best students available. First compulsion should have been that these men be required, not permitted, to continue their preparation for maximum service in this war.

The statement of these university presidents to the effect that the colleges and the college students do not want preferential treatment is correct. But it should make no difference to us what the colleges or the college students want. This mobilization economy should be planned intelligently for the attainment of victory for the forces of freedom. Students qualified and able to study should be prepared for their greatest ultimate usefulness to the Armed Forces. When they are ready, they should be put where they are most needed. This is more nearly the true ideal of American democracy.

To insist, for example, that a brilliant medical student should delay his training for 2 years or more to carry a gun when he might otherwise go on to the completion of his medical and surgical skills is a stupid interference with the sound prosecution of war itself. It will not hurt the student concerned, but it hurts the Nation. And it is unfair to the men who will be in the front lines, deprived thus of one more desperately needed surgeon.

The confusion in Congress and in the colleges is due to the fact that there has been no clear recognition of the primacy of education for the winning of the war. Apparently university presidents are afraid of their own truth, for they, above all others, have failed to enunciate this need for trained men in a great national emergency. Devices for popularity with the voters, the public, the labor unions, the newspapers, and with Government officials have obscured our national vision.

It is time that everyone lay aside political considerations and concern for popular acclaim and think straight through to the defeat of our enemies and the enemies of free nations. It is time that we insist on the immediate, uninterrupted, and increased training of doctors, surgeons, engineers, scientists, researchers, and leaders for all phases of military and civilian activity.

This can be done without impeding the mobilization for the present conflict. Let's get away from this silly debate over socialistic equalitarianism, turn every man to his own task—even the student—let us push ahead, win this war, beat down this surge of human enslavement, and so establish peace on the earth. Such a program is much nearer to the true meaning of American democracy.

Ex Malo, Bonum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pilot, Boston, Mass., of Saturday, April 14, 1951:

EX MALO, BONUM

Now that the quite understandable emotional crisis has passed in regard to the dismissal of General MacArthur it is possible to approach the subject with something like equanimity. There are, of course, many more questions involved than any quick survey can possibly consider and the somewhat various reactions to the news has made it plain that in some minds at least the separate issues are quite inextricably commingled. This has not contributed noticeably to either clarity or rationality.

The two principal questions to be considered deal, first, with the matter of the general's dismissal and then, secondly, the consideration of his policy for the Far East. While they concern, to be sure, the same man, the questions are nonetheless quite distinct and deserve separate comment.

Concerning the actual dismissal, political analysts had long since understood that a situation in which a commander in the field saw fit to argue and publicly with the general policy of his superiors was an utterly intolerable one. Very few who consider this question in its single self can come to any conclusion save the one that actually resulted—the subordinate would be forced to capitulate. It is to the credit of the Chief Executive that he had the courage to perform, however reluctantly or belatedly, an action which was to be so obviously an unpopular one. The simple and unavoidable conclusion about the dismissal of General MacArthur is that it was inevitable.

The second question which concerns the general's policy for the Far East is quite another matter. It is clear at once that his theories on what is best for America in the Asian area are distinctly different from those of the administration and the State Department; it is equally clear that he is dissatisfied with the present American (and U. N.) policies there which he considers at the very least to be inadequate. Since General MacArthur is an experienced observer of the Asian picture his observations are worth more than passing consideration. All the more true is this when we reflect on the most unfortunate history our present planners and their predecessors have had in understanding that part of the world. Mr. Marshall's unhappy visit to China and his present prominence in administration planning allow the thought that we may still be following a policy which events themselves have discredited. If our Asian policy needs revamping it will best be accomplished by experts (of which General MacArthur is one) and not by field commanders under orders from their superiors (of which the general was so lately one). While the general can be easily, and rightly, dismissed (or relieved), his ideas on the Far East must be studied and critically analyzed.

It is more than likely that the general's return to the United States will permit the first full-dress discussion of American foreign policy in Asia and for the first time, too, allow administration officials as well as the general to present their views on the formation of a sound policy for the future. What seemed at first to be high-handed politics, or just simple tragedy, may in the end prove to be the beginnings of rationality.

Budgeting and Accounting Problems of the Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an article by Herman C. Loeffler, a member of the staff of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, on budgeting and accounting problems of the Federal Government. The article was published in the Quarterly National Tax Journal of March 1951.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALICE IN BUDGET LAND

(By Herman C. Loeffler)[1]

Federal budget and appropriation practices have long since developed Alice-in-Wonderland overtones of unreality and confusion. They are badly in need of basic reforms. * * *

DEFECTS IN CURRENT PRACTICES

Appropriations based on obligations

The initial and traditional stages of preparation by the departments and agencies of their annual spending requests make good sense. The organization units formulate their desired work programs in the light of social, economic, political, and many other developments and needs. Wherever possible these programs are divided into proper work units. The work units are then multiplied by estimated costs per unit, thus developing proposed expenditures relative to the budget year.

But from here on, the Alice-in-Wonderland conditions start. The controlling financial statutes require that proposed expenditures be translated into so-called obligations, which [are] the total dollar amounts required to make the arrangements which are necessary as a practical matter to accomplish a work program. They consist of the full commitments to obtain desired services by hiring people and to obtain commodities and other objects by the letting of short- or long-term contracts, usually limited by statute to a maximum life of 3 years.

The result of this requirement is that although the proposed work programs of a Federal agency may be identical for two successive years, the obligations requested of Congress as proposed appropriations to accomplish these programs may be quite different. Why? Assume that in the first of two identical annual work programs of a Federal agency for successive years, obligations were incurred to cover a relatively large number of 2-year contracts in their entirety, and that in the following year few multiyear contracts were included because the expiring contracts were available from the prior year to supply required goods and services. Under this assumption the agency might have the same $10,000,000 work programs in both fiscal years 1949 and 1950, although requiring an appropriation of $12,000,000 for the first year as contrasted with an appropriation of only $8,000,000 for the second year. Under these circumstances, appropriations of course cease to indicate the scope of agency work programs.

This example is much simpler than the conditions existing in practice, particularly in those departments and agencies which carry on many construction projects for which 3-year building contracts are frequent. In these cases computation of an annual appropriation requires that two deductions must first be made from the estimated amount of the actual annual construction to be accomplished, in order to adjust for those expenditures in the budget year which will be met from the unused portions of multiyear contracts awarded in the two prior years (unliquidated obligations carried forward) and still available for expenditure. Further, the appropriation for the proposed construction program must be increased by two additions in order to provide for expenditures occurring in the two subsequent years under the long-term contracts which are to be let in the budget year.

The upshot of these adjustments is that in determining the size of the appropriation for a given construction program, consideration must be given to work involved during a total period of 5 years. The amount of the appropriation may therefore give no indication whatever of the actual amount of work to be done in the fiscal year.

Expenditures not comparable with appropriations

This Alice-in-Wonderland confusion is of course equally bad in connection with the actual expenditures under annual appropriations. As has been indicated, annual appropriations include, in addition to adjustments for carry-overs between years, the total contracts to be awarded in the fiscal year, without regard to the longer period over which expenditures under those contracts may be spread before they are completed. The annual expenditure reported by an agency therefore has no relation to the year when the contracts were let or other obligations were incurred to obtain the necessary current deliveries.

Imagine trying to exercise sound judgment in preparing budgets under this theoretical background. Using the simple example already given, the agency would report expenditures of $10,000,000 each in fiscal years 1949 and 1950. Since $12,000,000 was the first year's appropriation, the agency had presumably been very economical and had underspent its allowance. In the second year, however, it had supposedly broken the law and seriously overspent by the same amount. Of course, both of these conclusions are entirely incorrect.

In many agencies, annual appropriations provide only the annual salaries of those employed, plus quarters and small amounts for travel and the like, so that there is practically no carry-over between years. The above difficulties are therefore either nonexistent or relatively inconsequential. In other agencies, however, notably those letting contracts for big building operations, the reverse will be true; very heavy carry-over will occur between years because of the multiyear contracts in effect. Other agencies will lie between these two extremes. The difficulty is that one never knows to what degree the annual expenditures reported for an agency are comparable with the appropriations voted for it.

Lack of cohesion in budget document

As to this never-never land of fiscal planning and control under practical operating conditions, let me comment very briefly on the resultant serious problems for the annual Federal budget document. That huge tome of telephone-directory size contains an immense amount of valuable data laboriously prepared after much discussion and planning by the Federal agencies and then gathered and reshaped by the Bureau of the Budget to fit into the President's program.

It is a fact of great importance to the whole democratic process that this large collection of very important financial material scares off many interested persons. Some of this negative reaction undoubtedly stems from the fact that the basic design of the budget document is so faulty. It starts with some 200 pages of Presidential budget message and summary tables, prepared quite exclusively on an expenditure basis so that the programs proposed in the budget may be fitted into economic and financial developments in national affairs of the present and near future.

[1] The ideas expressed in this article by Mr. Loeffler are his own and not to be construed as those of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, with which he became associated as a professional staff member in early 1949. For years he was active in research work on problems of local government in New York, St. Louis, Boston, and other cities. Starting in 1941 he served 8 years with the U. S. Bureau of the Budget, mostly as one of the Assistant Chiefs of its Fiscal Division.

Incredible as it may sound, that material is supported—of necessity under existing law—by over 1,000 pages of densely packed and unrelated detail on the obligation basis which must be used for appropriations. The result is that the document has an unbelievable lack of internal cohesion.[2]

Accounting controls a factor

The reader may wonder why responsible officials have so long clung to the present confused procedure. In part that hesitation is probably due to a myriad of technical and perplexing details which departures from traditional methods would raise in the far-flung and complicated operations of the Federal Government.

More important, however, is undoubtedly the fact that the present system lends itself to easy accounting controls to prevent overspending of appropriations. Thus, each appropriation is set up as a control figure over an account when it is voted. The account is then cumulatively charged with a variable mixture of expenditures as they occur—of current expenditures such as the regular payroll and of the full amounts of multiyear contracts as awarded, regardless of their expiration dates beyond the close of the fiscal year.

At the end of the fiscal year, the residual unobligated amount is by law then no longer available for further obligation. But the obligated balance is carried forward, usually for 2 years,[3] so that as the unfinished contracts and other obligations are completed, expenditures are cumulated against the original obligations which were entered in the accounts to provide for each full contract to maturity.

In this simple fashion eventual overspending of any appropriation is prevented regardless of the mixed sequence of long-term and short-term transactions with either slow or rapid subsequent rates of liquidation * * *.[4]

PROPOSED THREE-WAY PROGRAM

Many laws control Federal transactions and finance * * *. One of these, dating from 1874 * * * requires that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years, to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury."[5]

The second statute, the so-called Antideficiency Act of 1905, provides that "no executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expand, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by the Congress for the fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation. * * *".[6]

These two statutes are primarily responsible for the confusion which has been briefly discussed. It is proposed that they be modified by three statutory amendments. These amendments are by no means the original ideas of the author. They also reflect the findings of various writers on this subject who have developed different aspects of the thesis underlying this article. Moreover, the proposed statutory changes are in line with the fiscal methods successfully used in Canada and Great Britain.

The following three-way program would replace the present loose and inadequate annual control by Congress over the operations of Federal agencies through appropriations based on obligations, with a proposed annual control which bases appropriations on expenditures. From such an "annuality" concept would arise many benefits of better budgeting, of a cohesive budget document, and of reports which the public can understand and which the Congress can really use for controlling the annual expenditures of the executive agencies.

* * * * *

I. LAPSING APPROPRIATIONS AND OBLIGATIONS

On each June 30, lapse all annual appropriations and all unfulfilled obligations against them, thus, without exception, limiting the availability of each annual appropriation to those goods which are actually delivered and those services which are actually rendered up to the end of the fiscal year. As to permanent appropriations (which are undesirable because they escape fresh budget consideration and readjustment each year), it is proposed that the amounts thereby made available in successive fiscal years be treated as if they were individual annual appropriations. * * *

* * * * *

The essence of budget planning should be the translation of the proposed actual work program of each agency for the budget year into estimated dollars of expenditure. Once approved or modified by the Congress, these dollar amounts ought then to become the simple, understandable basis of control for each annual appropriation.

Instead, as has been indicated, there must now first be deducted from such amounts the obligations of the two prior years which it is estimated will be liquidated as expenditures in the current year. Then there must be added the "extra" amounts of long-term new obligations to be incurred against current appropriations although they will not be liquidated until the two subsequent fiscal years. The comprehensibility of such a process is obscure, to put it mildly.

In past years the Budget Bureau has prepared at the request of the House Appropriations Committee, but has not printed for general public circulation, a complicated and extended tabulation which bridges the gap between the disparate part I expenditure and part II obligation bases of the budget document. It shows for each proposed appropriation the proposed expenditures for the budget year ahead and the carry-overs at the beginning and end of that year. * * *[7]

The proposed lapsing provision would have the very great advantage of giving Congress direct control over both the amount and purpose of spending within each fiscal year, through appropriations based on expenditures. As things now stand, the carry-over to a later year of part of the obligations incurred against prior years' appropriations makes it possible for an agency to use up more of those obligations carried forward than had been anticipated, and therefore for the agency to spend at a more rapid rate than Congress had in mind when the relevant appropriation was considered and enacted.

Prevent wasteful last-minute obligations

Of importance also is the fact that since appropriations are based on obligations, unobligated balances of an unexpected size will arise in some agencies as the end of the year approaches. These balances should become savings. Instead, they are a source of possible waste and extravagance. The agencies are now prone to use them to incur last-minute obligations for delivery over future months of rugs, typewriters, motor equipment, and other items which were not part of the original budget plan.

Such abuse is also possible but probably would be of much smaller scope under the proposed expenditure basis of appropriations. The reason is that the unobligated surplus to be used up as the fiscal year matures would usually be revealed too late to permit entering purchase orders and also obtaining delivery thereunder of these last-minute purchases by June 30.

Other benefits of annuality

If the proposed lapsing provision is adopted, the question of obligations will drop out of part II of the budget document because both parts will then be on an expenditure basis. Cohesion will be introduced between parts I and II by standard tables which will present a simple, uniform comparison, first in summary and then in detail. This simple, standard, 3-year comparison will show actual expenditures for the last completed fiscal year, estimated expenditures for the year underway, and proposed appropriations (that is, proposed expenditures) for the budget year ahead.

The new basis would permit easy follow-up and control of the financial aspects of a work program as presented in successive budget documents. Thus, the actual 1950 expenditures for each agency's program, as reported in the 1952 budget document, could be directly compared with (figures for the same year in earlier documents). * * *

This proposal would also make possible an important start toward budgeting Federal capital expenditures. For that purpose, simple tables would be feasible showing (a) actual expenditures, by years and cumulatively, from the annual appropriations voted in prior years to implement each multiyear contract authorization (see point III below); (b) the estimated expenditure during the current year; (c) the proposed expenditure during the budget year; and (d) the residual amounts required to carry contract authorizations to completion, for which annual appropriations must still be voted.

Such capital-budget data would show how far "Uncle Sam has incurred and paid off outstanding mortgages." This very important information is now inextricably mixed in with current appropriations. Surely the financial deliberations of the Congress on new projects would be greatly improved by this much more adequate progress data on authorized projects underway.

---

[2] The budget document transmitted to the Congress on January 15, 1951, considerably modifies a former important summary table in an effort to bridge the gap between the expenditure approach of the budget message and the immense supporting obligation detail required by law. To that end the modified table continues the usual six columns of both appropriation and expenditure figures for the three fiscal years covered, then adds eight new columns to trace the degree to which annual expenditures are based on the later liquidation of obligations incurred against prior year appropriations. This painstaking exercise is of doubtful usefulness and unfortunately falls short of meeting the criticisms which motivate the action program proposed in this article.

[3] Actually, under a 1949 statute, unused parts of appropriations are continued as available for paying claims and judgments approved by the General Accounting Office until the statute of limitations takes effect.

[4] It is a great pleasure to indicate a recent basic change promulgated for agency accounting by the General Accounting Office on June 1, 1950 (Accounting Systems Memorandum No. 7, May 2, 1950). The new system permits relegating present accounting for commitments and obligations to memorandum accounts, so that the primary basis of accounting may be the expenditure controls which this article argues would have many beneficial effects in Federal operations. This development has possibilities of far-reaching significance.

[5] 18 Stat. 110.

[6] 31 U. S. C. 665.

[7] See footnote 2.

The proposed expenditure approach would make possible for the first time the legislative budget stipulated under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. That act was designed to control total expenditures during the year ahead, but the obligation basis of appropriation makes it impossible really to limit expenditures specifically * * *

Likewise, appropriation controls on an expenditure basis would for the first time permit the making of a meaningful table of receipts from and payments to the public. Increasing importance is being placed on this approach in various quarters. * * *

II. NINETY-DAY RESERVES, ETC., TO PAY CLAIMS AND TARDY BILLS

Authorize each department to set up temporary reserves from expiring annual appropriations to pay tardy bills for goods and services actually provided up to the end of the fiscal year, which are rendered within 90 days after June 30. Use special single appropriation to pay billings delayed more than 90 days.

Many Federal agencies operate over huge areas and distances—on a world-wide basis in the case of the State and Military Departments in particular. Even under normal peacetime conditions, therefore, creditors cannot always render bills promptly for goods which have been delivered or services which have been rendered in the closing days of each fiscal year. After the bills are received, some time is required to prepare checks in payment. Finally, further time elapses while the checks are being cashed and cleared by the banks.

It has been testified by experts that the printing process of the Government Printing Office involves up to 90 days of delay in billing; travel, communications, supplies, rents, and utilities introduce delays ranging up to 75 days, and transportation items up to as much as 140 days. In the latter cases, the railroads must not only assemble all freight bills but must then work out the amounts due each participating railroad. * * *

It is suggested that early in July, 90-day reserves be set up in departmental accounts from expiring appropriations to pay anticipated tardy bills submitted for goods actually delivered and services actually rendered before July 1. This length of period seems adequate to meet anticipated tardiness of all except a very small proportion of the bills for the year's transactions. At the same time this period leaves another 90 days before early January during which (a) the Treasury Department can assemble final figures on total actual departmental expenditures for the year ending June 30, and (b) the Budget Bureau can incorporate the actual data in various comparisons in the budget document before it is transmitted to the Congress.

* * * * *

Treatment of bills over 90 days late

After the conclusion of the above 90-day period, there arises the problem of what shall be done with tardy bills received thereafter, including the judgments and claims certified by the General Accounting Office.[1] * * *

The departments might be allowed to absorb some or all of items below $500 each from their appropriations for the following year, or a simple solution would be to vote a single annual appropriation to a central account in the Treasury Department to pay all amounts billed more than 90 days late. * * *

* * * * *

Where accrual accounts are installed in the departments, adjustment can be made for * * * changes in inventories during each year. The exact role of accrual accounts in the Federal scene must be worked out, however. On the revenue side they cannot follow State and local practice too closely because the Federal tax liabilities of individuals, unlike individual tax liabilities on local real estate, are usually not known in advance. As to expenditures, the accrual accounts will be open to serious basic criticism if they weaken or obscure clear, simple congressional control through annual appropriations in the current year for goods actually delivered and services actually rendered in that current year.

* * * * *

III. CONTRACT AUTHORIZATIONS SUPPORTED BY APPROPRIATIONS

Use contract authorizations exclusively rather than only occasionally, as at present, to provide for multiyear programs. Require that each multiyear contract which is awarded shall contain a clause specifying that until the work is completed annual amounts of expenditure thereunder are to be wholly contingent on the size of the successive annual appropriations voted by Congress.

The latter provision has long been followed in the important construction contracts of both the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation.

Present construction contracts may cover 2 or 3 years of work, thus permitting more labor-saving devices to be used by contractors for the large projects and thereby bringing about lower bids. Large multiyear contracts are equally feasible under the proposed system, but Congress may subsequently reduce annual appropriations, and it is to be expected that contractors will submit higher bids to take care of this eventuality. It is felt that this loss is justified in order to give flexibility to Congress to adjust construction programs to impending booms or depressions. Flexibility could also be achieved by specifying in each contract the amount of work to be done in each of the years covered as specified in the original work plan. * * *

Under present multiyear contract awards, the public benefits if favorable weather conditions or other good luck permits a contractor to make the new facility available sooner than was anticipated. But there is a natural sequence of operations in the erection of a large building, for example, and but little speeding up is feasible as the work moves from excavation to construction of foundation, floors, and walls, to installation of internal equipment. Steel, concrete, and other supplies arrive on prearranged schedules from their separate places of manufacture, perhaps over limited railroad or highway facilities. The employment of different types of skilled and expensive labor must also be planned in advance.

Under such circumstances any great speeding up of the completion of large contracts because of favorable conditions seems improbable. To the extent, however, that there is early completion of contract work, supplementary appropriations could be voted between January and July if a project is moving ahead more rapidly than had been anticipated. Or the annual appropriation might actually be designed to provide for completion of work under contract in the shortest possible time, assuming the most favorable conditions. In the latter case, the Bureau of the Budget would be directed to hold back in nonexpendable reserves any amounts not spent because of delays.

The latter proposal is also a solution for the difficulty of estimating construction and other multiyear costs far in advance. The problem here is * * * one of reducing the amount available * * * by appropriating for average or good conditions, and then holding back proper amounts in reserves if poor conditions develop.

* * * * *

JOINT ACCOUNTING PROJECT

Good work has been done in recent years to improve Federal accounts through the joint voluntary accounting project of the General Accounting Office, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Treasury Department. It does not seem, however, that those agencies are well-advised in compromising with adaptation via accrual accounting to adjust to an obligation basis of appropriations, rather than supporting an expenditure basis of appropriations to bring about adequate reform of budget and accounting procedures.

* * * * *

The members of the joint accounting project can render a great service to the Nation by urging Congress to adopt the three-way program here proposed to meet the difficult problems which arise. Anything short of this fundamental approach will fail to clear up the Alice-in-Wonderland conditions prevailing in Federal budgeting and other fiscal practices.

Legislation To Protect Members of Armed Services and Government Employees From Reprisals Because of Congressional Testimony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have this date introduced a bill designed to assure members of the Armed Forces and other officers or employees of the Government who can offer pertinent and constructive testimony that they can speak the truth without suffering the fate of Admiral Denfeld on account of such testimony before congressional committees.

This bill would make it a violation of law for any officer of the Federal Government to dismiss or otherwise discipline a Government employee for testifying before a committee of Congress.

Next week Congress will begin hearings on our far-eastern policy, the conduct of the Korean war, and the dismissal of General MacArthur by the President. As we look into these vitally important issues, it is essential that every witness testifying before these committees have complete freedom from reprisals when he is given an opportunity to tell what he knows. The issues to be discussed at these hearings vitally affect the lives of all of our people and are essential to the security of the Nation.

We have too much at stake to permit foreign policy and military strategy to be established on the basis of half-truths and the suppression of testimony.

We must provide protection to witnesses who are members of the armed services or employees of the Government. Unless we provide such protection, the scheduled hearings will amount to no more than a whitewash for administration policies—past, present, and future.

Similar legislation has been introduced in the Senate by the junior Senator from California [Mr. NIXON] and others.

I hope that all of the Members of the Congress will give careful attention to this important legislation which will help to assure us of obtaining all of the facts necessary to reach crucial decisions on the important matters now affecting the security of this country.

The Importance of Individual Thinking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, over the past week end there was held at Hood College in Frederick, Md., a convocation which not only was a notable occasion in the long and splendid history of this fine institution, but which deserves to be ranked among the important educational contributions to security and democracy in this critical area.

With the defense of democracy as its theme, the convocation presented in impressive fashion the religious, moral, and social concepts of democracy, as we are privileged to know it in this country, to a degree that undoubtedly will leave a lasting impression upon all who had the opportunity to participate. The entire program was under the excellent direction of Dr. Andrew G. Truxal, the learned president of Hood College.

The addresses made during the convocation exercises were noteworthy, indeed. Among the speakers was the distinguished junior Senator from Maine [Mrs. MARGARET CHASE SMITH], whose topic, the Importance of Individual Thinking, was developed intelligently and convincingly. The excellent address of the Senator from Maine was in thorough accord with the scholastic atmosphere in which it was delivered.

Another who contributed to the importance and the success of the convocation was Gen. George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense, whom I had the privilege of presenting to the gathering.

It is very much in order, I believe, to offer sincere congratulations to the general chairman of the convocation committee, Mr. R. Paul Smith, of Hagerstown, one of the leading and most respected businessmen of the western part of our State. To say that the convocation, under Mr. Smith's able direction, gave evidence of outstanding vision with regard to the educational and moral needs of the moment, and that it was a complete success, is to state but a simple truth. He and all those who constituted with him the convocation committee deserve the utmost recognition and the thanks of the people of that whole area for a job well done.

Because the thoughts expressed in the address of the distinguished junior Senator from Maine are so pertinent to present-day educational conditions that they deserve to be brought to the attention of our people in all sections, I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE IMPORTANCE OF INDIVIDUAL THINKING

You young women are on the threshold of the finest years of your life. Make the best of those years—not only for yourselves, but for your families, your friends, and your country as well. Make better use of those years than has the generation preceding you.

Give the young women who follow you a heritage of peace instead of the world of suspicion, aggression, treason, character assassination, and moral delinquency that has been thrust upon you by the older generation that has preceded you.

Show them the way to think—the way to control emotions instead of being controlled by emotions. Lead them away from the emotional idolatry of personalities that so beclouds our national thinking today. Lead them away from bitter cynicism and hatred of those with whom they differ in opinion. Show them how to disagree agreeably and with constructive respect.

Help them to realize that this wonderful country of ours is greater than any individual woman or man—and that its fate, destiny, and security should not be made a political football to be kicked around by clashing personalities greedy and envious of political power.

Your generation can do this. It is your destiny—the greatest challenge with which you are faced. You can meet that challenge—you can fulfill your destiny—regardless of what individual role you play in the years to come, whether in the home, in the church, in business or in public office.

There is an old slogan that you can well respect and ever keep before you. It is the slogan of "Stop, look, and listen." But I want to add something new to that slogan and I propose to you the slogan of "Stop, look, listen, and think." If you ever think you have been wrong and want to change your mind—do it and admit it. That's the sign of a big person.

One of the basic causes for all the trouble in the world today is that people talk too much and think too little. They act too impulsively without thinking. I always try to think before I talk.

Don't misunderstand me. I'm not advocating in the slightest that we become mutes with our voices stilled because of fear of criticism of what we might say. That is moral cowardice. And moral cowardice that keeps us from speaking our minds is as dangerous to this country as irresponsible talk. The right way is not always the popular and easy way. Standing for right when it is unpopular is a true test of moral character.

In short, I urge you to think well and deeply before you talk—but once you have made up your mind, don't hesitate to speak your mind. As long as you speak your minds, dictators and demagogues will never take control of this country.

There will always be demagogues—and there must always be people with enough moral courage to stand up and speak out against such demagogues and expose and defeat them, before they get so many unthinking people swallowing their untruthful propaganda that our country is surrendered to them because we were too lazy to do our own thinking and too cowardly to speak our minds.

Instead of making a speech to you today, I would rather think with you. Instead of saying just so many words in catchy phrases and consuming so much time, I would rather just "think out loud" with you, try to get my simple points across as briefly as possible and stop. I would rather say fewer words more slowly so that they can sink in mentally than to try to crowd in the maximum number of words in any lengthy speech.

And I fully acknowledge that what I say is nothing new to you nor anything that you couldn't say yourself. But it is well for all of us to review the fundamentals that are so basic and obvious that too often too many of us take them for granted.

The importance of individual thinking to the preservation of our democracy and our freedom cannot be overemphasized. It is too often overlooked and neglected.

But when we use the word "think" just what do we mean? To think is to exercise the faculties of judgment, conception, or inference—to put our common sense into action. When the German people defaulted their thinking to Hitler, they surrendered their freedom. When the Russian people defaulted their thinking to Lenin and Stalin, they surrendered their freedom.

Too few people in this country realize that too many people in this country are defaulting their thinking to demagogues and that we are closer to surrendering our freedom than most of us are willing to recognize and admit. When we accept the statements and proposals of demagogues because we are too lazy to think and test their statements and proposals, we can blame no one but ourselves for subsequent events.

But thoughts, to be effective, must be disclosed. We must have confidence in our opinions and cherish the belief that they will guide others as well as ourselves. We should so proceed as to merit leadership and then not be timid about accepting it.

It is the articulate majority that rules a democracy. But the articulate majority does not always represent the real majority. Quite often the real minority by thinking out loud makes itself the practical, effective articulate majority. For proof of this one need only look at the presidential election figures where he or she will find that usually the victorious candidate and party not only have small margins of victory but poll considerably less than 51 percent of the eligible electorate.

There is too great a tendency to regard elections as just a lot of politics and a popularity contest in which candidates and political parties indulge in name-calling that they themselves do not believe and forget just as soon as the election campaign is over.

Elections are more than just intense politics and popularity contests. In elections we should vote for policies on vital issues, for the candidates are merely symbols and media of action.

Elections are times when we establish a policy of Government for the next 2 or 4 years—a policy that public officials whom we have elected are to follow. Therein lies the importance of maximum voting, for in our two-party system maximum voting is the greatest possible assurance of effecting the will of the majority, of giving full vitality to democracy.

There is a tendency to set women off separate from men when we think about these aspects. I don't like that—I don't like it simply because women are citizens just like men and have the same responsibilities of citizenship as men do. The simplest and most direct way to state my attitude is in three words—women are people.

So that, I am inclined to accept the theme of woman's role in the defense of democracy with the reservation that the broad role of women in the defense of democracy is no different from that of men.

Women, just like men, have the role of voting, of thinking, of articulating—of taking a stand and expressing their beliefs. They can play that role in participating in forums and public discussions. They can organize or affiliate themselves with articulate groups that represent their views. They can help get out the vote.

The articulate action of a citizen, whether man or woman, must be constructive—must seek to improve—to build instead of tear down and destroy—must be preceded by serious and responsible thinking. Criticism unaccompanied by positive proposals of substitutes for that criticized indicates lack of informed thinking on the part of the critic.

The broader sense of the concept of the role of women in the defense of democracy is that of the citizen doing her most for the preservation of democracy and peace by (1) independent thinking, (2) making that thinking articulate by translating it into action at the ballot boxes, in the forums, and in everyday life, and (3) being constructive and positive in that thinking and articulation.

In the more narrow sense of the concept—the concept that makes a distinction on the basis of sex—the most important role of the woman in defense of democracy is her traditional role as homemaker.

I wish that there were more women holding top positions in our democracy. I wish there were more women in Congress—more women in top positions in the executive and judicial branches of our Government.

But in that wish I regard the role of homemaker for women as being far more important than the role in public office. For surely the very backbone of our democracy is the family and the home in which the family lives. As long as the family home structure of our Nation is firm and sound, our democracy will be firm and sound and well defended.

Since woman is the homemaker—the keeper of the home—she is the key individual of our democracy at the "grass roots" level. In that respect woman is the primary and basic governor of our democracy, for our governing starts right in the home. Woman molds the citizens of tomorrow in the rearing that she gives the children.

Yes; the first and original governor in our democracy is the woman. Woman administers the home. She sets the rules. She enforces the rules. She metes out the discipline and the justice for violations of those rules.

In other words, women, in their own way, like Congress, legislate the rules—in their own way, like the executive branch, enforce and administer the rules—in their own way, like the courts, interpret the rules of the home.

Some of you, I hope, will enter public service. I hope that more women do inject themselves into their Government, for certainly our Government needs more of the home put into it and less of the Government in the home.

But whether you enter public service or not, there is no finer role that you can play in the defense of democracy and our American way of life than that of wife, mother, and homemaker. Run your homes and raise your children in the very best traditions and fundamentals of our American way of life.

But don't restrict yourself to the home to the extent of exclusion of any interest or participation in public affairs and your Government. For if you do that, your indifference to your Government and to your full citizenship will be reflected in your children who grow up imitating you.

In short, in the years that you are about to enter you can do far more than you realize to make this a better country—to keep it the wonderful democracy that it is, to preserve our American way of life.

You don't have to ask anybody but yourself how to do it. And there is no one who can do it for you. It is your individual responsibility. More important, it is your free and cherished right. Don't let that right die for lack of exercise.

The most precious thing that democracy gives to us is freedom. You and I cannot escape the fact that the ultimate responsibility for freedom is personal. Our freedoms today are not so much in danger because people are consciously trying to take them away from us as they are in danger because we forget to use them.

Freedom may be an intangible, but, like most everything else, it can die because of lack of use. Freedom unexercised may become freedom forfeited. The preservation of freedom is in the hands of the people themselves now, not the Government.

Prolonging Korea Stalemate Laid to Democratic Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Prolonging Korea Stalemate Laid to Democratic Leaders," written by David Lawrence and published in the New York Herald Tribune of April 27, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY IN WASHINGTON

(By David Lawrence)

PROLONGING KOREA STALEMATE LAID TO DEMOCRATIC LEADERS

WASHINGTON, April 26.—Is anybody here really thinking about the 350,000 American boys in Korea? Speeches galore are being made in Congress, but so far as the Democratic Party is concerned, there isn't the slightest evidence of any policy on the part of its leadership in Congress or the White House to bring the Korean war to a successful conclusion.

Instead, the idea of a stalemate which shall keep American troops engaged indefinitely seems to be accepted as the policy of the administration. There is to be no effort to strike back at the enemy by air or to require that allies who are members of the U. N. should cease giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

It was the Democratic administration which ordered the troops into Korea without ever asking for a resolution of ratification by Congress. It is the same administration which now is committing the American forces to an indefinite period of fighting without a chance of using maximum force against the enemy.

So far as the American forces in Korea are concerned, they have been deprived of the opportunity to use the customary tactics or rules of war.

It is one of the oldest rules of international law that when an enemy force makes an attack, it can be pursued to the bases from which it came.

The Democratic Party in Congress, however, takes the position that these rules must be ignored and that the American forces must continue to take punishment day after day for fear of offending our U. N. allies or Russia.

United States entitled to leadership

The American people have a right to expect leadership from the Democratic Party, which is in control not only of the White House but of both Houses of Congress as well as the Department of State.

Yet, today the United States Government sits idly by and allows one of its allies—Great Britain—to ship through Hong Kong munitions of war that are being used by the Communist Chinese.

The United States also sits idly by and maintains friendly relations with and even appropriates money to governments, such as India, which are doing everything they can to oppose American policy. Not a single regiment of Indian troops has gone to the aid of American forces in Korea.

The Congress is asked to be humane and furnish wheat to India, but is the Government of Nehru humane? Hasn't the Government of India done everything it could to take the side of Communist China—an enemy of the United States—and isn't it the Indian Government that is really responsible for the privations of the Indian people rather than those who decline to send funds or food?

The United States sits idly by, too, and allows the legal fiction to be spread that this is a war between the United Nations and the Communists when, in fact, Britain and other U. N. governments maintain friendly relations with governments actually engaged in war against us.

Fear wins no wars

One Government which is a member of the United Nations—namely, Nationalist China—is prevented from aiding our troops in Korea. Within the last few days it has been announced that a military mission is going from America to help the Nationalists to defend Formosa against attack. If American munitions and military personnel can do this, they can help the Nationalists to reach the mainland, as General MacArthur recommended.

But how does the American Government justify its own course in arranging now for the defense of Formosa when the British Government and other U. N. governments do not concur at all in the American policy toward Formosa?

What kind of U. N. policy is it which forbids one of its own members to obey the call for reinforcements in Korea? And what kind of U. N. policy is it which permits its principal members to trade with the enemy and to carry on diplomatic relations with the enemy government?

These factors make it logical to expect that the Democratic Party will have to explain is position and record on all this some day. It cannot pose as the "peace party" when in fact it has become the party that has allowed the Korean war to be prolonged instead of being brought to a quick conclusion, as could be done if General MacArthur's recommendations were followed.

Fear never won a war and public expressions of fear recently by Democratic Party spokesmen may well invite further attacks from the enemy, just as the ill-fated pronouncement in January 1950 by our Secretary of State that Korea wouldn't be defended may have encouraged the Communist aggression in June 1950.

How To End Korean War Yet Win Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an editorial entitled "How To End Korean War Yet Win Peace," which was published in the Johnstown Democrat, Johnstown, Pa., on Tuesday, April 24, 1951:

HOW TO END KOREAN WAR YET WIN PEACE

As key Senate committees prepare to take up an inquiry into United States foreign policy, these vital factors stand out as conditioning aspects of the search for a wise and sound global program:

1. Because of tragic errors of the past, we are limited in our efforts for the future. It is not so much a matter now of agreeing on the best course. Unfortunately, there is no such course. So we must content ourselves with determining the least objectionable of a number of faulty courses.

2. The towering and heroic figure of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, together with the cavalier manner in which this military genius was dismissed has threatened to put an unfortunate emphasis upon the emotional plane and to make difficult a dispassionate, logical approach to the problem.

This has not been the general's fault. The summary way in which he was shorn of his duties provided the spark which lit this Nation-wide display of hero worshipfulness. And the administration, in what has come pretty close to being a smear campaign directed against the general, has succeeded in fanning the blaze.

Part of the blame for this bobby-soxer approach to the matter at hand must also be attributed to some Republicans, who have sought to capitalize upon the genuine and deep-seated respect the people have for this great American.

3. The administration, having failed to anticipate accurately the depth of the public's feeling in the matter, has been placed in the uncomfortable position of fighting, with its back to the wall, an unpopular engagement in which personalities rather than issues are getting far too much attention.

Such an uneasiness over being at bay is not conducive to logical presentation of facts, and encourages excessive use of tactics unworthy of the serious issues at hand.

4. Finally, the administration, if it is to avoid a public confession of its earlier fundamental errors, may choose to commit new and equally grave mistakes out of the necessity of preserving partisan strength, or at least of hedging against a too severe breaching of party armor.

In this respect, the President and his advisers have inexpertly boxed themselves in. They cannot very well go forward along lines advocated by General MacArthur, for they have fired him for pressing this course. They cannot go back along the road of appeasement, as advocated by Great Britain, for they themselves have foresworn this retreat, in their efforts to breast the wave of public adoration of MacArthur the hero.

That leaves them only the sad choice of trying to stand still, an alternative in which we expect the Chinese and the Russian Communists will be extremely uncooperative.

Indeed, the weakness of the United States politico-military position in the Far East today is that it cannot be characterized as a policy at all—but rather as the lack of one. Like Charles Dickens' Mr. Micawber, we are "waiting for something to turn up." And that, short of surrender, is no way to win a war—or a peace, either.

Despite these four very real and very unfortunate difficulties, the way must be found to a positive policy which is the least faulty, to a policy by which the war in Korea can be brought to an honorable and speedy conclusion, to a policy which gives the greatest hope of restoring peace, to a policy which can lead eventually to a logical program for insuring the security of the Western World while at the same time coming to an understanding with the Soviet world which will permit the two halves to live together, if not in complete harmony, at least outside the shadow of imminent war.

Admittedly, that's a mighty big order. And it, too, has a major flaw, just as has President Truman's idea of a "limited war" in Korea. That flaw is the refusal of the Communist world earnestly to seek peace, or a reasonable facsimile thereof.

It takes two to make war. It also takes two to make peace. And we only kid ourselves, and do our noble cause a major disservice, if we conclude that our cold-war-hot-war enemy desires real and lasting peace in Asia, in the Middle East or in Europe.

We have contended that the Truman-Acheson policy vacuum in Korea is faulty. We hasten to add that the program General MacArthur favors is more or less faulty, too. That's what we're trying to get at. Nothing we can do will be completely right. Some things will be less wrong than others.

Much was made by an administration source over the week end about the entry of the Chinese Communists into the Korean "police action." General MacArthur is quoted as having assured President Truman at the Wake Island conference that the Chinese Reds would not enter the conflict, that he could wind up the Korean campaign about Thanksgiving time and that at least a division of United States troops in Korea could be spared for European duty by early January.

We have yet to hear General MacArthur's version of this historic meeting last October 15 and we shall withhold comment on it until that time.

But this fact remains, and it cannot be controverted:

When we entered Korea militarily after the surprise attack by the North Koreans across the thirty-eighth parallel—a move that was made, incidentally, without consultation with Congress, which constitutionally has exclusive power to declare war—we took a calculated risk.

It might be added here, parenthetically, that the President ordered troops into Korea without prior consultation with General MacArthur, whose job it would be as a military man to fight the campaign decided upon by the diplomats.

Once we committed troops to Korea, we rank the risk that Communist China would enter the fray. There may have been good reason at the time to doubt that the Chinese Reds would get mixed up in it. But we didn't know for sure. We did know—or should have realized—that if Mao decided to get in we couldn't keep him out.

As it developed, Mao did move into Korea. Whether he intended to do that all along, or changed his mind when it became obvious that we would lick the North Koreans, we don't know. He's there now, at any rate.

If we follow General MacArthur's program, we may wind up fighting Russia, too, not only in the Far East but in Europe and the Middle East as well. Nobody knows.

Saying Russia necessarily won't move in, as General MacArthur told Congress, is nothing more than a guess. Russia might get into it—and we might as well face that possibility. Russia might get in even though we don't smack Red China by air.

In a very real sense Russian involvement has been a possibility ever since we went to the South Koreans' aid, just as Red China's involvement was. The Truman-Acheson policy vacuum in Korea is no guaranty either that the Kremlin won't strike.

The basic weakness of the MacArthur viewpoint is this: What do we do with Korea—or that piece of it we finally capture—once we win?

We may even force the Chinese to pull back across the Yalu. We might even be able to achieve the United Nations original goal in Korea—to unify the country and to restore it to the Koreans under a democratic form of government.

But unless the U. N. keeps thousands of men in Korea for a long time to come, and arms that defense army to the teeth, there will be nothing to prevent the Chinese from repeating the whole sorry aggression after our boys go home.

Secretary of State Dean Acheson was right (although there are some things a government can't and shouldn't say officially) when he observed that Korea was a military liability. It still is. It will continue to be, even if we kick Mao out of that tragic land.

We went into Korea in the first place because of a high moral principle, to conquer aggression and to halt Red imperialism by force of arms. That was a noble sentiment, and it was supported generally in this country.

But the United Nations has abandoned that goal. The U. N. membership has quietly but firmly failed to provide enough military stuff, just as the U. N. has failed to supply the diplomatic and political guts, to do what it set out to do in Korea.

In a very real sense, our allies have let us down. As a result, we have concocted this senseless Truman-Acheson formula for seeking to limit the war. You can't limit war. You either win wars, or you lose them.

You can commit your men to a criminal meat-grinder proposition in which you trade one pint of American blood for 20 pints of Communist blood. But in the end you succeed in doing nothing but spilling blood.

Furthermore, under such a program, which requires a willingness to see the Korean campaign seesaw across the narrow peninsula for months, years, maybe, you make it inevitable that the folks back home eventually will demand that the whole sorry mess be ended, one way or the other.

General MacArthur wanted to try to end the war, in what looked to him to be the shortest possible time and with the least additional loss of American lives. He was fired, because that isn't the way the Truman-Acheson script calls for things to go.

But there is one other way. It won't be popular immediately. It won't be strictly moral, from the standpoint of high principle. It won't be totally right. But we think it offers the greatest percentage of rightness and the lowest percentage of wrongness. It's the least of a number of larger evils.

Here's a rough outline we toss out as the basis for discussion—intelligent, unemotional discussion, we hope.

1. Get out of Korea. Announce in advance that we are laying down a broad radioactive belt behind which our forces can stage an orderly withdrawal and through which the Commies cannot advance to prevent evacuation of our men, our equipment, and our allies.

2. Take with us South Koreans, military and civilian, who don't want to stay behind. (We don't know where we could put them, but that could be worked out through the U. N.; it's a U. N. baby.)

3. Proclaim a Monroe Doctrine for the far Pacific. Draw a line and say to the Commies, in Peiping as well as in Moscow, cross that line and atomic eggs begin to fall on you, brother—but fast.

4. Make certain the Commies clearly understand this line, among other places, specifically protects the Philippines, Formosa, Japan, New Zealand, Australia. Work out defense pacts at once with the people of these areas.

5. Announce boldly that, by their aggressive tactics, both Red China and Red Russia have forfeited any right to expect to help write the Japanese peace treaty. We trusted them when we agreed to let them in on the peace with the Japs. They (the Commies) have violated that trust. Therefore, those bets are off—but good.

6. Let it be known that we will veto Red China's admission to the United Nations Security Council, until Peiping proves by her deeds, not by mere words, that she is capable of taking her place with civilized countries of the world, that she can be trusted not to fracture the peace in ruthless aggressive imperialism.

7. Admit that we have failed to do what we set out to do in Korea—primarily because the United Nations got cold feet and would not face the risk of world war III that have been part of the Korean affair from the very beginning. Say that we are pulling out of Korea because we aren't willing—alone—to shoulder the blame of bringing on world war III, if it should start over our moves to win an indecisive victory in Korea—indecisive, that is, in terms of our global determination to keep the free world free.

This is a positive program. It is aggressive. It is one on which we could achieve unity among ourselves here at home. It is one on which we could achieve unity among a vast majority of the 60 nations of the United Nations. It is a policy that says what we mean—for the first time in months.

Admittedly, there are major flaws inherent in a policy which pretends to be positive, yet starts out being negative. But, we submit, in light of the mistakes of the past, the program is less faulty than the present Truman-Acheson policy vacuum.

Finally, this get-out-of-Korea plan is not appeasement. It is frankly admitting temporary defeat, yes. On the other hand, the only other way to get out of Korea—short of military victory over Communist China, and perhaps Russia, too—requires real appeasement: The promise of giving the Commies something (Formosa, a voice in the Jap Peace Treaty, a seat in the U. N.) to buy them into agreeing to a cease-fire and a phony peace.

Under this proposal, we lay down the terms, not the Commies. And those terms would be tougher than we could extract from Mao in anything short of licking him on the mainland of China.

We seriously recommend careful study of this get-out-of-Korea suggestion as the least evil way out of this mess. For by it, we could preserve permanently the peace and security of the Western World in the Pacific—and in the Atlantic community of nations as well.

Conference To Fight High Prices and Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on inflation and mobilization adopted at a special conference of the Liberal Party on April 19. This conference was attended by 925 delegates representing labor, veterans, civic, consumers, community, and liberal organizations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ON POLICY ADOPTED AT CONFERENCE TO FIGHT HIGH PRICES AND INFLATION HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE LIBERAL PARTY, CENTRAL HIGH SCHOOL OF NEEDLE TRADES, THURSDAY, APRIL 19, 1951

World peace depends upon the maintenance of economic, military, and moral strength in the free world. The backbone of such strength is the United States.

America's ability to fulfill its world mission is seriously threatened by the growing price inflation. Inflation adds unnecessary billions to the cost of military defense. Inflation imposes unbearable costs on the people of Europe and Asia in their efforts to obtain American goods. Inflation undermines the living standards of the American people, thereby weakening the working and fighting morale of the Nation. Inflation is an ally of communism.

The rapid inflation, since the beginning of the conflict in Korea, is based on an artificial scarcity, created by scare buying, speculation, stockpiling, accumulation of inventories. Although this artificial price boost is now leveling off, the long range impact of our mobilization needs must create real scarcities. Uncontrolled, this scarcity will mean new and great price rises, a prolonged period of steady inflation.

The immediate effect of this inflation has been bloated profits for a few at one end, and endangered living standards for the millions at the other end. Corporate profits in the fourth quarter of 1951 stood 75 percent above the previous year. Select corporations, producing basic commodities, topped even this unprecedented high in profits.

For the consumer, the threat to his savings and his living standards was reflected in the rising price indexes:

The cost of living has gone up more than 8 percent.

The price of food has gone up more than 11 percent.

The price of semimanufactured wholesale goods has gone up 24.7 percent.

In the same period, more than half the nonagricultural workers in America received no pay increases. Of those who did get any increase in 1951, the majority were between 6 to 8 percent.

These inequities have been multiplied by the inequities of the tax structure. Corporate profits, after taxes, have risen 50 percent since last year. Loopholes in the present law cost Uncle Sam billions of dollars annually. The salaried and wage worker faces increased income taxes and new sales taxes.

The basic responsibility for the failure to control inflation lies in the presently inadequate Defense Production Act, passed by a business-minded Congress.

The act exempts food prices from controls.

The act provides no means for rent controls.

The act exempts manufactured products from quality control.

The weakness of the act has been aggravated by the weak and lop-sided use of the powers bestowed on the President and the mobilization agencies. At present the core of the control regulations is a retail percentage mark-up on a climbing wholesale price level. This is merely a legislation of inflation.

While prices rise rapidly and profits rise even more rapidly, the mobilization agencies have sought to freeze wages, leaving the great mass of Americans no means of catching up with the inflationary trend.

The present Defense Production Act expires on June 30, simultaneously with the expiration of the present almost meaningless rent-control legislation.

This conference, representing delegates of consumer, civic labor, community, fraternal, veterans, and liberal organizations, calls upon the citizens of New York City to rally for a new Defense Production Act to halt inflation.

This means power to impose tight rent controls.

This means power to control farm prices, while guaranteeing farm income through proper subsidies.

This means dollar-and-cents ceilings on manufactured goods, with provisions for quality control.

Simultaneously, the tax structure must be revised to place the burden upon those best able to bear them. This means absolute opposition to any national sales tax. This means stepped-up corporate and excess-profits taxes, both as a means of financing necessary Government expenditures and as a way of cutting down on huge slush funds now engaged in speculative enterprise. To curb speculation we propose credit controls.

Until such time as a new act is written, this conference calls upon the mobilization agencies to establish dollar-and-cents ceilings and to roll back prices in basic industries and distributive trades now showing superprofits.

To enforce this program, this conference calls upon the administration to reorganize the mobilization agencies so that a full and equal voice be granted to labor, the farmer, and the consuming public, along with business, right through the entire mobilization structure.

To realize this program, this conference calls upon its assembled delegates, through their organizations, to communicate with their elected representatives and the President of the United States for the above program to check inflation and to establish an equality of sacrifice in America's great effort to maintain peace and freedom in the world.

RESOLUTION ON PLAN OF ACTION ADOPTED AT CONFERENCE TO FIGHT HIGH PRICES AND INFLATION HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE LIBERAL PARTY, CENTRAL HIGH SCHOOL OF NEEDLE TRADES, THURSDAY, APRIL 19, 1951

In order to effect real price control, tight rent control, and a vigorous check in profiteering, we recommend the following plan of action:

1. Adoption of appropriate resolutions by the various organizations represented at this conference.

2. Sending of such resolutions to President Truman, Senators Lehman and Ives, all New York Congressmen, majority and minority leaders in both Houses of Congress, to Charles Wilson, Eric Johnston, and Michael DiSalle and to the United Labor Committee.

3. Initiation of a card-writing campaign by the members of the various organizations, to be addressed to their local representatives in the National Government, as well as to the various appropriate Federal agencies.

4. Sending of delegations by the various organizations to legislators and administrators in order to urge adoption of the measures and actions recommended by the conference.

5. Wide distribution of the four-page folder leaflet prepared by the committee that arranged the conference against high prices and inflation, or of similar leaflets, in order to educate and arouse public opinion.

6. Organization of neighborhood rallies by the organizations represented in this conference, cooperatively, if possible, and singly, if necessary.

7. Writing of letters to the press by the delegates as individuals in order further to arouse and organize public opinion.

8. Stimulation of public opinion by the use of radio and other channels of communication.

9. Encouragement and organization of consumers' boycotts by housewives against flagrant abuses or profiteering with regard to prices and profits.

10. Publicizing by the various organizations of actions taken by them for real price control, tight rent control, and against profiteering.

11. Sending of an appropriate communication to the United Labor Committee solidarizing this conference with their efforts to stem the tide of inflation.

Motion that in order to carry out more effectively the plan of action outlined above and to correlate the separate activities of the participating organizations it is urged that each organization, wherever appropriate, identify itself with this conference.

Motion that this conference against high prices and inflation call upon the government of the city of New York to utilize the department of markets to keep prices down and to serve as a pacemaker in pushing control over prices.

Motion: Be it

Resolved, That this conference against high prices calls upon the city of New York to reinstitute the bureau formerly existent in the department of markets for the purpose of utilizing the radio, newspapers, and other media of communications to disseminate information to make price control more effective and to combat inflation.

An Emergency Federal Tax Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD specific recommendations of the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce. These recommendations are the result of the considered thinking of the most qualified men in Kansas on Federal taxation. The Kansas State Chamber of Commerce believes that the recommendations contained in the enclosed emergency Federal tax program are realistic and sound in every respect. I submit them to the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the recommendations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN EMERGENCY FEDERAL TAX PROGRAM—RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE KANSAS STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FORMULATED BY THE FEDERAL TAXATION COUNCIL REVISED AND ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS APRIL 13, 1951

INTRODUCTION

The Nation's program for defense is threefold: First, organizing and training an extensive military establishment; second, developing our industrial potential to maintain our superiority in arms; and third, protecting our national economy against the inflationary pressures which are a concomitant of a rearmament program. To fail in either phase would mean the loss of freedom and our American way of life.

We must guard ourselves against two major dangers in our defense effort: First, our defense needs should be carefully studied and should not be of excessive scope; second, once the required scope is determined, the program should be carried out with efficiency and minimum waste.

To build the effective military establishment required, without incurring colossal waste, will call for the most careful study and planning. To outproduce the Communist aggressors will demand the full use of available capital and the cooperation of all our people. To defeat inflation will require austere self-denial on the part of every citizen and the various echelons of our Government, Federal, State, and local as well.

GENERAL POLICIES

Therefore, we believe that the following eight points should be laid down as general policies:

1. The President's recommended spending budget of $71,600,000,000 for the Federal fiscal year 1952 should be critically examined by the Congress. Substantial reductions in nondefense expenditures should be made. Among the areas in which large savings should be effected are public works, foreign aid, subsidies, grants-in-aid, and loan programs; and there are others. Where necessary, amendatory legislation to achieve these objectives should be enacted promptly. All new domestic spending programs must be scrutinized with especial care.

2. Appropriations and authorizations for those purposes deemed essential, including defense, must be subjected to scrutiny with a view to eliminating waste, inefficiency, and duplication. It must also be borne in mind that many governmental services that might be construed as essential in peacetime are entirely unnecessary or are considerably less essential in time of national emergency.

3. It is fundamental that the budget be balanced immediately. If, after eliminating all nonessential expenditures and reducing less essential ones, the 1952 budget is not balanced, then—and only then—additional revenue in an amount sufficient to attain this objective should be raised.

4. In framing such tax legislation as may be found necessary to balance the 1952 budget, consideration should be given to levying those taxes which will least impair the productive capacity of the country. Individual income and corporation taxes have already been increased to meet the emergency. Excise taxes, in marked contrast to individual and corporation income taxes, have not been increased in the last few years. Excise taxes are traditionally a major feature of our revenue system. Excise taxes, if wisely levied, are much less inflationary than other types. They can be made a temporary source of large revenue without being oppressive. Therefore, we believe that excise taxes should be expanded as the major, if not the only, source of such additional revenue as may be required.

5. If expansion of the field of excise taxation should not suffice to balance the 1952 budget, then the yield of the individual income taxes should be increased.

6. The Congress should, however, complete the program, well started in the Revenue Act of 1950, of subjecting to the corporation tax the incomes of all organizations which engage in business in competition with those which are taxed. Government-financed enterprises, cooperatives, and others still enjoy unfair tax advantages which should be eliminated without injury to the legitimate purposes of such enterprises.

7. By economies in operation and by increasing postal rates in those classifications which now show operating losses, the Post Office Department should be made self-sustaining; also, all franking privileges should be discontinued.

8. While Congress has carried out some of the recommendations of the Commission on Reorganization of the Executive Branch (popularly known as the Hoover Commission), it has still before it the majority of those recommendations whose enactment will result in the greatest economies and efficiencies. Congress should tolerate no further delay in translating these recommendations into law.

SPECIFIC MEASURES

Excises: The present selective types of excise taxes should be extended and expanded so as to place the burden insofar as possible on those best able to pay and on such products as are most competitive with the defense program. Any increases in tax under this proposal should not be levied on any items which, before the effective date of the imposition of such taxes, have left the possession of the person obligated to pay the tax.

The imposition of a Federal general-sales tax or defense-excise tax, either at the retail or the manufacturer's level is opposed, even if food products were to be exempted. Such general sales taxes would hit hardest those least able to pay; would be inflationary in application, particularly so if applied at the manufacturer's level; would greatly burden millions of retailers in their accounting procedures if applied at the retail level; if once adopted, would likely become permanent in the Federal revenue scheme and thus in future years impinge upon sources of revenue available to the various States governments; and would not create a sufficient tax consciousness in the mind of the taxpayer, particularly if imposed at the manufacturer's level.

THE INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX

In seeking increased revenue from income taxation, we recommend first that the enforcement powers of the Bureau of Internal Revenue be strengthened by providing stiffer penalties for deliberate and negligent underreporting of incomes.

If expansion and extension of selective-excise taxes, increased income from more rigid enforcement of income-tax laws, and decreased Government expenditures for nondefense functions, wherever possible, do not produce sufficient revenue to meet prospective Federal budgets, we recommend across-the-board increases in individual income-tax rates as will be least discriminatory and most feasible for the general economy.

Ayer Award Came Through Teamwork

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the Johnstown Democrat, a newspaper in my congressional district, has been awarded first honorable mention for excellence in typography, presswork, and makeup by the judges of the twenty-first annual exhibition of newspaper typography. The Johnstown Democrat won its award in the classification for newspapers of the 10,000 to 50,000 circulation class. Judges were Harold E. Stassen, president of the University of Pennsylvania; Merle Armitage, art director of Look and Quick and president of the American Institute of the Graphic Arts; and J. L. Frazier, editor of Inland Printer.

With the receipt of this national honor the Democrat has rounded out a complete cycle of best of all accomplishments in newspaper circles. They have received previous recognition in such fields as photography, editorial writing, features, public service, and general news content.

I congratulate John James, the editor; Walter W. Krebs, the owner and publisher; and L. W. Barnes, general manager; together with all of the heads of the other departments, all of the employees and personnel working for this newspaper. They all deserve a "well done."

The editor, John James, has written the following editorial, which I believe expresses fully the sentiments of the newspaper and the people employed by it:

AYER AWARD CAME THROUGH TEAMWORK

The Democrat shares with its readers today a pardonable pride in achievement.

This newspaper is fortunate to have won first honorable mention in the annual F. Wayland Ayer competition for excellence in typography, presswork, and make-up, in the 10,000–50,000 circulation classification.

Every newspaper in the Nation was eligible to enter the competition. Eight hundred did.

The Ayer cup went to the Daily News-Tribune of La Salle, Ill. To the News-Tribune go our sincere congratulations.

In the 10,000–50,000 class, the Democrat took first place. We share honors with the New York Herald Tribune, which captured similar recognition in the over-50,000 classification.

Through the years the Democrat has won its share of recognition—for excellence in news reporting and photography, for outstanding coverage in the mining and aviation fields. Some judges have found that the Democrat's editorial page merits a second look.

But these are departmental honors, and as such they represent only one facet of any newspaper's excellence.

The Ayer recognition, one the other hand, represents teamwork in which every department has shared—from the topside to the apprentice who one day may head this organization.

The recognition the Democrat won this week represents the appreciation of skills that no one man, not even one department, could ever hope to master.

Purely for the purpose of the record, let's tick off a few of the credits that are due.

Before any award for excellence could be won by any newspaper in any community there must be a willingness to risk capital in a venture that history has shown to be one of the most uncertain. That capital has been provided—to the tune of several million dollars as represented in the investment in the Democrat, one of a group of enterprises serving this community with distinction.

Behind that must be executive and administrative ability to translate the dollars and cents of the investors into a product of community service. Theirs is the job of bringing into clear focus the contribution each department makes to the end product. In the case of the Democrat, they are Walter W. Krebs, publisher, and L. W. Barnes, general manager.

In the production departments, where ideas and know-how find their way onto the copy paper from which the cold type is set, credit goes to Pat Malloy, managing editor, and Carl M. Gillespie, advertising manager. Sharing the spotlight in the news department are Saul W. Spiegel, city editor; Newton Georg, telegraph editor; James H. Torr, sports editor; Glenn Sease, mine editor.

The contributions of the mechanical departments in the production of a prize-winning newspaper are major. Chief of the Democrat's composing room is Aloysius Karcher. In charge of the Democrat's pressroom is John H. Mock. Head of the engraving department is R. Wayne Schrott.

But these department heads alone could not have produced an Ayer prize-winning newspaper. They have been supported all along the line by loyal and conscientious workers who as a well-coordinated team have enabled the Democrat to achieve such national recognition.

Finally, full credit must be paid to the hundreds of advertisers and the more than 26,800 readers who have found this newspaper to be a profitable and informative meeting place that has come to represent an important phase of the American way of life.

We of the Democrat thank the Ayer people for the recognition they have given us.

We recognize the high standards the future imposes upon us, if we are to meet the challenge of 1951.

All of us hope to be able to produce in the coming years the kind of a newspaper our readers have a right to expect.

Predicting and Interpreting the 1950 Elections

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 7, 1951

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Louis H. Bean is recognized as one of this Nation's foremost authorities in the field of election statistics. He gained Nation-wide recognition in his 1948 prediction that President Truman would be reelected. Dr. Bean is always willing to have his predictions reviewed following an election.

Following is an abstract of a talk given by Dr. Bean regarding the 1950 elections:

The 1950 congressional election offers an excellent example for discussing my part of this series of lectures, How To Predict and Interpret Elections. But it should be looked upon only as an example. In applying the art of statistical analysis, expectation and interpretation to past and future elections, it should be borne in mind that every election is dominated by different problems and features.

Some of you may recall my statistical analyses of past congressional elections, made before the Korean war and published many weeks before the election of November 7. These studies were intended to show how the two major parties appeared to be lined up in the spring and summer of 1950 before the big guns of the political campaign opened up.

They pointed to certain possible results if one assumed no major abnormal developments in domestic or international affairs; that is, if one assumed a normal midterm election. They indicated what might normally be expected if the two major parties conducted their campaigns as usual.

What were these norms or standards as I laid them out in my book the Mid-Term Battle? How do the actual results differ from those of a normal midterm election?

For the House of Representatives, I pointed out that normally the Democrats, as the party in power, stood to lose 25 to 30 seats. They actually lost 27. We are, therefore, justified in looking upon the over-all results in the House as about in line with normal expectations. This means that as far as the 435 congressional races are concerned, they were not much influenced by the new political climate that the Korean war brought on after June, or that such new influences as did develop managed to cancel out in the aggregate.

The make-up of the Eighty-second Congress is 54 percent Democratic compared with 60 percent in the Eighty-first Congress. The 235 Democrats elected in 1950 should be compared with the results in other midterm elections, if one wants to see where the Democrats stand in the political tide that turned up after 1946. Here are the comparable numbers of Democratic Congressmen elected in other years:

1934	322
1938	262
1942	222
1946	183
1950	235

The Democrats in 1950 came out statistically stronger than in 1946 and 1942, but not as strong as in 1938. In some States, such as Connecticut and Pennsylvania, the Democrats actually succeeded in preventing the traditional midterm decline in their percentages of the votes cast. In these two States the Democrats on a midterm basis are stronger today than they have been since 1934, and if the Pennsylvania vote had been as near to normal as the Connecticut vote turned out to be, the Pennsylvania Democrats might have reelected their Senator.

There were two other major facts I pointed to in connection with the 1950 midterm election of Congressmen. One had to do with the region where most of the losses were likely to occur, the other had to do with the size of the vote—with political apathy as a factor in the probable outcome.

Since most Democratic losses in 1946 occurred in the Northeast—in the States stretching from Massachusetts to Missouri—and since most of the 1948 gains also occurred in this industrial area, I suggested that this would again be the main battleground, with the center of losses in the Pennsylvania and Ohio districts. And so it was, except that the center of losses turned out to be Ohio-Indiana instead of Pennsylvania-Ohio.

With regard to the size of the vote, I emphasized the fact that in 1948 there were about 10,000,000 "lost" voters—those who had failed to vote. This is just on the basis of the voting trend of the 1920's and 1930's and not on the basis of the total of over 93,000,000 eligible voters. (On the latter basis, the total of "lost" voters was over 45,000,000.)

The point of these turn-out figures is to show that with the Democrats as the party in power, the larger the turnout the larger the number of victorious Democratic candidates. Specifically, I pointed out that had the total vote in 1948 been 10,000,000 greater, it would have meant 20 more Democratic seats in the House.

The 1950 results sustain this view. It is now possible to say that had the national turnout in 1950 been normal, the Democrats might have minimized their losses and possibly have come through with an actual gain in control instead of the normal shrinkage. This may surprise those who were misled by the many stories about the large vote in this year's election. It was not large—only fair.

The standard I laid out for a normal midterm vote in 1950 was around 48,000,000 (2,000,000 greater than in the 1948 Presidential election). The latest count gave the total as 40,000,000. This is not quite the apathy of 1946, but it is apathy enough and, as usual, it is mostly apathy on the Democratic side. Here is the simplest illustration I can offer:

Year	Total vote	Democrats elected
1946	34,000,000	188
1950	40,000,000	235
1948	46,000,000	262

A larger total vote still means a larger number of Democratic Congressmen, and if the 1950 vote had been not midway between the very low total of 1946 and the low total of 1948 but had reached forty-seven to forty-eight million, the Eighty-second Congress would have larger Democratic majorities in both the House and Senate.

For the Senate, my analysis pointed to a normal midterm loss of 3 or 4 Democratic seats, accompanying the loss of 25 to 30 seats in the House. As you know, the loss was five. While not far from the expected, based on a normal midterm election, actually, it is the result of several surprises.

Judged largely on a statistical, traditional mid-term-voting basis, with little consideration given to personalities and issues, the Republican senatorial opportunities in 1950 seemed to be in Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Idaho, and Nevada. The Republicans were checked by a fairly large vote in Connecticut; they failed to capitalize on their statistical opportunities in Nevada, but won in Idaho, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. In the last two States the Republican victories may be traced to Democratic apathy among metropolitan voters—look at Pittsburgh and Chicago as examples.

The Democratic opportunities for senatorial gains were fewer. They were limited to Missouri and possibly Colorado and Ohio. The Democrats won in Missouri, succeeded in narrowing the Republican margin in Colorado, but missed in Ohio by a mile—again, in part, because many Democratic metropolitan voters stayed away from the polls. The real senatorial surprises, of course, were in the Democratic defeats in Maryland and Utah, and to a lesser degree in California. Except for these two or three, even the overall senatorial results would be normal for a midterm election.

The reasons for the surprises in the senatorial races have yet to be fully analyzed statistically. The same, incidentally, may be said also for the gubernatorial surprises of the Southwest—where three Republican governors were elected in addition to the two in Connecticut and Maryland. The task is not a simple one if you do not care to—and you shouldn't—accept the usual and ready generalizations. For full understanding it is necessary to actually probe far below the surface for what was done and what actually happened in such key States as Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Utah, and California. That calls for some rather close analytical work in unscrambling the complexities and interrelationships in our political body. This is essential if we are to see the way the great amount of information and misinformation was made to flow through our social and economic nerves, veins, and arteries, and actually influenced voting last November, particularly in metropolitan areas.

Even before the reasons for these senatorial surprises have been satisfactorily analyzed, the question is being asked: "What do they mean for 1952?" At this stage, obviously, it is anybody's guess. With the world full of diplomatic and military uncertainties, it is foolish to assume that things political and economic will remain as they are until 1952. But, by way of summarizing the two central features of the 1950 election (the normal midterm character of the results in the House and the few surprises in the senatorial races), it can be said that had we had a Presidential as well as a congressional election last November 7, we would have seen another Democratic victory of the proportions of 1948.

The 1952 outcome will, of course, depend on the domestic and international issues that prevail 18 months from now, on the business and agricultural conditions then, on the candidates chosen at the national conventions, on campaign strategy, and on turn-out or voting interest. How these factors will shape up is not too clear this far in advance. They serve to give a cloudy appearance to the so-called statistical crystal ball. But I expect this cloud of uncertainty to lift as we approach 1952, so I would suggest that you preserve for future use some of the lessons you may have learned from the political statistical analysis I have presented to you.

Turkey's Place in Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Ankara Government Worried," written by Constantine Brown, and published in the Evening Star of April 27, 1951, dealing with the place of Turkey in the defense program.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANKARA GOVERNMENT WORRIED—AMBASSADOR ERKIN CALLED HOME FOR CONSULTATION AS UNITED STATES FAILS TO INCLUDE TURKEY IN DEFENSE PLANS

(By Constantine Brown)

The slowness of the State Department to include Turkey in any kind of formal defense program has led to Ankara's order to its Ambassador here, Feridun Cemal Erkin, to return immediately for consultations.

The Turkish Government is worried. It borders Russia on the east and Moscow's satellite, Bulgaria, on the west. Thus, Turkey is more directly threatened by Kremlin aggressiveness than any North Atlantic Pact nation.

In spite of that immediate threat the Ankara Government has rushed to Korea 10,000 of its best soldiers, whose fighting ability has won the praise of General MacArthur and all top-ranking American officers who have been in Korea.

The Turkish Government has drawn the attention of Secretary of State Acheson to the fact that the country is exposed to Soviet aggression and has suggested that it be included in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This was turned down by the French and British Governments. Since the veto power exists in the NATO, there was nothing that the State Department could do. The refusals by London and Paris were final.

The Ankara Government since last October has proposed a mutual assistance pact between the United States and Turkey on the pattern of those which that country has had with France and Britain since 1939. Ankara stressed the fact that the Turkish people—and Turkey is a democracy where the government cannot ignore public sentiment—while determined to fight to the last ditch, are concerned over the reluctance of America to pledge all-out assistance in the event of Soviet aggression.

In a speech at Philadelphia last Thursday, Ambassador Erkin expressed his government's views by saying: "The Western European Union has been based on an artificial separation of free Europe into two distinct segments. Consequently, one part of free Europe only has been extended the privilege of being admitted to the pact, whereas the other part has been left outside of the arrangement."

Ankara's many representations to the State Department have remained without positive results. The top officials of our Government have been considering the situation sympathetically for several months, but that was all.

Meanwhile, the threat of a third world war has been increasing and Turkey is in the first line of fire. Since French and British opposition to inclusion of Turkey in NATO could not be overcome, Ankara insists that a regional pact between America and Turkey be concluded at the earliest possible moment.

The Russian propagandists already are trying to take advantage of the reluctance of our Government to commit itself to a mutual assistance pact by telling the Turkish people that the United States wants their manpower as cannon fodder, but is not interested in any actual commitments for her defense.

Ambassador Erkin stated in Philadelphia that: "Turkey is the vital key to the whole Mediterranean area; the solid wall which stops the armies of aggression from descending toward the Arab countries and the Mediterranean, the plug which stops communism from rolling toward the south. The collapse of Turkey would mean the loss of the Mediterranean and would affect adversely American security."

These views have been expressed even more forcefully by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in executive hearings before the Armed Services Committees of Congress.

"Only a strong free Europe supported by the United States can secure peace," the spokesman of the Turkish Government added. "But today free Europe is not strong and free Europe is not complete."

Besides this vital political angle, Turkey is worried about the little support it receives from us in the economic field. Because of her strategic position Turkey has been forced to spend since 1939 as much as 55 percent of her budget for national defense. Until 1950 she was able to meet the deficit by domestic and foreign loans and by increased taxation.

The assistance given Turkey by the Truman military aid program and by the ECA has helped to some extent. But as the international situation deteriorated Turkey had to make greater sacrifices for her military program.

Victory in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 27, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD a column by Walter Lippmann, distinguished Washington journalist, which appeared in the April 22 issue of the Washington Post. Mr. Lippmann warns:

Great victories can never be won cheaply, but only by sweat, blood, and tears. The great wars which must be waged in order to win great victories should not be begun in the illusion or under the pretense that they are little and easy wars.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW
(By Walter Lippmann)
PROGRAM FOR A VICTORY

The crucial portion of General MacArthur's speech came, of course, when he talked about Korea. He had recommended, he said, six measures which were designed to support our forces committed to Korea and to bring hostilities to an end with the least possible delay and at a saving of countless American and allied lives. These six measures, he told the Congress, would bring victory and in war there is no substitute for victory.

General MacArthur's program for a victory arrived at with the least possible delay and at a saving of countless lives is strenuously opposed by all our fighting allies in Korea and it has been rejected by the President and his civilian and military advisers. That is not because the opposition consists of people who would not like to have a victory and to save lives and to end the hostilities as quickly as possible. The opposition comes from those who do not believe that General MacArthur's program will do what he told Congress it would do. They do not believe that the six measures he named can bring about that victory over China which he talked about.

The six measures for victory are to bomb Manchuria, to do air reconnaissance of China's coastal area and Manchuria, to intensify the economic blockade which is already partially in effect, to impose a naval blockade of the China coast, to send reinforcements to Korea, and to give logistical support to Chiang for operations against the Chinese mainland. General MacArthur argued that these measures would defeat China. Why? Because "China is already engaging with the maximum power it can commit." General MacArthur thinks that these measures may not bring Soviet Russia into the war because the "Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves."

Thus General MacArthur is assuming that the Air Force can bomb China, that the Navy can blockade China against Soviet and other ships, that the Navy and Air Force can organize and support invasions or raids by Chinese infantry from Formosa, but that Red China can do no more in reply than she is now doing, and that Soviet Russia will not necessarily do more than she is now doing.

This is a remarkable series of assumptions to make. Severally and jointly these assumptions amount to saying that the United States can wage war against China, which in another passage he described as "a new and dominant power in Asia," and that nothing more will happen to us, indeed that less will happen to us, than is already happening to us in Korea.

If the general is right in his estimates and calculations as he gave them to the Congress, then this would be the cheapest and easiest victory over a great power in the history of warfare. No wonder Senator TAFT is enchanted with the prospect of so big a victory with such a little war.

At each stage since June 25 we have done what General MacArthur wishes to do once more: We have promised ourselves big and glittering results with what, as the event showed, were quite inadequate military means. On June 27 the President committed "air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support." On June 30 he authorized the use of "certain supporting ground units." The supporting ground units soon became most of the American Army as it then existed. On October 8, having defeated the aggressor south of the thirty-eighth parallel, we entered North Korea and began the march to the Chinese and Soviet frontiers. This we said to ourselves was the end of the war—nothing would happen while we mopped up the defeated army in North Korea.

Now we are being told that nothing will happen, except that we shall of course be victorious in Korea, if we bomb and blockade and invade China. Each time it was going to take only a little more military action to obtain great and glorious results. Only sea and air power, then merely some supporting ground units, then nothing but a mopping up action against a defeated enemy, and now no war, and not many casualties, but only some bombing and some blockading and some transporting and arming of Chinamen. Then victory, for which there is no substitute in war, will be ours.

Great victories can never be won cheaply but only by blood and sweat and tears. The great wars which must be waged in order to win great victories should not be begun in the illusion or under the pretense that they are little and easy wars.

It is not fair to the American people to permit them to think that one of the famous generals of our age believes that the wretched war in Korea can be ended victoriously and soon by a few measures which, it would seem, would cost the American people very little.

MacArthur Removal Indicates Internal Ailment in American Foreign Policy, Says Legion Commander

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including a statement by Jerome E. Host, department commander, the American Legion of Wisconsin, which appeared in the May issue of Badger Legionnaire.

Mr. Speaker, both General MacArthur and Commander Host are members of the Alonzo Cudworth Post of the American Legion, in Milwaukee, where today MacArthur is a distinguished guest. Mr. Host speaks the sentiments of most Wisconsin Legionnaires, and his statement is a great tribute to the deposed Supreme Commander in the Pacific, Wisconsin's outstanding citizen.

MACARTHUR REMOVED—HOST MAKES STATEMENT

Following the announcement of President Truman's removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from all of his Far East commands, Department Commander Jerome E. Host issued the following statement:

"In my mind the removal of General MacArthur, shocking as it is, is merely the ugly visible blemish that indicates the internal ailment in American foreign policy. It proves tragically that we are in grave danger of losing our sovereignty as a Nation, since seemingly the theory of appeasement and subjugation of United States interests to the interests of Britain and France has permeated the entire thinking of the State Department.

"I believe that the removal of General MacArthur will strike a mortal blow to our prestige in Asia, and will certainly make no contribution to what the American Legion supposed was our ultimate goal in Korea—the containment of the advance of communism. Weighing the benefits of the President's action against the irrevocable harm, my only conclusion is that the United States and the United States interests must inevitably suffer greatly.

"It is my fervent hope that public opinion will rise in a great swell to decry the mockery of sacrificing American lives and American self-respect in an effort to meekly follow the bidding of Britain to the detriment of our own welfare.

"Britain's amazing proposition that Formosa be given to the Chinese Reds as a free gift, and that the Chinese Reds be given a voice in the Japanese peace treaty is part of the same pattern that led to General MacArthur's removal. His principal crime, as I see it, is that the general chooses to resist the attempts to make the United States subservient to a group of alleged allies who eagerly accept billions of American dollars but refuse any substantial military assistance. It is tragic that this fierce protection of American values should result in his dismissal.

"Equally tragic is the fact that reaction to the President's decision has descended to the political arena, where one political party blindly accepts his action and the other bitterly opposes it. Surely the significance of the removal of General MacArthur is a matter above partisan politics."

Alaska Feels Pinch of Its Winged Heels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 24, 1951

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, air service in Alaska is the lifeline of that country and of such importance that I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues articles by Louis R. Huber, noted and authoritative writer on Alaskan problems. Mr. Huber, a special correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, reports in these articles certain facts and statements that I believe have not had publication elsewhere:

SAFETY DEVICES AID FLIGHTS IN NORTHLAND

SEWARD, ALASKA.—In the early days of flying in Alaska, a bush pilot was carrying a passenger from Seward to Anchorage.

"The pilot picked the wrong passage through the Chugach Mountains and, instead of flying through, we found ourselves headed straight for the end of a blind-alley canyon," related the passenger afterward.

Crash?

No, the pilot merely performed an Immelman—zoomed his plane straight up, back in the direction he had been coming from, and winged over.

"We flew back out of the canyon, found the right passage, and flew on to Anchorage," said the passenger.

Tales of derring-do have long been told of Alaska's intrepid bush pilots. Bob Reeve, who is now head of his own scheduled airline flying from Anchorage out over the Aleutian Islands, once was sitting on a glacier in his Fairchild—engine running, luckily—when a williwaw whipped down, picked him and his craft up, and dumped them over a 5,000-foot ledge.

"I managed to gun the engine and get the plane out of a spin when it was only 200 feet from the rocks below. Then I flew out as if nothing had happened," he says.

Hairbreadth escapes occur less frequently today. Forty-four Civil Aeronautics Administration stations are scattered over the entire territory. Their emergency landing fields, communication services, radio beams, and weather-reporting facilities enable all aircraft to fly with as much safety as in the States.

An added safeguard to Alaska flying is the work of the United States Air Force's Tenth Air Rescue Squadron.

Activated in 1946, it had, up to the end of September 1950, flown a total of more than 1,000,000 "million miles" and nearly 10,000 mission hours.

More than 1,500 individuals were rescued or received assistance from the Tenth during this period.

Its base is Elmendorf Air Force Base near Anchorage. Its equipment includes helicopters, liaison-type planes, C-47's, gliders, C-54's, B-17's with lifeboat-dropping facilities, bush airplanes, and a variety of land- and snow-traveling vehicles.

Col. Bernt Balchen, famed Arctic flier, was the Tenth's commanding officer during the period in which it grew to its present efficiency.

Though now reassigned to other duty, Colonel Balchen is one of the strongest boosters for Alaska as the air crossroads of the world.

With Maj. Gen. Frank A. Armstrong, Jr., then commanding general of the Alaskan Air Command, he flew nonstop across the North Pole in 1949 in a C-54 to Norway, and then back via the Pole to Washington, D. C.

AIR SERVICE CALLED INADEQUATE

(By Louis R. Huber)

SEATTLE.—Ever since barnstormers junked their Jennies and began flying with a serious purpose, Alaska has been the land of the airplane—but now the Territory's winged heels are pinching.

The northland's great attachment to aviation is not an accident. Distances greater than those of the West, mountains higher than any others on the continent, impassable summer tundra, and lung-freezing cold make it so.

Because of these, Alaskans fly at least 15 times as much as people in the States, and depend on airplanes for a large share of their freight needs.

Civilian landings and take-offs at Anchorage, the central air hub, stand about tenth in the Nation, and rival those of New York City, Chicago, St. Louis, and Los Angeles.

FLOATPLANE SYSTEM

Southeastern Alaska, with its Norway-like fjords and rugged coast line, has a floatplane system unequaled elsewhere in the entire world.

Three scheduled and a varying number of nonscheduled airlines link the northland with the States and the Orient. Sixteen internal scheduled airlines and about 80 bush pilots fly daily in the Territory.

The internal operators—Alaska's very own—fly everything from Cubs and helicopters through Bellancas, Stinsons, Norsemen, DC-3's, C-46's, and DC-4's. The total of these commercial aircraft operating entirely within Alaska is well above 200.

For Alaska's 128,000 people, this is (not counting privately owned, military, and naval planes) about 1 aircraft for every 50 people. None of it is luxury flying, either; it's serious business.

COMPLAINTS CITED

"If you took airplanes away from Alaska," one veteran northern airman told me last summer, "the place would fold up in 30 days."

He was right, of course. The hauling of people, mail, and freight by air is the most important activity in the northland. Nevertheless, Alaskans feel that aviation is falling short of its capabilities.

Here are samples of their complaints:

Golden North Airways of Seattle and General Airways of Portland—both nonscheduled outfits—recently were ordered to stop flying because their trips were too regular and too frequent.

FOUR PARTS LISTED

Alaskans say this doesn't make sense. The nonscheduled airlines springing up after World War II, they point out, brought Alaskan air-freight rates down from 90 to 15 cents a pound, and passenger fares, Seattle to Fairbanks, or Anchorage, from $125 to $60.

Sitka, the first capital of Alaska, wants a direct airline connection with Seattle. Sitka had such a connection when Totem Air Service, a nonscheduled outfit, flew between the two cities. But when Totem applied for scheduled certification no action was taken.

Last January in the Eskimo settlement of Kotzebue on the Arctic Ocean, Judith Bailey, of Noatak, waited 5 weeks for transportation to White Mountain, where she was to enter school.

She had cash fare ready to pay, but a local bush pilot could not carry her. It was illegal for him to do so because a scheduled airline served White Mountain—but only when it was profitable for it to fly a DC-3 there.

NO GENERAL TRANSPORT

Alaskan aviation is divided into four parts: (1) Bush pilots, smallest of northern operators but nonetheless important; (2) internal scheduled (certificated) airlines, most of them made up of former bush pilots; (3) nonscheduled or irregular States-to-Alaska carriers, 90 percent of them World War II Air Force veterans competing intensely using war-surplus transport aircraft; and (4) the scheduled States-to-Alaska operators.

Two of the four are not complaining about anything: they are the scheduled operators, both internal and States-to-Alaska.

The other two, however—the bush pilots and the "nonsked" States-to-Alaska flyers—exist in constant concern either of being gradually choked out by Government restrictions, or of being suddenly ordered to stop flying because they are held in violation of regulations.

"It wouldn't be so bad if Alaska had other means of transportation, such as are available in the States—railroads, busses, and highways," says Alaska's Gov. Ernest Gruening.

"But in Alaska there is, for all practical purposes, only one mode of transportation—the airplane. The Civil Aeronautics Board never has taken this into consideration, and keeps on trying to regulate Alaska flying as if were in the States."

Alaska's Delegate to Congress, E. L. BARTLETT, questions the entire philosophy of the Civil Aeronautics Act, passed originally in 1934 by Congress as a reform from abuses of those days.

As to safety, the present nonscheduled airlines flying to Alaska have never had a fatal accident; the scheduled airlines have had several bad crashes.

REPORT ASSAILED

For its part, the CAB maintains it has had the best interests of Alaska and Alaskans at heart.

"The Board has been fully aware of what aviation means to Alaska," says Edward E. Slattery, CAB's public-information chief in Washington, D. C. "The Board has expressly recognized the Territory's dependence on the bush pilot, frequently making special provisions to permit the continuance of their services."

When it comes to the nonscheduled carriers, however, Mr. Slattery points to the Alaska Service case—the CAB's own study of air service from the States to Alaska—and says, "That is the answer to a great portion of the problem."

The Alaska Service case began with hearings in Alaska in the fall of 1948. Late in 1949 William F. Cusick, a CAB examiner, submitted a 118-page report on it, recommending that two scheduled airlines be allowed to provide passenger, cargo, and mail service to Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks.

Alaskans at once attacked Mr. Cusick's report as utterly unrealistic, and inadequate for dealing with Alaska's air problems.

The final decision on the Alaska Service case, meanwhile, still is awaited. It must have the approval, before issuance, of President Truman. This is a hopeful circumstance for the irregular carriers.

"EVERYTHING BY AIR"

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA.—"Up in Alaska, full loads of eggs, fresh meat, produce—things moving from distributor to market—have been going by air as the normal method of transportation.

"It is the first large-scale true air-freight service to be established anywhere in the world. In the States, we may move expedited packages by air freight; in Alaska we carry everything that way."

That was the statement of Amos E. Heacock, president of Air Transport Associates, a nonscheduled States-to-Alaska airline, before a congressional committee last year.

He appeared as spokesman for the Independent Air Carrier Conference of America—the association of nonscheduled airlines—in hearings on bills providing for separation of subsidy from air-mail pay to the scheduled airlines.

Manufacturing Opportunities in the Southeast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, the Southeast is growing rapidly as a market for all kinds of manufactured products.

Alabama is rapidly becoming a cattle country. No State is better suited to livestock. No State has greater potential markets for livestock and dairy products than that afforded by Alabama cities.

The same factors that make Alabama a great livestock State—abundant acreage suitable for grazing, 50 inches of annual rainfall, and a 10-month growing season—also ideally suit it to the production of livestock feed.

The production of feed requires lime, fertilizers, high-quality seeds, and feed-mixing equipment.

The expanding livestock production is leading to the establishment of those manufacturing plants that process livestock products. The market for such products is at home.

As a part of my remarks, I include a recent article by Robert W. Kincey, published in the Birmingham News:

SOUTHEAST MANUFACTURING SURVEY DISCLOSES THERE IS READILY AVAILABLE MARKET IN AREA

(By Robert W. Kincey)

The men who buy the goods point this out in the first of a series of surveys on what the Southeast needs to manufacture or produce to more nearly supply its own needs:

"The one fact we find repeated over and over in making this survey of manufacturing opportunities in the Southeast is the readily available market here for great quantities of all kinds of manufactured goods."

In the first current survey, which deals with agricultural and dairy products, the significant statement is made early in the report that urban centers in the Territory consume far greater quantities of these goods than are produced within the area.

And that fact, probably to be pointed out again and again as the committee takes up other commodities, is the peg upon which it hangs the need for further output in a program to build and sustain regional economy.

Of the total of agricultural production in the Southeast, it is reported, nearly one-third is consumed on the farm for various human and animal needs.

Says the survey in part:

"Industrial research in the South, expanding as never before, is at work on projects in cotton, cottonseed products, tobacco, peanuts, citrus fruits and other agricultural products.

"Such efforts will bring forth new goods, new services and new industries and do much to improve the standard of living and to provide jobs at good wages."

Placing new emphasis upon a point now generally recognized in the South, the committee lists livestock as one of the most important sources of total farm income, and as one of the region's fastest growing industries.

Value of livestock on the farms in the Southeast in 1949 was listed at $1,298,000,000. The section is listed as a natural livestock area by virtue of its abundant acreage suitable for grazing, ample rainfall, and the long growing season.

And by the same taken, production of livestock feed is ideally suited to the Southeast.

"The trend in recent years has been upward with respects to both quality and quantity of livestock. This is a significant fact and represents definite progress in a most desirable direction," the report says.

The purchasing agents whose business it is to buy most advantageously while taking into account regional economy and the opportunities involved to build that economy, find:

"In addition to the spendable income it (the livestock industry) creates, and the effect of that income on local markets for a variety of end goods, it also creates an activity which supplies a long list of materials for further processing into end goods.

"As an indication of one of the ways in which markets and raw materials are involved, the following may be of interest:

"Development of permanent pastures requires the use of lime, fertilizers, and high-quality seeds. Production of hay offers unusual opportunities for artificial drying equipment of both the semicommercial and individual farm type.

"This involves the moving of large quantities of air and therefore represents a substantial market for forced-air motor-driven equipment in medium to large sizes.

"In addition, there is a market for milling equipment used in the preparation of mixed feeds. Locally produced ingredients can be converted into animal and poultry feeds for nearby markets and those markets have all the appearance of exceptional enlargement in the years ahead."

The report lists a partial number of manufacturing operations whose principal raw materials are livestock products.

They include:

Locker plants and other dressed-poultry operations, incubator and brooder operations, egg-grading and packing plants, albumen glue for bottle caps and egg shells for feeds, pillow, cushion, and comforter stuffing, whole milk, cream, butter, ice cream, evaporated milk, and products of cheese plants, tanning plants, soap factories, and many others.

Covered also are field crops, nurseries, and related subjects.

The report emphasizes that the drying, freezing, and canning of fresh fruits and vegetables in the Southeast has never been fully developed.

Specific information is available from planning boards, departments of commerce, power companies, railroads, chambers of commerce, banks, and elsewhere throughout the region.

Truman Policy Vacuum Springs a Leak

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an editorial entitled "Truman Policy Vacuum Springs a Leak" which was published in the Johnstown Democrat, Johnstown, Pa., on Wednesday, April 25, 1951:

TRUMAN POLICY VACUUM SPRINGS A LEAK

The Communist hordes of Asia—better than half a million strong—have for the third time poured across the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea.

This new offensive, which Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway says "may well prove decisive," apparently is designed, again in General Ridgway's words, "to drive United Nations forces from Korea, or to destroy them, regardless of the further destruction of his own troops."

This is what we have been waiting for. Strange to say, the enemy offensive is part of the Truman-Acheson policy vacuum in which we are fighting in Korea a "limited war" that in its first 9 months cost America more battle casualties than the first full year of World War II.

Speaking to the Nation by radio and television April 11, the same day President Truman announced the discharge of General MacArthur, the Chief Executive announced this negative program for Korea:

"The United Nations forces have put up a tremendous fight in Korea and have inflicted very heavy casualties on the enemy. Our forces are stronger now than they have been before. These are plain facts which may discourage the Chinese Communists from continuing their attack.

"* * * The free world as a whole is growing in military strength every day. In the United States, in Western Europe, and throughout the world, freemen are alert to the Soviet threat and are building their defenses. This may discourage the Communist rulers from continuing the war in Korea—and from undertaking new acts of aggression elsewhere.

"If the Communist authorities realize they cannot defeat us in Korea, if they realize it would be foolhardy to widen the hostilities beyond Korea, then they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression.

"A peaceful settlement may then be possible. The door is always open.

"Then we may achieve a settlement in Korea which will not compromise the principles and purposes of the United Nations.

"* * * Defeat of aggression in Korea may be the turning point in the world's search for a practical way of achieving peace and security."

Well, the Chinese Commies have not been discouraged from continuing the war in Korea. They are hitting our boys with everything they have. The Truman-Acheson policy vacuum already has sprung a leak.

So now the second step in Mr. Truman's may-if policy goes into effect—if they (the Chinese Reds) realize they cannot defeat us in Korea * * * they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression."

Then—on the basis of that great, big if—the third step—"a peaceful settlement may then be possible * * *."

We submit, this is no foreign policy. It is the total absence of one. Furthermore, already it has started to fall apart. For it was predicated on the pious hope that the Commies may have been discouraged, a hope they proved false this week with their new offensive.

Is there any greater chance that the remaining may-if hopes in the Truman-Acheson policy vacuum will come to pass?

But General Ridgway doesn't seem to share his commander's naive faith. General Ridgway only yesterday said the new offensive seems to be "another major effort by our Communist enemy to drive United Nations forces from Korea, or to destroy them." That does not sound like a peaceful future for Korea—now or for some time to come.

Faced with that kind of a determined enemy, common sense condemns President Truman's Pollyanna approach, hedged in between the words "may" and "if." Either we must fight back with everything we have—even at the risk that the war will spread, a risk we took in the beginning—or we must get out of Korea, draw an atom-bomb line and tell the Commies they'd better not cross it—or else.

Export of America's Freedoms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk the text of an address I delivered last Saturday afternoon by transcription for broadcast from Station WGN in Chicago. The subject of the address was America's Exportation of Her Great Enterprise Genius. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPORT OF AMERICA'S FREEDOMS

How can we—you and I—as citizens help to contribute to the future peace of the world?

That is a vital question, as I'm sure you'll agree, particularly in this critical stage of world affairs—with war or peace hanging in the balance.

One answer to that question which I am proposing to my listeners today is this: Let us all help to export America's great freedoms, her great values—political, economic, and moral—throughout the world.

RELATION OF THIS THEME TO CURRENT CRISIS

Now, what do I mean by export and by the term value?

And just how does this whole idea fit in with the current crisis? How does it fit in, from a general standpoint, with the approach that has been suggested by our great American hero, Douglas MacArthur, of whom we of Wisconsin and of all America have shown ourselves to be so rightly proud? Yes, just how will this idea of exporting our values be of real help in the cause of peace?

Well, my friends, you will recall that in the early days of America's history, the nations of Europe exported to this new continent manpower in the form of waves of immigration. Europe also sent us goods and materials with which we built homes, stores, factories and so forth.

With the passage of the years, the American people grew until the twentieth century they had attained leadership in every phase of international relations: economic, military, political, and basically spiritual.

With the twentieth century, America became the greatest exporter in the world. You could find America's sewing machines deep in the heart of darkest Africa. You could see American mousetraps throughout the world. But, unfortunately, while we had done a superlative job of exporting our physical goods, we had not shipped abroad the great spiritual concepts which have made America the Nation that she is. Now, what are those concepts?

BASIC SPIRITUAL IDEALS

1. The concept of man's individual dignity, the concept of the sacredness of man as a child of God.

2. The concept of freedom to take one's chances, to gain profit or to experience loss, without Government intervention.

3. The concept of faithfulness to one's spoken and written word of fidelity to one's contracts.

4. The concept of a government of limited rather than of unlimited power: a government divided among three coequal and coordinating branches: Legislative, executive, and judicial.

Now, my friends, as we look about the world today, we can see that the world desperately needs, and in many instances, hungers for these concepts. I don't mean to say that we want to make the world over in our own image. We recognize that every nation has its unique background, its history, its culture, its tongue which it prides. Every nation wants to be sovereign and independent. The day of imperialism is ended.

But we have learned in times past that if we do a good salesmanship job of selling American values, we can create good will and friendship among all peoples. We can help them to help themselves. They can raise their economic standards, they can achieve the home front cooperation which we have enjoyed. There can be an end to the bitter civil disturbances which have played havoc in so many countries.

NATURE OF EXPORT CRUSADE

What I am proposing today, therefore, is a great export crusade, a crusade for spiritual achievement, rather than mere material progress. Who do I propose to embark on this crusade? I suggest not the Federal Government nor State and local governments, but the genius of American private-enterprise system. I mean the genius of our companies, our unions, our clubs, our associations; I mean everyone of us.

For example, I would like to see private business organizations, through the International Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, intensify their effort to help sell American concepts abroad.

I should like to see the great organized labor unions—the CIO, the AFL, and the independent unions—sell American concepts to foreign labor unions, to a greater degree than they ever have before.

I should like to see America's churches intensify their efforts in cooperation with their brother denominations abroad and through the great interdenominational church channels.

I should like to see the veterans' organizations of America, the farm groups of America, and so on down the line intensify their efforts to sell the American concepts of freedom, initiative, enterprise, fair dealing.

Lastly, I should like to see the American people carry on a great letter-writing crusade, a crusade such as many of them embarked on prior to the crucial Italian election several years ago, which ended in a great victory over communism.

Now, my friends, all of us know that there are a great number of active international organizations—church, veterans, labor, and business groups—now underway. But I say that these organizations have not realized their fullest potentialities.

Of course, I don't want the American members of those international groups to assume that they can "take these organizations over." On the contrary, as in our experience in the United Nations, I think that we must act as equals and as partners in each of these groups.

However, I do want Americans to recognize their mission, a mission to inject the virus of free enterprise in the body politic and economic of foreign countries.

WORLD HAS WRONG PICTURE OF US

It is important that this be done? Why? Because the world conceives of America as materialistic in its approach, as exclusively interested in the almighty dollar. To be sure, the Voice of America has done and can do a constructive job to show foreign peoples that Soviet Russia has painted false pictures of us. Nevertheless, it will take a great export crusade if we are to change the world's basic view of the typical American.

EXAMPLE OF PHILIPPINE UNREST

Even in a country like the Philippines, which has been America's ward and which on a July 4 similar to our own Independence Day we freed—even in a country like the Philippines there is apparently considerable misinterpretation of America's basic approach. As a result there is today in the Philippines a force known as the Huks, a tightly disciplined, well indoctrinated military force whose units considerably envelop the capital city of Manila. Those Huk units are responsible for a whole wave of assassinations, terrorism, destruction of towns, etc.

If, however, we were to export to the Philippines American concepts in a better way than we have done before, I think that we could help change the conditions which have bred hatred and discontent, and which the Huks have fanned into active rebellion.

Now, I do not want anyone to think that we cannot learn in turn from foreign peoples. On the contrary, the American people have constantly signified that they can learn and are eager to learn about the best values of foreign lands. Exports must be a two-way street, with imports also.

If you believe in this idea of an export crusade, I hope that in your organization, whether it be labor, business, fraternal, veterans, church, etc., you will speak to your officers and your fellow members.

DON'T OVEREMPHASIZE MATERIAL VALUES

I do want to stress one word of caution in our contacts with foreign peoples. Let us be careful that we are not boastful about our material values to a world two-thirds of those people are barely subsisting on a poverty diet. It is completely inappropriate for us to boast about our refrigerators and deep freezers to people living on the edge of starvation. Moreover, many of our concepts are such as not to be capable of being understood by the average foreign man in the street, unless we convey our concepts in terms that each people will understand, based on its own language and culture. In other words, we shall have to become so familiar with the backgrounds of each people, that we will know how best to speak to them.

The great common denominator which every people can understand is the concept of America's faith in a divine creator. The spiritual plane is in fact the most effective plane on which we can contact foreign peoples, and at the same time it is the most powerful plane on which we ourselves can realize our birthright. Material remedies for spiritual problems will not be adequate to the challenge of this age. We need a spiritual answer to the basic spiritual problem of our times.

American genius has helped to create the atomic bomb, the jet plane, the supersonic missile, and a thousand other modern devices. Let our great genius harness itself to the task of creating spiritual bonds between peoples. Let us give light that each people will find its own way. Let's radiate that light through the Communist darkness. Let us keep the American lighthouse burning through the night so that it can be seen by every ship in the storm-tossed sea.

Right now, America is watching with great anxiety reports from the battlefront in Korea, as our own and allied forces meet the shock of the onrushing Chinese offensive. But you and I know that if, perhaps in past years, America had been able to better sell her concepts in China, in Korea, and elsewhere in Asia, we might to a considerable extent have avoided the critical situation which now faces us.

MAC ARTHUR REPRESENTED GREAT VALUES

When Douglas MacArthur originally entered Japan, after the surrender, he came not just as a conqueror, but as a superb exponent of American character, American integrity, American spiritual devotion, American fair dealing. Douglas MacArthur in turn sold those virtues brilliantly to the 83,000,000 Japanese people and to most of Asia. Such personal and national salesmanship abroad is what is so needed today. Men like Douglas MacArthur can and must be earnestly urged to continue to help us in this great task of leadership.

But remember, my friends, you and I can't sell a product unless you and I have three things:

(a) Knowledge of the value of our product.

(b) Confidence in ourself and the institution we represent.

(c) Knowledge of our customer.

Well, folks, if you believe in this export crusade become active in the organization of your choice. Emphasize the importance of their international work. Emphasize the need for more foreign contact through letters, through personal meetings, through conventions so that we can get to know the world better and so that the world can get to know us better.

WE NEED DYNAMIC ENTHUSIASM

First, however, let each of us seek a better understanding of our own way of life so that we will really know the commodity that we are trying to sell. Let us become reinvigorated with the great values of the American scene, the values of this constitutional Republic. Let us gain enthusiasm for our salesmanship job so that we can do the sort of job that is characteristic of a dynamic America.

Let's get busy on this export crusade because on it, in considerable part, may depend the future peace and freedom of the world. This doesn't mean that we should forget our other obligations. We must, of course, be adequately prepared in a military way. We must get to the bottom of the facts insofar as the far eastern controversy is concerned. We must hear America's great Gen. Douglas MacArthur testify regarding the series of events which led up to the President's ill-advised action in dismissing him. But we must also be active on this spiritual front.

CONCLUSION

Thank you for your kind attention to this broadcast. I hope that each of us may carry on his responsibility as I have humbly submitted it to you today. Let's export America's great values. Thank you.

MacArthur Insists Issues Are Global

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Issues Are Global, MacArthur Insists," published in the Washington (Pa.) Observer, April 20, 1951. The editorial is based on General MacArthur's address to the Congress on April 19 last.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ISSUES ARE GLOBAL, MACARTHUR INSISTS

In his dramatic appearance before the Congress of the United States yesterday, Gen. Douglas MacArthur insisted that the fight against communism is of global scope and that Asia is just as important as Europe.

MacArthur declared:

"You cannot appease or otherwise surrender to communism in Asia without simultaneously undermining our efforts to halt its advance in Europe."

Relative to the fighting in Korea, General MacArthur said he was not consulted by the President previous to the decision that sent American troops into that conflict, but "that decision, from a military viewpoint, proved a sound one."

General MacArthur denied very emphatically that the course he proposed for continuing the war against the Communists called for the use of "our ground forces" in metropolitan China, stating:

"While no man in his right mind would advocate sending ground forces into continental China, and such was never given thought, the new situation (participation of the Chinese Reds in the war in Korea) did urgently demand a drastic revision of strategic planning if our political aim was to defeat this new enemy as we had defeated the old one."

That decision, he asserted, was not forthcoming.

The general then reiterated the four points he has voiced before:

Economic blockade against Chinese to halt shipments by Great Britain and even the United States of needed materials into that country.

Imposition of a naval blockade on the Chinese coast.

Removal of restrictions preventing the bombing of bases of the Chinese Reds.

Use of the troops of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek, about 600,000 strong now stationed on Formosa.

President Truman and Secretary Acheson have opposed such procedure.

Meanwhile, General MacArthur said our forces are being depleted by attrition in an aimless war.

Victory is the goal of war at all times, he asserted.

The appearance of General MacArthur before Congress was one of the most dramatic in the history of the Nation. Admittedly a great military leader and statesman, he had been stripped of his commands in the Far East.

With the courage of a true soldier, he appeared before Congress to give an accounting of his brilliant leadership in the Far East. He did it with dignity and without rancor or bitterness. Despite his 71 years and the stress and strain of recent days, he stood erect and resolute.

One admirer declared he symbolized "The American Eagle."

No leader of recent history has displayed similar courage. He refused to abandon his conscientious beliefs and the course he believed right. He chose to sacrifice position, a truly heroic gesture in this era of expediency, appeasement, and lust for power and material gain.

General MacArthur has increased in stature and esteem by the manner in which he has conducted himself in a crisis so important to the Nation and its people.

American Policy Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the Times-Herald this morning, April 30, comes the following:

A SUPINE CONGRESS

Senator TAFT stated the plain truth when he said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff, by their conduct in the MacArthur affair, had proved themselves politically subservient to the administration. His implication that the Joint Chiefs are political stooges was disputed by Senator FULBRIGHT, the Arkansas Rhodes scholar, who gave the usual proof that he is more English than American.

General MacArthur, in his Chicago speech, made it plain that the English and the United Nations are running America's foreign policy. FULBRIGHT, as an American Laster, is of course, for both. It is no help to the country that such a man should be in the Senate.

Senator TAFT said that the recent address of General Bradley, challenging MacArthur's recommendations for Korea, had been "written, in effect, by the State Department." It is certain that the speech was submitted for inspection there, and that Secretary Acheson, who is at least as loyal as FULBRIGHT to England, found it to his satisfaction.

The British, as is now established, were instrumental in getting MacArthur fired, fearing that the positive military measures he advocated would alienate Communist China to the detriment of British colonial and trade interests. It has also been said that the British hope to exploit MacArthur's removal as chief of the occupation of Japan so that they could disrupt the Japanese economy and kill off a trade rival.

In these devious moves, it might be expected that Acheson, with his empire parentage, would follow the British line. It is equally clear why FULBRIGHT should do so, for as the recipient of an English education through the largess of Cecil Rhodes he was subjected to those influences which Rhodes deliberately set about using his fortune to create.

In his will, written at the age of 24, and repeated four more times within 20 years, Rhodes directed that his fortune be used to establish "a secret society, the true aim and object whereof shall be the extension of British rule throughout the world, * * * and * * * the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British empire."

While services to England are to be expected from Acheson and FULBRIGHT, it is more surprising that the principal body of American military leaders should become a mere political appendage of the administration in the advancement of British policy. It is even more surprising that a Congress grown supine should barely voice a protest.

Instead of rebuking these anti-American forces, Congress has given the Pentagon everything that it has asked—divisions for an army to be placed in Europe for England's protection, a 24-month draft, and now, through House approval, an additional $6,400,000,000 in military appropriations, raising the total so far this year to almost fifty billion.

Meanwhile, as General MacArthur asserts, the "slaughter of America's sons" continues in Korea. As in World War II, when he commanded in the Pacific, that area has been relegated to the position of a neglected front, while all efforts again are designed to carry out the same basic program laid down in concert with the British for that war: "To give strong support to the United Kingdom in Europe."

Minority Leader MARTIN'S recent stalwart actions in the MacArthur affair provide Americans with a ray of hope. He realizes, it is plain, that the function of an opposition is to oppose. Under his leadership less resolute Republicans may recover their courage.

The Government's Policy in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excerpt from an address delivered by me before the Pennsylvania Greeters Association, Chapter No. 41, at the George Washington Hotel, Washington, Pa., on April 23, 1951, discussing General MacArthur's address to Congress on April 19, and our Government's policy in Asia.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a real pleasure to meet with your fine group.

The splendid hotels of our country are a typical product of the American system of free enterprise.

You have developed the highest standards of hospitality and good will through competition in providing the kind of service the people appreciate.

Fair competition, operating under freedom of the individual, is the American way. It has made the United States the greatest country in the world.

Today we are engaged in a great struggle to maintain the greatness of our Republic. Heroic young Americans are giving their precious lives to preserve our freedom and to safeguard the American way of life.

The tragic and desperate situation in Korea overshadows everything else in the hearts and minds of the American people.

Make no mistake about it. The people are aroused as never before. They realize that the dangers we face today will grow ever more menacing unless the leaders of our Nation adopt a course of action that will insure victory.

When I left Washington, D. C., yesterday I had received more than 30,000 telegrams and letters, and hundreds of telephone calls, denouncing the Truman administration for the dismissal of General MacArthur.

Many of the messages demanded that President Truman be impeached, and that Secretary Acheson be dismissed.

The letters and telegrams began arriving immediately after the President's midnight decision was announced removing General MacArthur from all his Pacific commands.

General MacArthur's magnificent address before the joint meeting of Congress touched off another barrage of telegrams and letters. They are still pouring in. Almost unanimously they express strong support of General MacArthur's program in the Far East.

In all my long experience in public life I have never witnessed such a tremendous outburst of public indignation.

To my mind General MacArthur voiced the sentiments of the American people when he said:

"In war, there is no substitute for victory."

But, my fellow Americans, those who influenced the President in his action against General MacArthur, offering their substitute for victory.

They offer appeasement.

They propose to buy off the enemy.

They would pay the price imposed by the Communist dictators.

They would surrender Formosa to Red China.

They would invite the Communist government of China into the family of nations.

And finally, they would admit representatives of Chinese aggression to the conference formulating the peace treaty with Japan.

That is what socialistic Great Britain wants.

It is what Communist China wants.

It is what Moscow wants.

It is not what the American people want.

These are the disgraceful, un-American proposals against which General MacArthur is making such a valiant protest.

It may be fortunate for the United States and the world that his clash with the Truman-Acheson policies have brought the issues out into the open.

For the first time in his brilliant career as a military leader MacArthur was fighting a war without hope of defeating the enemy.

Why was he bound and shackled by restrictions contrary to all sound military strategy?

Why was he forbidden to bomb and destroy the supply lines, troop concentrations, and air bases north of the Yalu River?

Why were the Communist forces given all the advantages of military initiative?

Why were they left free to withdraw to a safe sanctuary—to reinforce and resupply—and to renew the attack any time they saw fit?

One answer was given by President Truman in his radio address of April 11. He said, and I quote:

"So far, by fighting a limited war in Korea we have prevented aggression from succeeding and bringing on a general war."

No longer does he call it police action in support of the United Nations. Oh, no; now it is a limited war—an undeclared war—a war without action by Congress—the only branch of our Government which, under the Constitution, has the power to declare war.

Early last week the Chinese Reds, armed, equipped, and trained by Communist Russia, launched their most massive offensive of the Korean conflict.

They hurled 700,000 men against our forces on a front of almost 100 miles.

Why were they able to do this?

Only because they had complete assurance that they would not be molested while they built up their strength in the safety of Manchuria.

The attack was not unexpected. On the contrary, every military observer knew it was coming. President Truman knew it was coming.

In the radio speech to which I have referred he used these words, and I quote:

"In Korea itself, there are signs that the enemy is building up his ground forces for a new mass offensive. We also know that there have been large increases in the enemy's available air forces. If a new attack comes I feel confident it will be turned back."

But he did not say that our troops were being reinforced to meet the attack or how it would be turned back.

Our fighting forces could do nothing but wait until they were hit by the first shock of the enemy's onslaught.

How many American boys must die before we can achieve the so-called negotiated peace that Mr. Truman so earnestly hopes for?

So far as I am concerned I place more confidence in the position taken by that great soldier and diplomat, General MacArthur, whose words I quoted earlier and now repeat:

"In war there is no substitute for victory."

One of the high lights of General MacArthur's address was his statement that his military views have been fully shared, in the past, by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff.

More than a week has passed since General MacArthur made that statement. But so far no one in the Pentagon, no one in the State Department, no one in the White House, has challenged or even questioned its accuracy.

Instead, the whole power of the administration has been directed toward an attempt to smear and discredit the great soldier who has given 52 years of distinguished service to his country.

Directed by the White House, scores of investigators have been turned loose to search the records for every single bit of material that might be used to discredit General MacArthur.

In all our history no military leader has ever been given such shabby treatment by any President—not even given the customary opportunity to bid farewell to his troops. But his high place in the love and esteem of the American people was enthusiastically demonstrated by the tremendous ovations he received wherever he appeared.

Five years and seven months ago General MacArthur took his place at the head of the Japanese Government as supreme commander of the Allied Powers.

He had absolute power over a conquered people, a proud people, who worshipped their emperor as a god.

General MacArthur faced a difficult task but through his outstanding ability he succeeded in gaining the respect and confidence of the Japanese people and was winning them to a free way of life.

Previous experience in the Philippines prepared General MacArthur for his distinguished service in Japan. He not only developed the Filipino military force but he taught the people the ideals of the United States.

General MacArthur's fame will go down in history, not only as one of our most brilliant military leaders, but as a great statesmen and diplomat.

You will recall that General MacArthur in closing his address to Congress said:

"I now close my military career and just fade away—an old soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty."

That statement brings out what I consider one of the finest qualities of General MacArthur. He lives and works with an abiding faith in God.

It is not generally known that after he assumed control as supreme allied commander he made numerous requests upon various religious denominations in the United States to furnish him with more and more Bibles for distribution among the Japanese people.

He knew that if they were to rebuild their nation upon American ideals they would find guidance in the eternal truths of the Holy Bible—the source and inspiration of American freedom and independence.

Suggestion by Hon. Harold E. Stassen for Reconciliation Between the President and General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, a couple of days ago Hon. Harold E. Stassen addressed a letter to the President of the United States suggesting a reconciliation between him and Gen. Douglas MacArthur. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Stassen's letter and an editorial on the same subject from the New York Herald Tribune of Monday, April 30, 1951, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 28, 1951.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT TRUMAN: For the good of America please permit me to respectfully suggest that a reconciliation be brought about between you and Gen. Douglas MacArthur. If the disagreement runs its bitter course to the end, whatever its outcome may be, it can do no good for our country. The grave world situation requires above all the building of greater strength for America with which to face the world-wide threat of Communist imperialism. In this you are both agreed. The issue of peace and war must be above personalities or partisanship if America is to exercise constructive leadership among the free nations.

I therefore ask with humility that you consider extending an invitation to General MacArthur to meet and confer with you. I have not spoken to him but I am certain from my knowledge of him for many years that he would at once respond.

Regardless of past differences, I think you would agree that his advice would be very helpful now and in the months ahead on the problems relating to Japan, to Asia in general, and in the building of American armed strength.

Sincerely,

HAROLD E. STASSEN.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of April 30, 1951]

TO HEAL THE BREACH

The significance of Mr. Harold E. Stassen's appeal to President Truman and General MacArthur to meet and reconcile their differences does not lie wholly in its effect upon the two principals. The reaction to Mr. Stassen's proposal, interspersed though it was with some of the intransigent bitterness that marked the first stages of the controversy over General MacArthur's dismissal, shows how broad and deep is the desire to reknit the Nation's frayed unity and to resolve differences rationally and as Americans.

The differences are real and they are very important. They will be thrashed out in the forthcoming congressional hearings and in public debates; it is too much to expect that the discussion will not be attended by further confusions and further exasperations. No one would wish to see the dispute pushed out of sight, or a pretense of unity used to obscure it. The main question is whether the subject is to be dealt with in terms of blind emotion as a head-on clash of irreconcilable elements or as a serious problem over which Americans disagree in good faith but in respect to which they have a common objective and a common will to attain that objective.

If Mr. Stassen's suggestion could be carried into effect, it would do much to contribute to a lessening of tensions. It would be reassuring to the many Americans who were less perturbed by the President's exercise of his power in dismissing General MacArthur than by the manner in which it was done and who found it difficult to understand why the friendliness of the meeting on Wake Island should be succeeded by the curt message to Tokyo and the chilly separation in Washington. It would appeal, too, to the growing sentiment which Representative DEWEY SHORT expressed when he said, "We must stop fighting one another and fight the common enemy."

Whether or not a meeting between the President and the general is possible, a meeting of minds in America is imperative. There must be a delimitation of the precise areas over which there is a genuine dispute and a recognition of the dangers of permitting the controversy to become entangled in nonessentials or allowing it to become a ragbag of all the discontents of a troubled generation. If the real questions are allowed to emerge clearly, if they are studied calmly and with a single eye to the welfare of the Nation, many of the divisions which now plague America will vanish. Every citizen, whether he is thinking out the issues in the White House, the Capitol, the Pentagon, or while riding in the subway to his job, shares the responsibility for achieving that goal.

Acheson and MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an editorial entitled "Acheson and MacArthur," which appeared in last Saturday's issue of the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACHESON AND MACARTHUR

The President fairly bounced with self-confidence when he faced the reporters Thursday at his first post-MacArthur press conference. It was probably his most successful parley. Without a doubt he has shared the fears of the Allies lest General MacArthur take action bringing on a general conflagration. The relief he now feels after cutting the Gordian knot was unmistakable. Whether the dismissal was wiser than recall—and then, in case of disagreement, dismissal—will continue to be argued. But the MacArthur speeches, coupled with the antic performances of General Whitney, General MacArthur's press secretary, appear to have justified the summary dismissal in many minds that thought differently a couple of weeks ago.

With that over, the President reaffirmed his confidence in Secretary Acheson, and in the process seemed to be echoing the die-hard Republican line that in regard to China, Acheson represents the opposite policy to MacArthur's. Not for a moment can we admit any such view. To imply that if you are against MacArthur you are for Acheson is totally to distort the intrinsic situation. Secretary Acheson, contrary to the current propaganda on both sides of the debate, is more parallel than antithetical to MacArthur on China, and, we might add, much less candid and forthright. In Chicago, General MacArthur, in the intoxication of his welcome, moved sensibly closer to an all-out war position; Acheson's policy is to get this country into the same kind of sticky involvement with mainland China, only by the back door.

This was shown on Wednesday in the State Department announcement of the Chase mission to Formosa—so reminiscent of the fatal Barr mission to Nanking in 1945, which blew up so badly in the administration's face. The event marks the officially acknowledged end of the neutralization of Formosa policy. That policy has shaded into the initial MacArthur policy of defense of Formosa which got MacArthur originally in hot water. But there is something more significant in the administration's conversion. All the indications up to and including the Wednesday notice are that the administration's Formosa policy is also shading, as MacArthur's did before it, into an interventionist policy in behalf of the guerrillas on the assumption that they are Chiang Kai-shek's supporters. In other words, MacArthurism is continuing to drag the Achesons on its coattails. It is important to get the distinction and the implications straight.

The blunt fact is that the most important post in Mr. Truman's administration is filled by a man who does not enjoy general or congressional confidence. This, in view of the foreign business about to be put up to Congress, in view of the rival leadership that MacArthur is unmasking, is a serious matter to the administration and to the country alike. It stems, of course, from Mr. Acheson's public expressions about Alger Hiss, especially his public citation of a compassionate passage from the Bible which, in the light of Alger Hiss' refusal to come clean, was singularly inappropriate. Since then, whether because of the criticism he then invited or not, Secretary Acheson has seemed to be striving to appease the most vociferous of his critics, that is, the most reactionary of MacArthur elements in the Republican Party. All, of course, to no avail. On the contrary, the appeasement has had serious results. First, it has produced almost an abdication of civilian leadership which has permitted MacArthurism to thrive. It has put the administration, secondly, in a position where it has the same difficulty of explaining its policy as the people have of understanding it.

The metamorphosis of Mr. Acheson in this aspect (as in other aspects) of foreign policy has alienated a segment of Mr. Acheson's party. They see no prospect of any far eastern settlement under his auspices. They see him hogtied by popular suspicion. At home as well as abroad he is a political deadweight. Foreign policy in his regime has become merely a carbon copy of Pentagon strategy without regard to policy or principle. A military man has to think in terms of war tomorrow, but not the diplomat. Otherwise a nation would be condemned to close all avenues to a self-enforcing peace, and to stop thinking in terms of reconstruction as well as preparedness. We are convinced that the two preoccupations can go together, but we see no sign that Secretary Acheson feels the same way.

Secretary Acheson seems to be aware that his stock is badly depressed throughout the country. At any rate, he is said on at least half a dozen occasions to have submitted his resignation to the President, only to have him reject it. For the good of the country, as well as to enable the administration to make a fresh start in effectuating a contra-MacArthur policy on China, he should insist on his own retirement, or his transfer to a useful field of endeavor. The President should have at his elbow a Secretary who can capitalize his own influence as well as one with a topnotch mind. It is unfair to the President's overburdened office that he should shoulder the embarrassment of having a Secretary who, far from being an influence, is a drag. For, apart from his own need for relief, there is the country to consider, a country which is constantly frustrated in the quest for basic unity by the President's unwillingness to put his own house in order.

General MacArthur's Pronouncements on the Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Alternatives in Korea," published in the Oil City Derrick on April 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALTERNATIVES IN KOREA

Right or wrong from a diplomatic and political point of view, General MacArthur's pronouncements on the Korean war have served to emphasize once again the utter confusion that marks the views of the Washington administration and the United Nations Assembly regarding a firm and resolute far eastern policy.

In advocating the bombing of Communist bases in Manchuria and use of Chinese Nationalist troops stationed on Formosa to open a second front against Red China, MacArthur has brought a storm of protest upon his shoulders from capitals throughout the western world.

Now the hatchet men of the Truman administration and those of other nations, particularly England and France, are out to scalp the general or at least to subject him to public reprimand.

Perhaps the general is out of bounds in issuing pronouncements on questions that are preeminently political. Perhaps he has overstepped his authority as a military commander in public presentation of his views without the consent of his superiors.

But let it not be forgotten that General MacArthur has been cast in a difficult role. His is perhaps the toughest military job in the history of modern warfare. He has been forced to fight a war that is strictly limited for him and his United Nations forces, but is not limited for the enemy who enjoys the advantage of superior numbers and a privileged sanctuary in Manchuria. He literally has one hand tied behind his back while his foe is permitted to swing freely with both mailed fists.

And now the general faces the added grim outlook of a massive spring offensive by the Chinese and North Korean Reds, this time with the possible benefit of a considerable power in the air provided by Soviet-supplied planes now massing in Manchuria. What could happen to a vastly outnumbered United Nations Army which lacked undisputed control of the air is grounds for grave fear.

MacArthur repeatedly has warned that unless United Nations policy is changed, the Korean war undoubtedly will settle into a costly stalemate. He takes the position that the conflict can be brought to a successful end only by removal of the restrictions on the forces under his command.

The United Nations, on the other hand, has opposed any extension of the conflict for fear of Soviet involvement and loosening of the forces that would ignite the spark of world war III. The U. N. has worked incessantly for a cease fire in Korea and an end of the conflict by negotiation. But every effort to halt the fighting has been turned down by Red China and it is hard to visualize any change in the stand of the Peiping government so long as U. N. forces are restricted in their operations.

Common sense dictates that no sane American can favor steps that arbitrarily would plunge the Nation into another world war. Likewise, it is hard to crystallize sentiment in favor of continuing the conflict on the present basis with the steady whittling away of American lives. Already the casualties of United States forces in a conflict which Mr. Truman still refers to as a police action are nearing the 60,000 mark.

There must be no let-up in the efforts of this Nation and all free nations to bring about an early end to the hostilities in Korea. But in event of failure to achieve a settlement through a negotiated peace, it would appear that the only alternative to a long and costly stalemate is a decision by the United Nations either to get off the peninsula or to undertake the effort necessary to achieve victory and the goal of a unified and free Korea.

War in Korea Profitable for United States "Partners"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "War in Korea Profitable for United States 'Partners,'" written by Larry Rue, and published in the April 22 issue of the Chicago Tribune.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR IN KOREA PROFITABLE FOR UNITED STATES "PARTNERS"—ATLANTIC PACT NATIONS SELLING TO RUSSIA

(By Larry Rue)

FRANKFURT, GERMANY, April 21.—The Korean war has been quite profitable to Britain France, and other Atlantic Pact nations which have been doing business with Russia and other countries behind the iron curtain.

Statistics compiled here show that the British have more than doubled their exports of tooling machines and other strategic material to the Soviet Union. These machines are important for the armament industry and few here doubt that they are now producing weapons for use against American soldiers in Korea.

France, too, has been doing a thriving business, particularly with Czechoslovakia. In a last-minute effort to curry favor with this satellite state, France resumed dismantling of critical electrotechnical and tooling machines in the French zone of occupation. The machines are being turned over to Czechoslovakia.

BIGGEST IN EASTERN EUROPE

The biggest armament plant in all of Eastern Europe is in Czechoslovakia. It is the Skoda works, now turning out all types of heavy war weapons on Russian account. The machinery, which has been removed from German plants around Baden-Baden, can be used to make accessories for war machines Skoda is now producing for the Communist armies.

Dismantling of 41 German tooling machines was ordered by the Czech restitution mission in Baden-Baden on the ground that this equipment originally was taken from Czechoslovakia. Despite the fact that most of the factories from which the machines were taken were damaged heavily in the war, the owners were able to produce receipts showing that the machines had been paid for in full and never had been subject to requisition by the Wehrmacht.

BLOW AT SCHUMAN PLAN

The French by allowing the Czech Communists to weaken the economy of West Germany in order to strengthen their own war potential have aroused suspicion as to where their hearts are in the struggle between communism and the western world.

The dismantling also has strengthened the already formidable Socialist opposition to the Schuman plan, calling for the integration of the coal and steel industries of the Western European countries, on which United States High Commissioner John J. McCloy has based his chief hopes as a basic solution to the age-old difficulties between the French and the Germans.

Moreover, it throws a monkey wrench in the Atlantic Pact plans for Western European defense by building up resistance to West German participation.

SWISS FIRMS BIG BUYERS

Besides the British and the French, other Atlantic Pact nations have made huge profits since the Korean war by selling to the Soviet Union all kinds of raw materials needed by the armament industry. This business picked up tremendously everywhere after war started in Korea. The material sometimes goes through two or three hands before reaching Russia.

Swiss firms have been big buyers for Russion account; so have Dutch and Belgian firms. This is one of the reasons why it has been so difficult to break up the increasing illegal trade between East and West.

In Bonn it was announced recently that Britain in 1948 sold tooling machines worth $240,000,000 to Russia. In 1949 this trade was stepped up to $480,000,000, while in 1950 tooling machines worth $1,350,000,000 were delivered to the Soviet Union by England.

AUSTRIAN A KEY SMUGGLER

France has been getting large orders for special electric technical equipment from Czechoslovakia. It was in order to keep this trade that the French agreed to take machines the Czechs want out of German plants.

The American licensed Der Tagesspiegel of Berlin recently published nearly four columns of details about smuggling transactions involving war plants in East Germany and Russia. The Tagesspiegel reported that Swiss, Swedish, Belgium, and Dutch firms have been doing business with an Austrian named Johann Haselgruber, said to be the key person in a huge smuggling ring which operates entirely for the Soviet Union.

The Tagesspiegel also wrote that annually at least 100,000 tons of steel being shipped to West Berlin firms disappears behind the iron curtain. South of Helmstedt, the official check point between East and West Germany, at least 3,000 tons of tooling machines, special steel, tools, and high frequency motors have been smuggled into the Soviet zone every night, this paper asserted.

SEND BARS FOR GUNS

Cockerill, a Belgium concern, is said to have delivered 7,400 round steel bars for making machine gun barrels as well as 2,500 large steel bars for big artillery barrels. Other ammunition from Belgium, which was shipped to Russia, included 6,200 pistols with 200 rounds of ammunition for each one. The Swiss firm of Oerlikon, manufacturer of an automatic machine gun, delivered a big order of such guns to Haselgruber, the Tagesspiegel reported.

The paper deplores that steel rails, made in West Germany and delivered to Rotterdam, were sent to Russia and were used to connect the three Soviet atomic centers in the republic of Tanna Tuwa, north of Mongolia; that special Belgian steel flows into Soviet armament centers and ready-made German guns have appeared on the Korean front; that Belgian and Swiss made weapons, German and Belgian tools, and German, Swiss, and Swedish machines are strengthening the Soviet armament potential.

"That West German steel is illegally exported to the Soviet zone while the West German Volkswagen plant cannot operate for lack of steel is a scandal," the paper concludes.

Foreign Policy and Domestic Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered before the Republican 21 Club of Massachusetts, at Worcester, Mass., on April 28, in which I discussed the foreign policy and domestic administration of the United States Government.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF SENATOR HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., REPUBLICAN 21 CLUB OF MASSACHUSETTS, WORCESTER, MASS., APRIL 28, 1951

HIGH LIGHTS OF THE SPEECH

1. The administration has made tragic errors in foreign policy, notably in neglecting our own defenses and in not developing enough truly effective allies to relieve our men of carrying such a major part of the load of combat.

2. In contemplating the dismissal of General MacArthur, we are struck by the unbelievably summary manner in which it was achieved. No one seriously denies that the civil power in a democracy must be supreme, but I feel strongly that the showdown need never have come and that, when it did come, it was dealt with in a way which was utterly uncalled for. It seems to me inexcusable that the President never called General MacArthur to Washington for consultation. Actions which are so crude and so impulsive shake one's confidence profoundly, for how can one have faith in a Commander in Chief who so obviously cannot command himself? It is for this reason, I think, that the reactions which I have had from the public in Massachusetts have been so overwhelming. Of all the hundreds of telegrams and letters which I have received some spoke of the far eastern question and some spoke about the civil power being supreme over the military. But none endorsed or praised the bungling and lack of foresight which has characterized this administration. In my experience in public life, I have seen nothing like it. The President has allowed the foundation of confidence on which his great office rests to be eaten away by the political termites who surround him. The President should promptly arrange for the United States Government to have the benefit of General MacArthur's wise counsel and should invite the general to render this added service.

3. Trade in war materials with Red China or Soviet Russia is nefarious and must be stopped.

4. Republicans should draw the issue on the administration's poor judgment and low moral tone, concentrating their attack on inflation, on the RFC, and the crime scandals and not mix up the success of the Republican Party with American military security.

TEXT OF THE SPEECH

Mr. Chairman, fellow Republicans—and fellow Americans, for I speak to you tonight in both capacities.

We meet tonight as citizens who are thoroughly aroused by the lack of foresight and general incompetence of our national leadership; who are determined decisively to rid ourselves of this administration in the coming year, and who are also determined that until the time comes that we can throw them out, we will surmount our problems here at home and present a united front to our Communist opponents.

Looking back over the past:

We have seen the national leadership in 1945 fail in its duty to proclaim the need of Armed Forces strong enough to give us influence for peace, thus countenancing the disintegration of our Armed Forces and losing the chance to organize the peace.

We have seen the negligence which permitted the destruction of billions of dollars worth of equipment which we badly need today.

We remember the Yalta Conference, from which so much tragedy has flowed, particularly for the valiant people of Poland.

We point to the stupid decisions such as that which made the city of Berlin an island completely surrounded by Soviet territory.

We remind our fellow citizens of the mental lethargy, amounting virtually to a betrayal of trust, which resulted in the Soviet empire growing after World War II until it encompassed about one-third of the world's total area and population before we finally started to wake up.

We think with bitter emotion of June 1949 when we withdrew our two divisions from Korea and announced that the United States defense line ran from the Aleutian Islands through Japan and the Philippines, inferring that the line of the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea was not essential to our defense. This was the action which created the vacuum and thus encouraged the Communist invaders to step into the vacuum. I cannot rid myself of the idea that it did not have the approval of our military authorities. There is no doubt in my mind that if these two divisions had stayed there, 6,000 miles from home and close to the Soviet border as they were, that there would have been no aggression in Korea. But we hauled down our flag, and it is hard to avoid the conclusion that we have paid a heavy price in blood and treasure for this miscalculation. It is one mistake which we must not repeat in other parts of the world—notably in Europe—in the future.

We who are Republican Senators on the Foreign Relations Committee said last summer with the approval of the late great Senator Arthur Vandenberg:

"In the Far East, we were persistently led to believe that Chinese communism was only a great agrarian reform movement. After half a century of cordial relations in the Far East, and especially with China, with all its troubles and difficulties, in about 1945 we were suddenly faced with a change of policy which is difficult to understand unless we evaluate the subtle betrayals of China at the Yalta Conference.

"This conference sabotaged the assurances given to China at the Cairo Conference of 1943, where also the future freedom of Korea was pledged. The Yalta agreement turned over to Stalin the control of Manchuria and Outer Mongolia and the ports of Dairen and Port Arthur. This was part of the price we paid for the unnecessary token participation of Soviet Russia in the war against Japan, one of the consequences of which was the division of Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel.

"Our far-eastern policy, growing out of these events, consistently temporized with and capitulated to the ruthless demands of the Communists, dominated by Moscow. Under it the Kremlin was, in effect, given a green light to grab whatever it could in China, Korea, and Formosa. This was never a bipartisan policy. It was solely an administration policy."

To this statement we added these words: "Never again must we allow ourselves to be caught, as we were when Korea was invaded, in a position where our failure to foresee the possible implications of our basic foreign policy will result in our being inadequately prepared to carry out that policy in time of crisis."

We concluded with the statement: "In this crisis there can be no politics as usual." But it is glaringly clear today that our advice was not taken.

Then we think of the disloyalty, foreign penetration and betrayal of trust which existed in 1945 when several thousand secret documents were stolen by the Communist editors of a so-called magazine named Amerasia, which resulted in a mere slap on the wrist to the parties who were thus guilty of aiding the Communists at a time when our men were still in combat in the Pacific. We condemn the fact that several thousand unscreened persons came into the State Department at the stroke of a pen in late 1945 and early 1946. All these things must be ruthlessly investigated and the disloyal persons cleaned out and punished.

The aim of foreign policy can be simply stated: it is to preserve peace and, if the struggle against communism should turn to war, to have effective allies—for the tragically simple reason that the sons of American mothers must not be forced to bear the full load of combat alone. On both counts the administration does not deserve a high mark. We have not organized peace nor do we have allies which are as effective as they should be—and could have been—if foresight had been shown after the end of hostilities in World War II. In Korea in particular we should certainly take advantage of whatever help we can get—among others, effective non-Communist Chinese from whom we ought to be able to obtain help without loss of American manpower or without entangling political alliances. In Europe it means that in addition to the help of the North Atlantic Treaty countries and former neutrals such as Spain and former enemy nations such as Germany, we should organize the help of the many non-Communist stateless men whom we would like to have on our side. All of these young men would help our soldiers to bear the load of combat so that American men would not have to do it alone.

As the Senator who introduced the first bill on this subject in 1947, I said on the floor of the Senate last year that if we had embarked on this policy at the end of hostilities in World War II: "there would be today both in Europe and the Far East foreign troops of great combat effectiveness." And I added: "Unfortunately the Soviets interested themselves in the possibility of using alien soldiers long before we did and we are paying a big price for this in Korea at this moment." And I said in July, the day of the Korean aggression, "we must not do this job alone. We must galvanize our allies and make sure that they work with us in building military strength."

Certainly the administration record in this respect has been a grave disappointment. Not only was there great resistance to the legislation which I sponsored to authorize the enlistment of these stateless young men in our services; but even when the bill had become law last June, providing for a modest total of 2,500 aliens, the administration dragged its feet in carrying out the law. I heard only recently of a man who had been a captain in the Polish Army, a professional soldier with 12 years' service, an expert artilleryman and a man with a wife and two children, who offered his services at one of our embassies abroad, saying that he was willing to join the United States Army as a private soldier in order to fight against communism in Korea. He offered his services and received a mimeographed letter saying that he could not be accepted because he did not have a visa to enter the United States. In the first place, this response was illegal because the new law which the administration was ignoring specifically authorized the United States to accept the services of a man like that. In the second place, he did not want to come to the United States. He wanted to go directly to Korea to take part in the fighting. In the third place, the reply was stupid and is all too typical of the lack of understanding and lack of imagination about the world situation which characterizes so much of official Washington today.

Yes, the administration record has been a disappointment and so—I say to you frankly—has been the record of many—though by no means all—of the member nations of the United Nations. There are nations which do not hesitate to remind Americans that it is fair for the United States to make a large financial contribution to the United Nations because we have more dollars per capita than any other nation. But to this argument must be added the far more poignant truth that our manpower per capita is no greater than that of other nations of the world. This is undoubtedly the rock on which the United Nations is most likely to founder. When an aggression occurs and the rank and file of members of the United Nations fail to put up military manpower in proportion to their population, the faith of the American people in the United Nations collapses. All honor, therefore, to the nations which have, by their manpower, eased the load of combat for us in Korea. Other nations should follow their example.

Another step which would shake confidence in the United Nations to its foundation would be the admission of Red China. The United Nations is founded for the purpose of resisting aggression. If a government can be admitted to membership in the United Nations simply by committing aggression, then the whole concept becomes an immense and tragic absurdity.

Let me say that equally tragic are the thoughts which come to mind at reports of shipments of war materials to Red China and the Soviet Union. Whether these shipments come from American or other sources, they help the enemies of our soldiers and of our allies. I speak as a long-time friend of the North Atlantic Pact and the Marshall plan when I say to the nations of Europe that there is nothing which can more surely jeopardize American enthusiasm for the North Atlantic alliance than reports of this nefarious trade with the enemy, than the shouts of delight coming from abroad over General MacArthur's dismissal, and the recent dispatches which speak of making Red China a party to the Japanese treaty and of handing Formosa over to the Communists.

In contemplating the dismissal of General MacArthur, we are struck by the unbelievably summary manner in which it was achieved. No one seriously denies that the civil power in a democracy must be supreme, but I feel strongly that the showdown need never have come and that, when it did come, it was dealt with in a way which was utterly uncalled for. It seems to me inexcusable that the President never called General MacArthur to Washington for consultation. Actions which are so crude and so impulsive shake one's confidence profoundly, for how can one have faith in a Commander in Chief who so obviously cannot command himself? It is for this reason, I think, that the reactions which I have had from the public in Massachusetts have been so overwhelming. Of all the hundreds of telegrams and letters which I have received some spoke of the far-eastern question and some spoke about the civil power being supreme over the military. But none endorsed or praised the bungling and lack of foresight which has characterized this administration. In my experience in public life, I have seen nothing like it. The President has allowed the foundation of confidence on which his great office rests to be eaten away by the political termites who surround him. The President should promptly arrange for the United States Government to have the benefit of General MacArthur's wise counsel and should invite the general to render this added service.

The tragic past is, therefore, clear. Although by no means desperate, the future is grim. General MacArthur's departure adds enormously to the difficulty of getting any kind of an agreement to end the Korean war. We are placed in an unhappy situation in Korea—and elsewhere—because in 1945 we gave up our own military strength and the strength of others who could help us. Until we regain the initiative which we threw away in 1945, we cannot expect a satisfactory solution in Korea or anywhere else. This takes time. We must demand increased efforts at building military strength, both for the sake of our men in Korea and for the sake of durable peace.

In the meantime, we must remember that many of the problems which we will have to confront are not as simple as they look the first time.

For example:

We must challenge those who demand an "all-out aggressive war" against any country by asking them the question, "What with?" The answer to that question is that our preparedness has been so neglected for so long that we are not now in a position to undertake sustained and general aggressive war against anyone.

While Asia is critically important, the greatest concentration of industrial power outside of the United States and the U. S. S. R. is in Western Europe—and the possession of industrial power wins wars. As General MacArthur so wisely inferred, we have two fronts—a western front in Korea and an eastern front in Europe. We as citizens must always look at American security as a whole. Europe and Japan are two ends of one Soviet empire. The Soviet military threat, as General MacArthur said, is a global threat. We must not meet it by piecemealing and frittering away our strength, notably our knock-out punch—the strategic air force. We must not wear out and use up our first team against their second team. We have done this too much already insofar as our Army is concerned. We must not commit our main force until the Kremlin commits its main force.

Our effort at one end of the Soviet Empire should help our effort at the other. Certainly one of the many great things accomplished by the heroic service of our men in Korea is that it has furnished the foundation of confidence on which military strength is being built all over the world. Their action gives us time to get ready—just as the forces of General MacArthur brought us precious time at Bataan 9 years ago. We should make maximum use of this precious time, just as we did in 1942. The action of our men in Korea is like that of the heroic boy in the story who kept his finger in the dyke.

In the field of foreign policy Republicans have a good record of achievement in the Eightieth Congress, about which so many untrue things have been said by the leaders of the party now in power. It was the Eightieth Congress which enacted: the law which set up the Marshall plan, which has saved Western Europe from communism; the Greek and Turkish aid bills which have been such a magnificent investment in human courage and fighting ability; and the Vandenberg resolution which resulted in the North Atlantic Pact which is now being so effectively implemented under the able leadership of General Eisenhower. This is a record of Republican foresight and intelligence in foreign policy which should be an inspiration.

Fellow Republicans, there never was a time when the American people needed the two-party system more than they need it today. There never was a time when there was a greater usefulness for that wonderful system which enables the citizen to draw the issue, fix the responsibility, and get a change in his government.

Our duty as active Republicans is to try to draw the issue where it ought to be drawn. That issue ought not to be drawn on the question of whether we should or should not put the Chinese Nationalists ashore in China; we need not get involved in technical questions of strategy and tactics in order to discharge our duty as active members of the opposition party. The issue should not be drawn on the question of whether we should keep our strategic air command together as a unit or whether we should divide it up and piecemeal it all over the world. We should not base our campaign on an argument as to whether the civil power should or should not be supreme over the military or whether Europe is more important than Asia. I was glad to hear General MacArthur say that these strategical issues "reach quite beyond the realm of partisan consideration." We must, therefore, not seek to mix up the success of the Republican Party with the security of our country.

The issue should be drawn on questions which are both less technical and much more fundamental—to wit: The judgment and the moral tone of those at the head of our Government. We as active Republicans must not seek to make foreign policy the issue. In fact, it is a pity that already the legitimate political issue arising from the scandal, corruption, and low moral tone of this administration has been somewhat beclouded by arguments on world strategy which do not belong in politics.

We can point to so much: Not only to all these blunders in the field of foreign policy and national defense, but particularly to the crisis which faces so many American families caused by the fact that the dollar you get today can't buy as much as the dollar you got a little while ago—to the oldest of political tricks which pretends that you are giving everybody a raise in pay and then, by monkeying with the value of the dollar, causes all the prices to go up much faster than the citizen's income is rising.

We can point to the timidity in Washington today in dealing with certain politically influential lobbies who want to support the prices of certain products regardless of what happens to the consumer.

We declare that a farm policy ought to try to increase the production of the food which you and I like to eat and like to get at a reasonable price, but that there has never been any bill pass Congress which made it more attractive or cheaper for a man to produce steak.

We can point to the disorderly floundering which is going on in Washington now so far as price control is concerned and to the need for intelligent and courageous leadership which can mete out justice to all elements of the American community and which can end the present atmosphere of every man for himself. Who in high office today appears to be thinking about the interests of the general public? I have written to Eric Johnston and to Price Administrator DiSalle calling attention to what is happening to the cost of living in this country, but all I have had so far is words. All the news that comes out of the Economic Stabilization Agency is political talk. There is plenty of talk that nobody is going to dare to step on the toes of certain selfish lobbies. There is a good deal of talk about who is going to have the say in appointing all the different job holders who are supposed to enforce the Economic Stabilization orders throughout the country. There are stories of disagreement between various administration politicians as to who is going to have a chance to put his friend on the payroll. I have even heard it said in Massachusetts that they are using the Economic Stabilization Agency to construct a political machine for the 1952 election. But I have heard nothing which leads me to believe that the consumer in Massachusetts is going to get a real break insofar as food and clothing and fuel is concerned.

Then we must denounce:

The waste of the taxpayer's money by the RFC.

The low moral tone which exists in official circles, only the surface of which has been scratched by the famous mink coat incident.

The whole idea that there should be Government banking operations at all, if these consist chiefly in helping somebody who can't get along in ordinary business or of lending money to make votes for a party or an officeholder or of helping some cheap chiseler who manages to ingratiate himself with a few politicians.

We can recall what the Hoover Commission task force said about this—something which interests me because I was the author of the bill which created the Hoover Commission. That report said "direct lending is not normally a proper function of the Federal Government," and said that the best way to get rid of these scandals was to get the Government out of private enterprise.

It was this same Hoover Commission which set up the first far-reaching attempt at Government economy ever undertaken. That was done in the Eightieth Congress which, you may remember, was so much maligned—the Eightieth Congress which saw the Federal budget balanced for the first time in 17 years—and not balanced at the expense of anyone needing help.

In addition to the bungling and lack of foresight which has distinguished our foreign policy, we should point to:

The revelations of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee which proved so eloquently the urgent need for an utterly ruthless housecleaning; and the unholy alliance between politics and crime which has resulted in an intolerable condition in which law-abiding citizens who are struggling to make both ends meet must pay heavy taxes while racketeers make huge sums in illegal ways.

All of it—crime, scandal, inflation, and foreign policy—are symptoms of the same disease—the disease of incompetence in government.

Fellow Republicans, this is perhaps the most fateful moment in our history since the dreadful division in the Civil War. We must not whip ourselves into such a state of frenzy and anger at each other that we have no indignation left with which to face our Communist opponent. While resolving to remove this administration let us never forget that today, tomorrow, and next week we will be living in dangerous times. We must, therefore, hope that the administration, weak and inadequate though it is, will do at least some things right and that when they do we, as patriotic Americans, will cooperate. If ever there was a time when we needed a Nation united on its attitude toward Communist imperialism it is now.

There is nothing fundamentally the matter with America. In fact, there is nothing so bad in this country that a thoroughgoing housecleaning in Washington won't solve. We are a strong Nation. We have great industries. We have strong and resolute people. We have great military leaders of proven worth. We have inspiring institutions and ideals. We can still avoid total war. We can only be defeated if we decide to defeat ourselves. If we are united behind a competent leadership there is nothing that can stop us.

On the Republican Party next year will descend the solemn responsibility of providing the leadership behind which the American people can in the future unite for victory and peace. As active Republicans, you and I have a special responsibility to nominate worthy candidates and then to work hard to elect them in November 1952. As American citizens we have, between now and election day, the duty to work with all our fellow citizens for a strong America. Thus will we best deserve their confidence.

Factors Affecting Farm Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by Paul C. Johnson, and published in the Prairie Farmer of April 21, 1951, under the caption "This business of farming—Washington is worried." The editorial relates to the farm-labor shortage and other factors entering into a possible decrease in agricultural production.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS BUSINESS OF FARMING—WASHINGTON IS WORRIED

There is real alarm in Washington that Corn Belt farmers may not be able to turn out the production in 1951 that the Nation's planners had hoped for. The recent pep meeting in Des Moines is a result of this alarm.

PMA committeemen are really put on the spot by this Washington pressure. They are expected to go down the road for more production. This comes on the heels of instructions to reorganize the old USDA councils as county mobilization committees and induce draft boards to see that there is at least one able-bodied man on every family farm.

The draft is a hot potato in any community. PMA chairmen in some counties have chosen to ignore the Washington instructions and keep their hands completely off draft matters. Many draft boards are very sensitive about interference.

But when committeemen go down the road to talk more acreage and bigger plantings, they will find labor shortage is the bottleneck. The draft has already cut deep. The attraction of high city wages will cut deeper. Our productive capacity on Midwest farms has already been hurt.

Prairie Farmer has pointed this out repeatedly ever since last summer, but people who should carry responsibility in these matters have chosen to believe that nothing can happen to farm production.

Anyway, greet your committeeman with a smile. His is a tough job. Representing the Government is not always peaches and cream. Anything you can do to increase production is definitely to the good. That is, if you do not upset your soil conservation plan.

As this is written the Washington battle over price ceilings on farm products is really tough. Price stabilizers have been trying to establish ceilings below parity, but farm organizations have been equally determined to defend the parity principle. There may be a compromise that would set parity levels once a year instead of letting them creep upward with each increase in farm costs.

The seesawing back and forth on livestock price ceilings may have settled down by the time you read this. It looks now like a flat ceiling on hogs, with the ceilings on carcass beef by grades. This would prevent packers from bidding up cheap cattle, as usually happens when there is a beef shortage.

A lot of signs point to a shortage of milk in the next year or two. Many dairymen are throwing in the towel and turning to easier kinds of farming. Too much grief getting labor.

The bureaucrats' medicine for such a situation is, of course, to pay a subsidy instead of letting a scarce product seek its own price level and thereby correct its own scarcity. This patent medicine will probably be tried again to stimulate dairying.

The live-poultry market in the Chicago area has been in a stew because WLS has sought to revise price quotations in cooperation with the USDA reporting service. It has been alleged the trade is in the habit of publicly proclaiming one price and then paying poultry buyers a premium over and above that price. WLS is insisting on quoting a price which includes the premium to give a fairer idea of what the birds are bringing in Chicago.

The MacArthur Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 30, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a special dispatch to the Hartford Times, which enjoys the largest circulation of any newspaper in Connecticut, from Mr. Joseph P. Lyford, the Hartford Times European correspondent. In this article we have a penetrating analysis of our problems here in the United States as they were seen in Rome, Italy, on April 12, 1951. Mr. Lyford has a long and remarkable background as journalist and political analyst upon which to base his observations.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(By Joseph P. Lyford)

ROME, ITALY.—During the past week, the United States dollar skidded from 670 to 650 lire. By way of explanation, the proprietor of the money exchange on the Piazza di Spagna simply shrugged his shoulders and said "MacArthur."

His reaction is one of many indications of the tremendous interest with which politically minded Italians are following developments in the MacArthur case. A more substantial evidence of this preoccupation are Rome's dozen newspapers, which have devoted heavy type and several columns of front-page space daily to the general's recall.

This pronounced reaction to the MacArthur affair is somewhat of a departure from Italy's ordinarily brief and comparatively unexcited treatment of political events which frequently cause severe public agitation in the United States. This is partly because the Italian, by the very nature of his multi-party government, has had a greater opportunity than an American to become bored with the average political eruption.

But the removal of General MacArthur has stirred the Italian public as few United States political events have since the war. It has also brought forth some interpretations from Italians which should be illuminating to Americans who are perhaps too close to the sound and fury in Washington to comprehend fully the impact of the MacArthur dismissal on other parts of the world.

The chief reason for Italian interest in the matter is the fact that Italy is analyzing the MacArthur controversy primarily in terms of its bearing on United States policy toward Russia in Europe.

The feeling here, as expressed by Premier de Gasperi, who has strongly supported President Truman's step, and by Italian newspaper correspondents, is that a MacArthur plan for an all-out war in China would mean that Europe—and Italy in particular—would become secondary considerations in the United States world campaign to stop communism.

Thus General Eisenhower's effort to build a strong European defense could not but suffer seriously. A two-front war in Asia, it is felt, would simply amount to a positive and irrevocable declaration by the United States that it has chosen China, rather than Europe, as the place to resist Russia. Certainly MacArthur's two-front statement was a shocking revelation to those who are trying to rally the Western European nations into a mutual defense bloc.

Neither Italy nor any of the other Western European countries now looking to Eisenhower for leadership consider that Russia would follow the United States lead and commit itself to a show-down in China. Rather, the Soviet Union—if it has decided on war this year—would allow the United States to deploy itself against Red China, and then Soviet tanks would get their orders to roll into Yugoslavia, Iran, Germany, or Italy—or all, simultaneously.

This helps to explain why General MacArthur is regarded with considerable fear in Italy, although his military accomplishments are given their just due. MacArthur, who has no record of military or diplomatic dealings with Europeans since World War I, is considered as looking at the world crisis solely in terms of his own theater of operations, without regard to the effect of his policies on the fate of anti-Communist nations on this side of the iron curtain.

There is a historical background, too, for Italian distrust of the general and for the generally favorable comment which President Truman's action has received here. Italy has had considerable reason to fear the power of military men who embark on political voyages. The lessons which Sulla and Caesar taught the Romans and the more recent example of Marshal Badoglio have deeply imbedded themselves in the mind of the educated Italian.

It is no surprise, therefore, that Italian journals of all political complexions have nicknamed MacArthur the "proconsul." The sobriquet conveys a great deal to the Italian public. Subsequent developments in the MacArthur case, particularly his invitation to appear before the combined Houses of Congress, and the plans for an elaborate homecoming supplement the Italian conviction that here may be a modern Roman triumph in the making.

It is not a distrust of generals per se that has colored Italian opinion about General MacArthur. It is, rather, the fact that, in contrast to other United States military leaders, MacArthur has spoken at increasingly frequent intervals on important matters of public policy in advance of Washington's decision on such matters. Suspicion also stems from the belief that MacArthur, as Japan's supreme ruler for several years, has given many indications of an arbitrary and dictatorial temperament.

The Italian attitude toward General Eisenhower is in significant contrast. With the obvious exception of the Communists, who have attacked him continuously since January, the Italians regard Eisenhower with affection and admiration. The reasons for his popularity are the direct opposites of the reasons for the distrust of MacArthur: Eisenhower has always been identified with Europe's destiny, he has kept aloof from politics, and he has achieved results by obtaining the cooperation of his allies rather than by dictation.

These factors explain in large part why Italian public opinion is with President Truman. The domestic political tempest in the United States over MacArthur's recall does not seem to be regarded seriously here. To quote the conservative newspaper Il Momento, the affair is "simply a new opportunity for the Republican Party to attack the White House."

Actually the President has established himself more firmly here by his action. For one thing, he has singlehandedly thrown the left-wing press into confusion. The political observer for the right-wing newspaper Il Messagero writes from Switzerland that, in hailing MacArthur's removal as a "victory of the popular movement for peace," the Soviet propagandists have "for the first time been forced to give President Truman credit for at least one peaceable intention."

This same correspondent notes that the MacArthur case has given rise in Communist countries to "an insidious suspicion that the United States Government wants peace."

Whatever the troubles of the Soviet propagandists, however, General MacArthur's removal has been a source of profound relief in Italy. The question remains, however, whether or not the "proconsul" may not be an even more potent influence in the United States now that he has been freed from the military service which nominally restricted his right to make public political utterances. The answer to this question is being anxiously awaited in Italy as elsewhere in Europe.

Proposed Increase in the Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two very important documents recently placed before the Senate subcommittee holding hearings on S. 677, a bill to increase the strength of the Marine Corps and to make the Commandant a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These are the statements of Hon. John Nicholas Brown, former Navy Assistant Secretary for Air, in favor of enactment of S. 677, and a letter from the former Commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. A. A. Vandegrift.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN NICHOLAS BROWN

My name is John Nicholas Brown and I come from Rhode Island. I served as Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Air from November 1946 to March 1949. I appreciate this opportunity of offering testimony in behalf of Senate bill 677, which has two sections and, if I may, I shall make brief comments upon each.

The first section is intended to give statutory authorization for increasing the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps to include 4 divisions together with 4 supporting air wings and to place a ceiling of 400,000. At this point I could well discuss the percentages and proportions between the various armed services. Important as these mathematical computations are, I shall, if I may, confine my remarks to the underlying philosophy which I presume motivated the introduction of this legislation.

Let me state at the outset that in my opinion he United States Marine Corps must never be thought of as a second army. Not only would this be unnecessary duplication but would be completely contrary to the basic function and purpose of the Marine Corps itself. When, then, is this peculiar function which the Marine Corps is called upon to assume in the total of our national defense? I need only cite here the statements contained in the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, 79th Cong.), as amended by the Eighty-first Congress in Public Law 216. Outside of the minor functions of providing security detachments for the protection of naval property and for similar service on naval vessels, the traditional and fundamental function of the Marine Corps is to organize, train, equip, and maintain "fleet marine forces of combined arms, together with supporting air components, for service with the fleet in the seizure or defense of advanced naval bases and for the conduct of such land operations as may be essential to the prosecution of a naval campaign. * * * In addition, the Marine Corps * * * shall perform such other duties as the President shall direct." The purpose, therefore, of the Marine Corps is to provide amphibious forces and, in so doing, to represent within the whole complex of America's armed defenses that component which at all times shall have the highest degree of readiness.

Since we are an island power and since the continental land mass is in fact limited by the two major ocean areas of the globe, our first contact with an enemy presumably must be across a sea. It is this margin between sea and land that is the special province in warfare of the Marine Corps. Amphibious operations, therefore, become of peculiar importance to the United States. Indeed we have received witness to this fact in Korea. Furthermore, it is highly desirable that a corps of specialists in this all-important first phase of warfare be sufficiently large so that it can provide the maximum effectiveness.

It is unnecessary for me to explain to this committee the difficulties involved in amphibious operations. Indeed, I do not feel myself competent to discuss the technical aspects. I know, however, that in the United States Marine Corps we have the most highly integrated component because their specialty is that warfare which must be undertaken at the junction of land, sea, and air. It happens also that throughout our history this force of specialists in amphibious warfare has developed to the highest degree a special morale factor which is the pride and the glory of the United States Marine Corps. I cannot explain exactly how this has been achieved. The long line of heroic exploits, the burning faith in the importance of the Marine Corps itself, and the voluntary submission to rigorous discipline have produced a devotion to duty which through the years has lead to the display of a type of courage which makes all of us who are not marines very humble.

It is, therefore, this highly integrated force which has traditionally been the first to get under way when a police action has been called for. Of how many men should this specialized fighting force consist?

Numbers are relative. In times of peace naturally the Military Establishment is diminished. I submit, however, that the American people need the service of a relatively large Marine Corps and should not be bound by any false relationship with the numbers in other branches of the armed services when the question of placing ceilings upon their number arises. The Marine Corps today is limited to 204,029. The ceiling for fiscal 1952 will be limited to 175,516. I submit, gentlemen, that America can well use 400,000 marines without in any way creating a second army or without transgressing the bounds set by law or by any agreement as to the function of the Marine Corps itself.

Furthermore, it so happens that in the creation of what might be looked at as a larger readiness force the taxpayer will be purchasing initial defense at its cheapest for over the years the Marine Corps has cost the taxpayer the least of any of the service branches. To put this idea in another way, let me say that the percentage of fighting marines, compared to those in units for their support, is far higher than in the Army. I say this with no intention to make invidious comparisons but rather to point out that the Navy supplies in large measure the Marine Corps' logistic support. Therefore, the taxpayer obtains the maximum fighting force for initial operations with the minimum of expense. I understand Senator DOUGLAS has placed in the RECORD of last Friday figures to substantiate this point.

I should like to comment for a moment upon the administrative aspects of the Marine Corps and the Navy Department.

During my service as Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Air the Marine Corps came directly under the Secretary of the Navy. As you know, it maintains a separate headquarters; its procurement is arranged for by its using mostly the Army for equipment and the Navy for medical and legal services, as well as the Navy Bureaus for other items. But my point is that, except in the person of the Secretary of the Navy himself, since the Marine Corps is within the Department of the Navy but not of it, there is no one whose day to day duty it is to supervise and also to represent the Marine Corps. It happens, therefore, that in the vast complex of the Department of Defense, the Marine Corps plays a lonely role.

Let me state quickly that this has certain advantages. The very smallness of the Marine Corps in relation to the other services has been in some measure its strength. I do not believe the increase proposed in this legislation, namely, approximately doubling the present size of the Corps—would, however, affect this point. Indeed when in World War I the Marine Corps was 486,000 men, it in no way suffered loss of its splendid fighting morale. But I do think that, offsetting the advantages the Marine Corps enjoyed in this particular, there are also disadvantages and for this reason I have come to support section II of this legislation which places the Commandant of the Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Certainly one of the sound principles of administration is to have committees as small as possible. A three-man board, consisting of the chief military officers of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, would, therefore, seem logical yet under the amendment passed by the last Congress there is now a chairman for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, making a total of four. Actually in number the Joint Chiefs of Staff have not been increased over their original number due to the fact that during the war and after the President exercised his right to appoint his own Chief of Staff. You will remember of course that Admiral Leahy made a fourth member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff originally. I do not consider that adding a fifth member should disturb us from the point of view of making unwieldy this most important of our military boards.

But there are other and more compelling reasons which lead me to favor this scheme. Up to this time I have not mentioned interservice rivalries because I believe that, by and large, these so-called rivalries have received far too much attention in the public press. Actually, the differences between the armed services stem from wholly sincere convictions on controversial points. Certainly dead uniformity we do not want. Yet the balance of judgment, the ability to see the over-all picture, the wisdom which comes from knowledge of problems of the individual services are very difficult to obtain from those who are representing what they sincerely believe to be the interests of the Nation as represented by their respective services. It seems to me, therefore, that the inclusion as a member of the top level of a man whose specialty is that margin where land, sea, and air meet would greatly strengthen our military counsels. The Commandant of the Marine Corps could provide a kind of balance, since he combines in his special knowledge naval doctrine, the initial stages of land warfare doctrine, and tactical air support doctrine.

In closing, let me summarize by saying that readiness, the capacity to move anywhere immediately, and become effective, is always needed, and at the present juncture of events is especially necessary. This is the daily bread of the Marine Corps. It does not seem to me too much to insist by legislation that the United States Marine Corps be doubled in size and its Commandant given added responsibility in the highest military circles.

Let me express to you again, gentlemen, my thanks for giving me this opportunity to testify.

LETTER TO SENATOR DOUGLAS FROM GENERAL VANDEGRIFT, FORMER COMMANDANT OF THE MARINE CORPS, IN SUPPORT OF S. 677

LYNCHBURG, VA., April 16, 1951.

DEAR MR. DOUGLAS: It is with pleasure and interest that, in response to your request, I send you my views on your bill (S. 677). As you know, I have only been prevented from appearing personally, because of the pressure of private affairs. I am pleased, however, that you had an opportunity to hear, in person, the views of my friend and predecessor, General Holcomb.

Of the two sections of your bill, section 1 (which seeks to provide an effective present-day organization for the Marine Corps), seems almost beyond argument as to its objectives. Those who remember the six excellent Marine divisions of World War II—created from a far smaller mobilization base (17,000 enlisted in 1939) than we possessed last June—will hardly feel that the four Marine divisions and four air wings provided by this legislation will unduly tax the Marine Corps or result in watering down the quality which, after all, is our priceless ingredient.

And the ceiling of 400,000 marines which section 1 contains should effectively dispel any though or rumor that the Marine Corps seeks to constitute itself "a second land army." We have never at any time entertained such designs, and I can think of nothing more disastrous for the Corps than to attempt to exceed its natural limits. These limits, I think, we determined empirically in World War II, and I should look with apprehension on any plan even for an ultimate Marine Corps larger than six divisions.

It is on section 2, which would seat the Commandant as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that I imagine debate will center.

During my term as Commandant, I gave deep and frequent consideration to this question. During the anxious days which preceded passage of the National Security Act of 1947, it was sometimes suggested to me by friends in Congress that I should seek to have included in that act a provision which would seat me on the Joint Chiefs. I knew from General Holcomb that President Roosevelt, whose judgment in naval and military matters was unsurpassed, offered to nominate the Commandant of Marines as a JCS member; I knew also, of course, that the war President had been thwarted in his wish by the then Joint Chiefs of Staff.

It was intimated by Members of Congress that the Commandant should be seated on the Joint Chiefs by provision of the National Security Act. My relationships within the Navy Department, both with the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Forrestal, and with the Chief of Naval Operations, my old friend, Admiral Nimitz, were of the highest type. I then enjoyed, as 17 Commandants had enjoyed before me, unrestricted access to the Secretary of the Navy, and the thought was unheard of that any officer within the Department could question that the Commandant was directly responsible to the Secretary of the Navy for our administration and efficiency. So it seemed to me, working closely with high officials who recognized the historic status and authority of the Commandant's office, that no extensive benefits would derive from a seat on the JCS at that time and, conversely, that additional burdens might result.

Since that decision, I have had many occasions, both in and out of office to regret it.

Under the process of unification, it has become inevitable that the powers of the individual departments have withered as those of the Defense Department have increased. Where it was once satisfactory that the Commandant enjoy direct access to the top of the Navy Department when important decisions affecting Marine Corps matters were shaped, he now finds, increasingly, that vital policy measures affecting the Marine Corps reach decision not in the Navy Department but one level higher, in the Defense Department. Most of these stem from the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and it now seems clear to me that the Marine Corps cannot carry out its statutory functions under the Unification Act without representation at that level when matters of Marine Corps interest are discussed. In this connection, I find it illogical—considering how our unified defense machine has evolved—that, of all the four services entrusted with statutory functions in the National Security Act, the Marine Corps alone does not enjoy a voice to speak for those functions in the councils of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I cannot in any way agree with the view advanced before your committee that sufficient matters of Marine Corps interest do not come before that body to warrant the presence of the Commandant. One has only to look through the statutory functions of the Joint Chiefs to refute such a statement.

Thus, I find myself in complete agreement with this legislation. I endorse its organizational provisions not so much because they would aggrandize the Marine Corps, but because I believe that in these distracted times the country can use four marine divisions, just as one of our two divisions—my old division, and yours—is now being so well used in Korea.

I endorse the Joint Chiefs of Staff provision for two reasons. First, it provides insurance to the country that an effective Marine Corps can continue in existence. Second, and more important, it makes available in our highest military councils the professional skill, the cross-service experience, and the cojoint talents of the Corps of Marines.

Faithfully yours,

A. A. VANDEGRIFT,
General, United States Marine Corps
(Retired).

Treatment of West Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Germany Treated Like Stepchild," by Constantine Brown, which appeared in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GERMANY TREATED LIKE STEPCHILD—MOST NATIONS IN EUROPE TODAY ARE ENGAGED IN TRADE WITH RED CHINA AND ITS MOSCOW MASTERS

(By Constantine Brown)

Chancelor Konrad Adenauer is a shrewd man. He announced at Bonn last Sunday that the West German Federal Republic was willing to join all other Western European nations in a plan to stop all western trade with Communist China. He feels himself on safe grounds since there is hardly a nation in Europe today which is not engaged in a relatively remunerative trade with the far eastern aggressor and its Moscow masters.

Hong Kong and Singapore are doing a land-office business with the Chinese. West Germany is not doing badly either. Last week the German freighter Mai Rickmers was intercepted by Nationalist gunboats while en route to Shanghai with a cargo of vitally needed radio equipment, medical supplies, and other strategic materials. The ship's cargo had been cleared from Hamburg by the Allied High Commissioners' deputies. Consequently, insofar as the Bonn Government was concerned, the shipments were legal. But while the Nationalist destroyers and gunboats dare to interfere with a German vessel, they would run into real trouble if they challenged the rights of ships flying Allied flags.

Moscow is now wooing Western Germany. It ignores the Bonn Government which is being described as a stooge of the western capitalists. It is appealing directly to the German masses and industrialists.

Soviet-financed corporations have been organized in Western Germany. They make possible a thriving export business with the iron-curtain countries. German goods are being shipped in transit to Allied or neutral countries whence they are transshipped to the east.

The Soviet propagandists' bid for a free reunion of Eastern and Western Germany is not based on ideological arguments. They point out to the German industrialists and the millions of workers that while the industrial west will never permit a genuine revival of the Reich's industrial power, Russia needs it. The Soviet-European satellite countries cannot supply the great needs of half a billion people in China, they say. These markets can be Germany's for the asking. The industrial west, the propagandists say, is afraid of Germany's potential competition. The west, they say, seeks only Germany's manpower as cannon fodder against the U. S. S. R. They refuse even in this emergency to grant Germany full sovereignty In one of the many pamphlets which are being distributed by the million in the west, the spokesman for the Kremlin state: "The British and the French Governments have denied the American proposal that Germany organize an army of her own. They still insist that millions of young Germans serve in small units in their own armies under the command of the conquerors."

Thus with appeals to the nationalistic feelings of the German people and at the same time declarations that the German workers can find lasting employment in industries which will have much of the Far East at their disposal, the West Germans are urged to shake the western yoke and join their free brethren in the east. The Red agitators say that Russia will then see that a new Germany is given ample opportunity to develop herself nationally and economically. It also will guarantee that Germany would be spared the destruction of a third world war.

The Bonn Government is fully aware of the trickery of this propaganda and is doing its best to offset it. But unfortunately neither London nor Paris has done anything constructive in recent months to deny by deeds the contentions of Soviet propaganda. In spite of the military arguments of General Eisenhower to equitably stabilize the situation in Western Germany, the British and the French Governments, confronted with a difficult internal situation, have maintained their previous position of treating Germany as a stepchild in the European-defense set-up.

Cheap Politics and False Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the following is a letter from Walter R. Mybeck, director of the Division of Public Works and Supply of Indiana. He reveals in this letter an example of the short-sighted and blind economy which we have witnessed in some of the reductions on appropriations which in the end will cost the American public far more money than the apparent saving in this year's budget.

The Appropriations Committee had already reduced the $300,000 item for surplus property utilization in the Federal Security Agency before the House, and the Committee of the Whole reduced it by $200,000, which will practically eliminate the department's program of utilizing surplus property.

This so-called economy cut was cheap politics, not economy. Indiana is only one of 48 States penalized by practically abolishing this Government department on surplus property.

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MADDEN: We have just received word that an amendment to the appropriation bill which reduces an item of $300,000 for surplus utilization in the Federal Security Agency to the amount of $100,000 has passed the House with a very close vote and that the full committee of the Senate will report the bill the first of the week for action by the Senate.

Indiana participated in this program to the benefit of tax-exempt educational institutions as well as hospitals and other local agencies. This participation has not only benefited these agencies in securing needed articles for the continuance of the schools, but has meant a great savings from the dollar-and-cents point of view. The agencies receiving these articles were able to secure much-needed equipment.

The general thought in the average citizen's mind, during a discussion of surplus property, is that the article in question is surplus from World War II. This idea is not correct as the United States Government has at all times a surplus of items either in the salvage category or in a usable condition, although obsolete for use by the armed services.

Large quantities of these items occupy valuable warehouse space that might be utilized to better advantage in providing proper storage for more current items now useable by the Armed Forces.

We have had participating in Indiana 840 elementary schools, 720 high schools, and 22 colleges. Since 1946, these various participating agencies have received property valued in excess of $5,000,000, cost to them being only the handling charges which represents according to our records the total value of the article. While we could have given you complete detail of the amount each of these institutions received, we feel that it would be too voluminous, requiring too much time for you to study.

We would like to point out that our State schools and universities, which include Indiana University, Purdue University, Indiana State Teachers College, and Ball State Teachers College, have been the recipients of these benefits. Taylor University, a tax-exempt school located at Upland, Ind., was able to equip a complete scientific laboratory. Had this program not been in effect this school, due to scarcity of funds, could not have equipped this laboratory.

Anything you may be able to do with respect to restoring this cut in appropriation, I feel sure, will be to the benefit of all our schools, colleges, and hospitals in Indiana.

Respectfully submitted.

WALTER R. MYBECK,
Director, Public Works and Supply.

Public Assistance Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions I have expressed my unequivocal opposition to the Truman administration's program for the socialization of our free productive American way of life. However much they may try to conceal it, there should be no doubt that the real purpose of those who advocate such programs as compulsory health insurance, such as advanced by Federal Security Administrator Oscar R. Ewing, is to convert this country into a socialized state.

It has come to light that the Federal Security Agency continues to circulate a pamphlet, first printed in 1945 and reprinted in 1949, which advocates the un-American tenet: "Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state." That statement clearly discloses the concealed purpose of the Administration. It is an objective with which we cannot compromise. It is an objective the administration disclaims publicly but which it continues to pursue.

In order that our people may know exactly what has been taking place and be constantly alert in preserving their rights, I am inserting in the RECORD certain correspondence between the American Medical Association and Federal Security Administrator Ewing. It speaks for itself. I am hopeful that the American people will not allow themselves to be lulled into a feeling of assurance that this fight against a socialized medicine and a socialized state has been won. It has only begun. The same program will be revived in other forms and by various means. The objective remains the same.

The correspondence follows:

EDITOR, JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,

Chicago:

My attention has been called to the president's page in March 31 issue Journal American Medical Association. It quotes sentence from what you mistakenly call a current pamphlet, describing it as Mr. Ewing's directive. Any reputable scientific periodical verifies statements before publication. Elementary check would have revealed that pamphlet was written and issued in 1945, some 2 years before I became Federal Security Administrator. Checking would also have revealed that this pamphlet is not being currently distributed by Federal Security Agency, and has never had remotest authority as directive. Since you profess to be a scientific magazine interested in truth I suggest you retract the statement as publicly as it was made in the first place.

OSCAR R. EWING,
Federal Security Administrator,
Federal Security Agency.

[From the Journal of the American Medical Association of March 31, 1951]

A MONTHLY MESSAGE

Imitation, they say, is the sincerest form of flattery, and the medical profession can accept as a tribute to its campaign against compulsory health insurance the fact that so many members of the opposition have taken up the cry that they, too, are opposed to socialized medicine. Perhaps the gentlemen protest too much. Certainly not many persons take them seriously. Millions did not during last fall's elections, and today some of the most outspoken socializers are sitting on the sidelines. The public's magnificent response to medicine's crusade against socialistic legislation has forced those who would regiment us all under Federal bureaucracy to attempt concealment of their real purpose.

I think you will be interested, therefore, in a bit of light, cast from Oscar Ewing's Federal Security Agency, which illuminates his true aims. The following directive appears on page 7, chapter 4, of a current pamphlet issued by Mr. Ewing's "Bureau of Public Assistance," titled "Common Human Needs," and subtitled "An interpretation for the staff in public assistance agencies: Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state envisaged in democratic ideology, a way of life which so far has been realized only in slight measure. Further comment, I think, hardly is necessary.

Mr. Ewing's directive, however, does emphasize the fact that our task has not been completed—that socialism remains a basic tenet of the administration program, despite grave and far-reaching implications of the international situation. Despite the fact that millions of Americans, through more than 10,000 National, State, and local organizations have publicly and officially repudiated them, bills calling for a Federal program of compulsory health insurance have been reintroduced in Congress. What is needed now is a continuing flow of resolutions from groups of all sorts and sizes, giving Congress unequivocal evidence that the people back home do not want any part of socialism. To achieve this, we are accelerating action on the local, the grass-roots level. We know, from the results of last October's advertising campaign, that the people of Main Street will respond. There is great work—and a great deal of it—to be done, and I am completely confident that the State and county societies and auxiliaries, and physicians acting individually, will do it well.

In this connection, I am deeply gratified to see how many State and county medical societies are employing professional public relations men, or setting up their own public relations departments. Already, 23 State State societies employ full-time public relations men. Many, in addition to their own staff, employ professional counsel for the larger tasks that arise periodically. The development of better public relations at the local level is one of the finest moves medicine could possibly make.

Physicians did not seek their present prominent position in the public eye. It was forced on them by the planners of the welfare state, who saw in the medical profession the first victim of their program of socialization. But like the boy who didn't intend to fall into the creek, we physicians have profited by the experience.

We have learned to swim, so to speak. We have seen demonstrated in dramatic fashion the basic assumption of our democracy—that when the people are given the facts, they decide wisely. Wherever the effort has been made to keep the public informed, the rewards in better understanding and increased cooperation have been great. Our enemies still may hate us, but our friends know us better and like us more.

In this third year of our National Education campaign we have reached a point where a little constructive, personal evangelism is called for. We all know the therapeutic value of mutual understanding and confidence between physician and patient. Just the other day a letter came to compaign headquarters from a physician in Minnesota. That letter outlined a thoughtful and thorough plan for enlightening the public as to just what it means to be a physician. It would be of immeasurable value to the medical profession if that sort of initiative and creative thinking about our relationship with our patients and our fellow citizens could become an integral part of all our lives.

ELMER L. HENDERSON, M. D.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

CHICAGO, April 11, 1951.

The Honorable OSCAR R. EWING,
Federal Security Administrator, Federal Security Agency, Washington, D. C.:

We have your telegram of April 3, protesting a reference in the Journal of the American Medical Association, to a pamphlet issued by your office titled, "Common Human Needs, an Interpretation for the Staff in Public Assistance Agencies," from which I quoted the following passage, "Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state envisaged in a democratic ideology, a way of life which so far has been realized only in slight measure."

We note your denial of responsibility for the pamphlet on the grounds that it was published in 1945 before your tenure as Administrator of that office. This denial, as you request, will be duly reported in the Journal. You are correct in assuming that as a reputable scientific periodical it is the habit of this Journal to verify statements before publication. The facts concerning my reference are these.

The pamphlet in question was reprinted for distribution by your office in 1949, when the public record indicates you were in charge of the Federal Security Agency, its publication and its directives to employees. Five copies were received in the mail here last week, which indicates certain currency still. These all carry the imprint, "Government Printing Office, 1949." The fact that the report was first printed in 1945 would not seem to alter the further fact that you apparently have thought well enough of it to have it reprinted in 1949.

We would suggest that if you wish at this time to disavow the principles expressed in the pamphlet, you will wish to do so in a formal statement to Congress, for as recently as February 26, this year, it was protested on the floor of Congress as a grave misuse of taxpayers' money to disseminate wholly un-American philosophies.

In case it was without your knowledge that your office was reprinting and distributing such un-American directives during your tenure, you may wish to issue a public statement disclaiming responsibility for the material. If so, we shall certainly be glad to be helpful in giving such a statement further distribution through the Journal, for the medical profession will be sincerely interested in any such action.

ELMER L. HENDERSON, M. D.
President, American Medical Association.

CHICAGO, April 10, 1951.

The EDITOR, THE JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION:

Dr. Henderson's answer to my telegram of April 3 is merely a continuation of the misleading statements contained in the President's page of the March 31 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association. Pamphlet in question was not reprinted for distribution by my office in 1949 or at any other time. Federal Security Agency has made only one distribution which was in 1945. Since then, occasional copies have been mailed out by Agency in response to specific requests. Learned for first time from Dr. Henderson's answer that pamphlet has been reprinted by Government Printing Office for sale by Superintendent of Documents. I refuse to be held responsible for actions of Federal Security Agency taken before I became Administrator, or for actions taken by Government Printing Office, or other Government employees without my knowledge. The statement to which you refer is as objectionable to me as it can possibly be to Dr. Henderson, and his attempt to make me responsible for it is a blow below the belt for which you and he should apologize.

OSCAR R. EWING,
Administrator, Federal Security Agency.

APRIL 13, 1951.

The Honorable OSCAR R. EWING,
Federal Security Administrator,
Federal Security Agency,
Washington, D. C.:

I have in hand your wire concerning my recent reference to a Federal security agency pamphlet which carries the statement: "Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state et cetera."

You say that occasional copies of the pamphlet have been mailed out by your office since your tenure there but that you refuse to be responsible for such distribution.

You state also that you refuse to be held responsible for actions of the Federal Security Agency before you became Administrator, or for actions taken by Government Printing Office or other Government employees without your knowledge.

As you know, the pamphlet carrying this viciously un-American pronouncement is being distributed currently under the imprint of your office, and carrying the printing date 1949 when you were in charge there. As you state in your wire your own office mails these pamphlets out on request.

You state however that the pronouncement concerning the socialized state is wholly objectionable to you. If this is the case, I would suggest in all kindliness that the reasonable manner in which to clarify your own position would not be in telegrams to the Journal of the AMA but first by asking the Government Printing Office to cease reprinting and distributing the material attributed to your office.

Second that since it is without your knowledge that your office is distributing the material, your staff be instructed accordingly.

Third that since your office's circulation of these socialistic principles first came to light in the United States Congress, that your responsibility for it be denied there, in order that your true position be clear not just to the medical profession but to the lawmakers of the Nation.

We do appreciate your difficult position and are gratified to be advised that such a malevolently un-American pronouncement is not subscribed to by you. This correspondence will be published in the Journal.

ELMER L. HENDERSON, M. D.,
President, American Medical Association.

PRINTED ORIGINALLY IN 1945—FSA PAMPHLET TEACHING SOCIALISM ORDERED DESTROYED

(By Lyle C. Wilson)

Federal Security Administrator Oscar R. Ewing has ordered destroyed all copies of an FSA pamphlet assailed by the American Medical Association as malevolently and viciously un-American.

Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, president of AMA, charged in a telegram to Mr. Ewing that a passage in the pamphlet advocated state socialism. Mr. Ewing disclaimed responsibility for the pamphlet and disavowed the passage to which the AMA objected.

The 132-page pamphlet was a manual for social workers written and first circulated by the Federal Security Administration in 1945 before Mr. Ewing became administrator.

After Mr. Ewing took over, the Government Printing Office was authorized by FSA in 1949 to print another 5,000 or so. They were for sale by GPO at 35 cents each and Mr. Ewing's office occasionally sent them to persons who asked for copies.

The offensive material spotted by Members of Congress and the American Medical Association appeared in a discussion of the "rights" of adults to relief and social security assistance. It read:

"Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state envisaged in a democratic ideology, a way of life which so far has been realized only in slight measure."

Mr. Ewing telegraphed a protest to the AMA on April 3, stating that the pamphlet had been printed in 1945 and no longer was being circulated.

On April 11, Dr. Henderson replied to Mr. Ewing that he was mistaken because the AMA had received in the mails within a few days 5 copies of the pamphlet all dated as having been printed in 1949.

FSA said the author of the pamphlet was Charlotte Towle, temporarily employed by the agency when she wrote the pamphlet. Miss Towle was connected with the University of Chicago School of Social Work.

Jane M. Hoey, director, FSA bureau of public assistance, wrote the pamphlet foreword. She continues in that position under Ewing's administration of FSA.

The Indian Bureau Has No Constructive Over-All Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that every Member of this House appreciates the great responsibility we have in deciding how far to go in approving the budget proposals of the thousand and one governmental departments, bureaus, and agencies. The grand totals are staggering, and I must admit that I am greatly confused as I try to fathom requests for funds to carry on their duties. Indeed, I feel strongly that I also have a duty to the taxpayers who after all must foot the bill. The fact is that "authority and responsibility are inseparable." As the elected representatives of our people we have the authority to consider and then to pass judgment upon the budget proposals of the various departments and agencies. Likewise, we are responsible to the public from whom the taxes must come to pay the bills which make up the proposed budget.

It is very hard for me to act intelligently upon the issues before us without more information as to the real necessity for the enormous demands of the Indian Bureau, which totals some $71,000,000. I note that according to the committee's report, they have approved $65,000,000. To my way of thinking, our job is similar to that of the renowned physician who, when called upon to operate upon a patient, stated that he would first have to make a complete study of the ailments of the patient, and thus learn the basic cause of his condition. Only after such study could he decide upon the wisdom of an operation. This Congress is again called upon to approve the annual budget from the Public Treasury for this Federal agency, the Indian Bureau, and yet, we do not have sufficient facts on which we can intelligently make a logical decision. I have examined the Committee Report No. 339 just released, and also the hearings just made available, and I am confused about approving this Indian Bureau Budget. The hearings on the Bureau budget starts on page 223, part 1, and end on page 300. The hearings are concluded in part 2, pages 1227 and end on page 1268. To me, it was interesting to note that the House Committee on Appropriations—on Interior and Indian Bureau—appointed special investigators to study and review "the entire subject of Indian affairs." That report is dealt with at length in the hearings, starting on page 225, part 1. Commissioner Myer was asked numerous questions regarding the wide scope of criticism directed by this special committee against the whole basic Indian Bureau management. To be more specific, the whole report constitutes a severe indictment against the Indian Bureau as such.

Yes; Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the physican or surgeon who is now called upon to perform the far-reaching "operation," if we will but examine this report and its recommendations, is pretty well equipped as to where to operate. When we go to the taxpayers and call their attention to the fact that we have fixed their taxes at a certain figure; that they, yes, every man and woman, must pay to the Government what we set out to sustain our hundreds of bureaus and agencies for the coming year—and the grand total runs into scores of billions—we find the average citizen asking us, Just why are these taxes necessary? And our answer is that the Indian Bureau wants $71,000,000 for the coming year. You and I know of the adverse criticism that has come from practically every committee of Congress and from scores of clubs and individuals who have made it their business to study and examine this Indian problem. We also have listened to some of the Indians who have come here to voice their criticism of their intimate experiences under this Bureau. And I feel that we should call upon other Indians to give us first-hand what they recommend should be done to "save the patient." Our hearings are too one-sided; for this year, I understand, we have heard directly from no Indian. I recall that last year, a delegation of upstanding Indians, from California, I believe, got a hearing and protested about giving the Indian Service any funds to keep it going in that State. Their arguments have been most convincing, because our subcommittee completely agreed with those Indians and eliminated the more than $2,000,000 asked by the Bureau, which would have liquidated it in that State. However, the Senate reinstated most of the Bureau's demands and it is now even asking us to allow the Bureau to carry on for another 3 to 5 years.

THE INDIAN BUREAU HAS NO CONSTRUCTIVE OVER-ALL PROGRAM

No modern business firm would approve the confusing and headless plan in its management such as we have had across the years under the guise of helping the Indian to qualify for citizenship responsibility. One has to but read the report of this special committee to appreciate the frightful and wasteful program of the Indian Bureau. For instance, one of our able committee members, in discussing this special report with Commissioner Myer at the hearings starting February 19, 1951, commented that there appeared to be "no real policy in mind by top-level management" and that "it indicates that apparently there is no place in the entire organization, including the people in the field, where they are able to handle, or are interested in handling, many of these problems." These are the comments of a member of our Committee on Appropriations made to Commissioner Myer after he had examined the special report. Charges have been made for many years that the Bureau spends a great share of the funds provided in carrying on duplicate agencies of the States and counties where Indians reside.

ACTING COMMISSIONER ZIMMERMAN'S RECOMMENDATIONS MADE IN 1947

Numerous comments have been made in the RECORD about the testimony of the then Acting Commissioner, Mr. William Zimmerman, made under oath before a Senate committee in February 1947, about his answer to an appeal by certain Indians when they demanded immediate release from Bureau wardship. Acting Commissioner Zimmerman responded by agreeing that some 10 prominent groups of Indians should be released from such wardship control. Mr. Zimmerman had been Assistant Indian Commissioner for 15 years at the time, and surely must have known considerable about the Indian problem. Although that recommendation was clear-cut, and made some 4 years ago, I do not see any definite program coming from the present Commissioner that he agrees that those 10 groups of Indians should be removed from Bureau control at this time. No; he speaks of "gradual independence of Indians from the supervision from the Bureau of Indian Affairs." The maze of plans and of directives and studies and similar excuses coming from the office of the Commissioner further confuses the problem. I am of the firm opinion that the time is ripe to perform that operation.

THE JOHNSON-O'MALLEY ACT OF 1934—A DEFINITE PROGRAM

After many years of careful study by leading authorities and students of Indian conditions, the Congress passed the Johnson-O'Malley Act on April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), under which authority the three major Indian problems could have been solved. The Indian Service has apparently failed to become enthusiastic about the law, for it has not in my opinion in the 16 years it has been a law, taken advantage of its possibilities. Its original supporters claimed that it meant the end of the Indian Bureau as such, for all the main problems of the Indian—education, welfare, and hospitalization—would be taken over by the States. The act provided that the Secretary could make contracts with the various States under which they would assume full responsibility in these specific fields of Indian services, and the Congress would appropriate whatever funds were found to be necessary. Such grants by Congress were to be made to the States, not to the Indian Bureau. If this act had been followed as intended, the present Indian problems would have been solved. For further information on this matter, I recommend the reading of an article appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Eighty-first Congress by Senator HUGH BUTLER, May 15, 1950, under extension of remarks.

THE WHEELER-HOWARD ACT OF 1934

It has been my opinion for several years that the Wheeler-Howard Act sponsored by John Collier, who became Commissioner in 1933, and somehow approved by the Congress, has undoubtedly done more to set our Indians back than has any other one act in Indian history. Today, I believe, it is universally condemned; it has not helped the Indian as it was claimed by its sponsors. It actually sets up a separate government of the area where Indians resided on their reservations and instead of Indians being assimilated into American citizenship as we all must agree is the solution of their problems, such Indians who could not remove themselves from its control, now find themselves depending on the Bureau—they actually surrendered their real liberties as citizens when they accepted the advice of the Bureau and approved the act. I commend the words of my colleague, Mrs. BOLTON, for her remarks on this matter.

INDIAN BUREAU ACCOUNTING—A "STEPCHILD"

In the field of accounting, the special investigating committee, also made a careful study, and likewise censured the lack of sound planning in this important field. Like all investigations into the activities of public officials, when one touches the finances, the manner in which public funds are spent, the most important problem is discovered. This is especially true, in my observation, regarding this Indian Bureau. On page 234 of the House subcommittee hearings on Indian Bureau budget requests, a member of the committee, commenting on the investigators' findings, stated:

> They point out that the Bureau has given lip service to the principle that its activities were pointed toward the eventual withdrawal of Federal supervision over Indian activities, but that the accomplishments have been nil. They are somewhat inconsistent toward the end of the report when they get down to California, where they seem to go along with the thought that that they are trying to get out of California.

At no place do I find any constructive program showing the Commissioner is now ready to recommend the immediate removal of Bureau control over any of the groups or bands of Indians in the list recommended by Acting Commissioner Zimmerman 4 years ago. I am ready to act now, leaving the so-called land and related questions to a special committee. Let us release the Indian immediately from this nightmare of wardship, and every one of his other problems can and will be solved.

The Man They Call a Warmonger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, as General MacArthur noted in his address before Congress, there are those who have attempted to brand him as a warmonger. In connection with that infamous accusation, I reread with interest an old newspaper clipping of an Associated Press report dated June 18, 1942. Under permission to extend my remarks, I insert the item in its entirety:

> "I am a soldier * * * but I am prouder to be a father."—Douglas MacArthur.
> NEW YORK, June 18.—Gen. Douglas MacArthur cabled the National Father's Day Committee today that while he was proud to be a soldier "I am prouder, infinitely prouder, to be a father."
> Chosen by the committee as "Outstanding American Father of 1942" MacArthur replied:
>
> "Nothing has touched me more deeply than the act of the National Father's Day Committee. By profession I am a soldier and take pride in that fact, but I am prouder, infinitely prouder, to be a father. A soldier destroys in order to build. The father only builds, never destroys. The one has the potentialities of death, the other embodies creation and life. And while the hordes of death are mighty, the battles of life are mightier still. My hope is that my son, when I am gone, will remember me not from the battle but in the home repeating with him our simple daily prayer, 'Our Father Who Art in Heaven.'"

Father of American Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following excellent article from the Lynn Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass., Saturday, April 28, 1951:

HORACE MANN

While Moscow is preparing to honor their national hero, Lenin, on May 1, American schools and colleges are making ready to celebrate the birthday of Horace Mann, father of American education, on May 4. The comparison between the beliefs and ideals of these two men is exceedingly great, for the first of the two opposed free thinking and free speech, while the other opened the door of learning for countless American boys and girls.

Born in humble circumstances at Franklin, Mass., on May 4, 1796, Horace Mann's life story reads like that of an Alger hero. How he rose above material handicaps to secure his own schooling, finally graduating from Brown University in 1819, has been an inspiration to many.

Realizing the shortcomings of the schools of his time, he sold his law books, locked his office door, and set out to improve the schools of the Commonwealth. As the first secretary of the board of education, in 1837, he began to pioneer for a more democratic form of education than had hitherto been enjoyed. Horace Mann regarded education as a preparation for life and believed that no education was complete without art, music, physical education, and hygiene, in addition to the traditional formal subjects taught at that period in American history. Believing that "common schools cannot prosper without normal schools," he established the first normal school in America for the training of those who wished to teach. Today we realize that we cannot have an adequate supply of well-trained teachers without teacher-training institutions.

Schools throughout the country are putting into operation those principles of education which Horace Mann set forth over a century ago, many of which we take for granted today. Just as Horace Mann believed "that teachers not only be better paid but also that they receive higher social considerations," so teachers today are working for professional salaries and prestige which becomes the dignity of the profession.

Those who are fortunate enough to live in Massachusetts can avail themselves of the privilege of visiting Horace Mann's birthplace at Franklin and those places which he frequented while he was actively engaged in education in this State. It is fitting that the statue of a man who established the ideals of education for an entire nation should stand at the entrance of our statehouse in Boston and to serve as a reminder that educated thinking should govern the principles and actions of those who operate the government of the Commonwealth.

May we hope that some day the teachings of Horace Mann supplant those of Marx in those parts of the world where liberal education and teaching is suppressed.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Case for the Seaway," published in the Miami News of March 26, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASE FOR THE SEAWAY

Congress at this session should stop dwadling on the St. Lawrence seaway and authorize this project which has suddenly become critical to the national defense.

In the past years there was ample economic and diplomatic justification for the project. It would increase the output of power. It would make a navigation channel from the Atlantic to the Great Lake ports. It would strengthen the economic and political bonds that tie us to Canada, our peaceful, useful, and cooperative neighbor to the north. We have been letting an important resource lie fallow, and there is no excuse for that.

If one scratches the surface of the arguments that have kept Congress immobilized on the seaway since the days of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the objections amount to this:

The seaway, if built, would create competition for the railroads. It would create competition, or the threat of Government competition, with the power companies. It would divert some sea traffic from New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and a few other Atlantic deep-water ports. It is the mobilization of private interests, interests that run counter to the national interests, that has blocked the seaway up to now.

But now the national interest in the building of the seaway is stronger than ever, for the seaway bears heavily on the needs of national survival.

Social Security Versus Railroad Retirement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three tables entitled "Exhibits A, B, and C," making certain comparisons between tax rates and benefits under the social security and railroad retirement systems, and showing the gross discrimination existing against railroad employees as compared with their friends who are under the social-security system.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT A.—Social-security versus railroad-retirement tax payments—a comparison

Social Security Versus Railroad Retirement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD four tables entitled "Exhibits D, E, F, and G," giving additional comparisons between the social security and railroad systems, indicating that railroad employees do not receive as much for the money they pay in taxes, as do those working in jobs covered by the social security system.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT D

Dependents' benefits are more important than retirement benefits. So long as a man is still alive, he may be able to continue working and support his family, or if he has been successful he may have been able to accumulate something to help him out when he retires. Dependents' benefits are primarily intended to take care of cases where the breadwinner dies relatively young and there must be some provision to take care of his wife and children.

EXHIBIT E. FOUR TIMES 1½ PERCENT EQUALS 6 PERCENT

One rail worker pays 6-percent railroad-retirement tax. One industrial worker pays 1½-percent social-security tax. Therefore, one rail worker pays as much tax as the combined tax of four industrial workers.

Social security provides four industrial workers and their families with retirement and survivor benefits as compared to railroad-retirement benefits received by one rail worker, for whom there are no family benefits until after his death.

EXHIBIT F

Under the Social Security Act, recently revised, the average monthly earnings of a qualified individual is all that is necessary to quickly determine the amount of retirement and survivor benefits.

Under the Railroad Retirement Act, the formulas used appear complicated and difficult to remember. The average rail employee seldom knows the amount of his retirement annuity until after receiving his first check. Similarly, his wife and/or children, have little or no knowledge of the amount of survivor annuities due them, until after his death.

Basically, the social security simplified formula (determined by taking 50 percent of the first $100 of total earnings, and 15 percent of the balance, up to $300 per month) could be adopted and applied to figuring benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act.

Because the average rail employee today has a vague knowledge of benefits due him and/or his family, the social security simplified formula could appear on the reverse side of employee's stub (Form BA6) annually received by each rail employee, showing total months of service and wages from 1937 to date. This could keep him constantly informed as to benefits he and/or his family may receive.

NOTE.—Of each $6 paid by rail employees, $1.50 (total cost of all social-security benefits) is allocated to disability annuities. By comparison to social security, rail employees pay 3 times (200 percent) more taxes for pensions, retirement, and survivor annuities, and 4 times (300 percent) more taxes when disability annuities are included.

Confidence in the Chiefs of Staff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting article written by Walter Lippmann, which appeared in the Washington Post this morning. The article discusses the danger of the publication of secret papers.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

STOP, LOOK, AND LISTEN

In view of what appears to be coming in the great inquiry which begins on Thursday we must ask ourselves what is going to happen to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They face the fact that there is now to be published an only somewhat expurgated version of their most secret papers. When they wrote or approved these papers they believed that these papers would not be published—that they would be confidential for themselves, their lawful superiors, and the commanders in the field to whom they issued instructions.

There is no need to guess now about what the publication of these papers is going to prove about the best way to conduct the Korean war. But one does not have to be a prophet to see what the precedent now being set is going to do to the conduct of the United States Government.

We, that is to say the administration and the opposition and everyone else so far as I can see except a few stray dissenters, have accepted the theory that an officer, who disagrees with his orders, may by challenging the integrity of his lawful superiors compel them to open up all their files to the inspection of Congress. According to this theory the congressional investigators are the judges of what shall or shall not be published. What they decide to publish is to be treated as the evidence in a popular debate which is to pass upon the integrity and the competence of the men responsible for the defense of the Nation.

This is the theory which we are about to make into a precedent. It is being done, some say, in the name of the sacred right of the people to know all the facts. They are, I believe, profoundly mistaken. If this theory goes unchallenged, if what is about to be done is accepted as a precedent, as one of the legitimate usages of our constitutional system, the effect will not be to give the people access to the truth. The effect will be to conceal, to disguise, to falsify the truth that is given to the President, and to the Congress, and to the people.

Once the precedent is set, it will mean that no paper in the files of the Government can be considered truly confidential. Today, the arbiter of what is and of what is not confidential happens to be Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL of Georgia, an able and judicious man. But if Senator RUSSELL can browse around in the papers of the Chiefs of Staff and be the arbiter as to whether they have a right to say that this paper is too secret to be published, then his successors will also be the arbiters.

Senator RUSSELL is a Democrat who will not wish to injure fatally a Democratic administration. But his successor might be one who did wish to do just that, and he might insist, therefore, upon publishing the very documents which Senator RUSSELL has not published. Thus all the Chiefs of Staff, and I might add all other responsible officials, are on notice from here on out that some time or other any document they sign may be published in whole or in part, in its context or out of its context.

What will this do to the Chiefs of Staff? Approximately what it would do to a boy writing to his girl, to a husband writing to his wife, to a business man writing to his partner, or to Senator TAFT writing to Senator WHERRY, if they felt sure that their letters were going to be published—most probably at the moment when they would cause the maximum embarrassment. Letters written with a knowledge that they may be published will be the kind of letters that are written for publication. They will be phonies in that they will say what will look as well as possible in print. The effect will be to make the formal papers of the Government a false front which does not reveal, which in fact is designed to conceal, the truth. This is already the character of some of the paper work in the Government; it is written with an eye to the headlines which will be used when and if it is published, and what the official really thinks has to be ascertained by calling him on the telephone or asking him to lunch. But this kind of disintegration has not presumably become characteristic as yet of the papers that deal with the issues of life and death, with the military security and the high policy of the United States.

But if this evil precedent is set, that is just what will happen to these papers. They will be written for publication and they will be addressed not to the vital interests of the United States in the long run but to the passions and the prejudices and the ignorance of the moment. The papers will not be worth reading if they are written for publication. In fact they will be worse than useless in that they will not be honest.

Those who think that the right of the people to know can be met by destroying the rules of confidence and publishing anything and everything should ask themselves why they think it right, why they believe it to be part of the very substance of liberty, that some relations shall be privileged and not opened to publicity; the relations of husband and wife, of lawyer and client, of doctor and patient, of priest and his charges. Why do we protect these relationships? Is it not in order to protect our liberties? In Government the relationship between the civil power and the military, between the President and his lawful military advisers, the Joint Chiefs, is as sensitive and as critical as any of the private relations that we protect. On the integrity of the relation between the President and his advisers may depend the life of the Nation. That relation must be destroyed, it will be destroyed, if the privilege of confidence is taken away.

Proposed Investigation of State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the American Legion Executive Committee of the Department of Indiana, together with the opening remarks of Department Commander Jack McIntyre at the emergency meeting on April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the resolution and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIANA EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

The American Legion executive committee of the Department of Indiana in a special meeting on Thursday, April 12, after hearing a full report of Don Wilson, Clarksburg, W. Va., chairman of the foreign relations committee of the national organization of the American Legion, adopted the following recommendations as a matter of policy of the Department of Indiana:

1. Insist that an impartial committee of the Senate or House conduct a careful and impassionate investigation of the State Department and that Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, be immediately replaced, so as to give the American people a feeling of confidence in their Government's foreign policy.

2. That a demand be made upon Congress to enact laws that this Nation will make no export or loan to any other nation who sells war materials directly or indirectly to any nation who directly or indirectly is engaged in combat against American troops, or who threatens violence by word or deed in its dealings.

3. To request of the Congress, action to prevent our State Department and/or the President from giving Formosa to the Red Chinese.

4. To request of Congress that it make appropriations of moneys for Nationalist China, so that they can continue to build a strong military force and to discourage Soviet and Red Chinese aggression, and provide by such action safeguards of administration that will insure that this money will be spent wisely and economically.

5. To request that Congress enact a law providing penalties, by fine or imprisonment, for any officer in Government charged with carrying out Congress' will, who intentionally failed to do so, and urge strict enforcement of present statutes.

6. To request of our Congress that Gen. Douglas MacArthur be invited to make a public report to the joint sessions of the Congress of the United States for the benefit of those bodies and all American citizens. The Department of Indiana deplores the fact that partisan politics has been injected in the issuance of the present invitation.

7. To request of Congress that they instruct the United States delegation to the United Nations to emphatically oppose the admission of Red China to the United Nations, and to use the veto power, if necessary, to prevent such admission. That the people of this country request of the United Nations that it immediately take steps to become a United Nations in actuality and stop the Communist aggression fast spreading over the free countries of the world.

8. To request of Congress that it refuse to appropriate any money to carry out any treaty obligation, the terms of which have not been approved by the Senate as provided by the Constitution of the United States.

9. To enact a program of universal military training and insist that Congress desist from the political bickering which to this date had delayed and impeded its passage.

In addition to the above recommendations, the committee endorsed the following statement of National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., in which he urged the following:

1. Use of the Chinese Nationalist troops to fight the invading Communists.

2. Bombing of Red jump-off bases in Manchuria.

3. Blockading of Chinese ports to cut off flow of supplies.

"These measures are necessary to save American lives. They are military decisions, not political. * * * Unless General Ridgway is permitted to do the things MacArthur was forbidden to do, there can be no genuine United Nations victory in Korea."

OPENING REMARKS OF INDIANA DEPARTMENT COMMANDER JACK MCINTYRE AT THE EMERGENCY MEETING OF THE DEPARTMENT EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, WHICH WAS HELD THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1951, AT DEPARTMENT HEADQUARTERS

Members of the executive committee, first I would like to state the purpose of this meeting. It has been called for the reason that a policy of the Department of Indiana must be formulated in regard to the present crisis. I regret the use of the term "MacArthur Crisis" in the news releases. This meeting shall be for the purpose only of establishing our policy for the guidance of the department and the various posts of the department.

The American Legion must never be labeled as a group used for political purposes. I remind you that our constitution specifically states that the American Legion shall be absolutely nonpolitical, and shall not be for the dissemination of partisan principles. I trust that you will govern yourselves accordingly in any discussion which may follow. The demand for a statement of policy of this department comes from the people of the State, from the rank and file members of our organization, and from the various posts of the department. The American Legion has long been looked to as one of the leading organizations of this country. The people of this State desire to know our policy. Under trying days that we are now facing, we should definitely state our attitude. The unity of this country must be one of the chief purposes of our organization.

Our organization has long advocated strong national defense. Such a defense must be supplemented by a proper and understanding foreign policy. It is our duty as a part of the national organization to express our feelings and our recommendations to the national organization for consideration.

In the past few days, too many people have made hasty statements without due consideration of the problems involved. There is a great need for a constructive and an understanding expression of the problems facing the United States today.

We are fortunate in having with us tonight Donald Wilson, chairman of the National Foreign Relations Committee of the American Legion, to review and explain many of the problems facing us as a country, and to review action taken in the past by the American Legion regarding foreign policy.

The question of the right of the President to discharge General MacArthur is entirely without the province of our department. That question need not arise at this meeting. I would class it as being of a political nature and would feel justified in ruling such discussion out of order.

Our purpose here tonight must of necessity be to develop a clear understandable statement of policy and recommendations to the people of the State of Indiana and to all others concerned. The demand for our answer has been great, and it being a matter of policy, I felt justified in calling this special meeting.

You are the representatives of the Legion in your area, and I know that you speak for the Legionnaires you so represent. May the discussions and the decisions reached from such discussion be solely for God and country.

The Soldier and the Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Soldier and the Statesman"; I also ask to have printed in connection with this editorial another under the subhead "The great debate," both being published in the April 28 issue of America. The second editorial discusses the controversy over the removal of General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOLDIER AND THE STATESMAN

All professions have their dangers, all general truths have their fallacies, all spheres of action have their limits, and are liable to improper extension or alteration. Every professional man has rightly a zeal for his profession, and he would not do his duty towards it without that zeal. And that zeal soon becomes exclusive, or rather necessarily involves a sort of exclusiveness. A zealous professional man soon comes to think that his profession is all in all, and that the world would not go on without it.

We have heard, for instance, a great deal lately in regard to the war in India, of political views suggesting one plan of campaign, and military views suggesting another. How hard it must be for the military man to forego his own strategical dispositions, not on the ground that they are not the best—not that they are not acknowledged by those who nevertheless put them aside to be the best for the object of military success—but because military success is not the highest of objects, and the end of ends—because it is not the sovereign science, but must ever be subordinate to political considerations or maxims of government, which is a higher science with higher objects—and that therefore his sure success on the field must be relinquished because the interests of the council and the cabinet require the sacrifice, that the war must yield to the statesman's craft, the commander in chief to the governor general.

Yet what the soldier feels is natural, and what the statesman does is just. This collision, this desire on the part of every profession to be supreme—this necessary, though reluctant, subordination of the one to the other—is a process ever going on, ever acted out before our eyes. The civilian is in rivalry with the soldier, the soldier with the civilian. The diplomatist, the lawyer, the political economist, the merchant, each wishes to usurp the powers of the state, and to mold society upon the principles of his own pursuit. (From an address to the students of medicine of the Catholic University of Ireland by John Henry Newman, rector of the university, November 1858.)

The Great Debate

If anything were needed to prove beyond all question that the discussion of public issues has reached a low ebb in the United States, it is the furor over the removal of General MacArthur. Emotion, half-truths, unsubstantiated reports, and extremely fragmentary information have been fused in the fire of smoldering resentments and frustrations into a strange alloy that passes for public opinion.

In the first place, it is hard to see how the President of the United States can allow a military commander in one theater to preempt executive control over our foreign policy. As Cardinal Newman wrote nearly a century ago, military policy must remain subservient to political control. Political control must remain in the hands of civilians elected through established procedures of popular control of our Government. The President of the United States, in conjunction with Congress, is responsible to the people of this country for our foreign policy. When a military commander, no matter how skillful or successful, attempts to usurp the authority of the President and of Congress, the only possible course for the President is to remove him. Otherwise we would have anarchy.

General MacArthur, after all, is not the only military figure who might exploit his popularity to try to wrest from the President control of our foreign policy in its military aspects. General Eisenhower, for one, has just as much right to try to assume the driver's seat. On hearing of MacArthur's removal, Ike said that a man accepts certain inhibitions when he dons a uniform. General MacArthur apparently found it impossible to accept such inhibitions. In that case he should have resigned instead of precipitating the present confusion. After resigning he could have had his say.

All informed observers readily admit that the President certainly acted within his constitutional authority in removing General MacArthur, and acted with good reason. They add, however, that the question of the wisdom or unwisdom of MacArthur's policy, as contrasted with the one we have adopted, is still debatable. This is true. But the reasons for sticking to our present policy, instead of making substantial changes in it, have not been sufficiently set forth.

Foreign policy demands continuity. No policy will work if we spend several years laying its groundwork, spend billions and billions of dollars to put it, so to speak, within scoring distance, and then drop it for a new policy—a new policy for which no similar groundwork has been laid and for which, quite possibly, no similar groundwork could be laid.

We have a foreign policy, one which was summarized in these pages ("United States foreign policy: 1945–50." America, January 27, 1951). This policy was set by our elected officials. It embraces the United Nations, the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, and the North Atlantic Pact. The United Nations is important chiefly because the Charter enunciates principles accepted by almost the whole world (at least verbally) and accepted in reality by the vast preponderance of the peoples of the world. A United States foreign policy based on the Charter has the maximum support from other nations which any United States foreign policy can have.

The Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, and the North Atlantic Pact are, generally speaking, United States-sponsored policies originated to make up for the incapacity of the UN to achieve international security. They were all adopted and implemented over a period of 4 years, after our political, economic, and military authorities had decided that our national security depended on keeping the nations of Western Europe free and strong.

This we have done. Militarily, Europe is only beginning to produce the divisions needed to ward off a Russian attack. But the economic and political strength necessary for a military build-up has been achieved. It has been achieved in accordance with a well-thought-out plan and at heavy expense to the United States.

Let's stop a moment to consider what we have in Europe. First of all, some 260,000,000 people—people whose traditions of political freedom and culture are similar to our own. Secondly, an industrial capacity so great that if we can keep it on our side we can outmatch Russia's capacity to produce the armaments essential to military victory. Thirdly, an enormous military potential, now being activated, plus air bases from which we can strike to stem a Soviet attack.

Contrast this situation with Asia. For one reason or another, we have built up next to nothing out there. It is extremely doubtful whether we could ever have built up much. Despite its teeming populations, Asia lacks effective political organization. It lacks industrial development. Its primitive and sprawling economics and political societies—with the exception, perhaps, of Japan—defy any attempt on our part to make reliable allies of its peoples. No nation in the Orient today can be built into a formidable military power within the next few years. From no terrain in Asia can we knock out Russia, if it comes to that. We could knock out the cities of Red China, but this would not destroy Red China. It would leave a mass of rural Chinese able to carry on guerrilla warfare endlessly.

Our present military armament is limited. We cannot pour much more of it into the Far East without weakening our ability to operate effectively in Europe. If we conquered the cities of Red China, where would that leave us? Russia would still be intact. It could probably move into Western Europe with ease. We would have lost allies who can play an extremely important part in the eventual defeat of Russia, and we would have gained practically nothing of value in the Far East. We are already punishing the Red Chinese in Korea so severely that they are shooting their seriously wounded. All available buildings are being requisitioned in the cities of China to care for the thousands of other casualties. The chances of our causing dissension and perhaps revolution on the mainland are improving daily.

We have nothing to fear from Red China. Soviet Russia is the foe we have to fear. Russia would probably like nothing better than to see us divert our at present limited power into an all-out war with China. It may be true that we could bomb Manchurian bases without getting into an all-out war with either Red China or Soviet Russia, but the odds are against it. The time may come when we shall have to take the chance. But the longer this decision can be postponed, the better.

We have nothing to lose by building up our military power and that of our allies so that we can use it where we, and not our enemies, think it ought to be expended. The impatience of a commander to be allowed to destroy the enemy facing him in the field is understandable. But the over-all decisions have to be made by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Hearst and other lion-baiting press can scream as loudly as they want. If we are careful not to alienate our European allies, the reason is that our military leaders, as well as our political leaders, are convinced that a quick victory in Korea can come too high.

Robert's Rules of Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, some 75 years ago Maj. Henry Martyn Robert, of the United States Corps of Engineers, published a book which has been of the utmost significance ever since in the public and civic life and activities of our country. His work, Robert's Rules of Order, has been the stand-by of legislators and citizens alike during three-quarters of a century, in their efforts to conduct public and civic gatherings in accordance with orderly procedures.

At the time this splendid publication was first issued, the author presented 1,000 copies to leaders in various activities of national life. Now, in connection with the issuance of the seventy-fifth anniversary edition of the Rules of Order, and in recognition of the fact that all of Major—later General—Robert's children have at one time or another lived in Maryland, it has been my very good fortune to receive a copy of this new edition, with the compliments of Mrs. Henry M. Robert, Jr., daughter-in-law of the author, and a woman of outstanding attainments.

Appropriately termed, in a New York Herald Tribune editorial of recent date as "Democracy's Best Seller," the publication has been purchased by citizens and organizations to a total of 1,500,000 copies since its publication in 1876.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Herald Tribune be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Democracy's Best Seller

A New England town meeting has often been called the best exemplification of democracy in action. And town meetings or other deliberative asemblies where the will of the majority rules and the right of a minority to be heard is respected owe their orderly procedures to a book which Maj. Henry Martyn Robert, of the United States Corps of Engineers, began to think about in 1863, worked over 14 years and finally published on February 19, 1876. The Library of Congress has recently held an exhibit celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of what might be called democracy's best seller. For Robert's Rules of Order has sold 1,500,000 copies since its publication date.

Brigadier General Robert died in 1925. His interest in the purpose and accomplishment of his book was fond and lifelong. He saw it become a classic of parliamentary procedure. In accepting last April from his widow manuscripts and other papers showing the growth of the "rules," Librarian of Congress Evans spoke of the way in which the work of General Robert had helped "democracy express itself in terms of decision, action, and result." It was accurate appraisal and just praise. Wherever men gather in large or small numbers to practice their faith in the right of free men to discuss in large or small degree community decision and action, they owe their rules of harmonious debate to the pages of Henry Martyn Robert's genuinely monumental manual. The copyright on Robert's Rules of Order runs until 1971. But the claim to fame of a young Army engineer will last much longer in the democracy whose orderly expression and just bounds he did so much to establish.

Foreign Policy in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution adopted by Byron W. Thornburg Post, No. 10, of the American Legion, of Marion, Ind., regarding the Asiatic policy of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the preamble to the constitution of the American Legion pledges this organization to foster and perpetuate 100-percent Americanism, and through its national department and district leaders, schools, contests, and distribution of educational literature, and the zeal of its members the American Legion has been waging a constant fight against communism; and

Whereas in the course of events, there has been a trend in the foreign policy of the United States Government toward appeasement and recognition of world Communist elements as evidenced by recent congressional investigations, the United States Government's foreign policy toward China, and the refusal of our Government to allow blockading of Communist Chinese ports or the bombing of Communist Manchurian bases in the war in Korea; and

Whereas these aforesaid events exemplify a foreign policy pursued by the United States Government in direct opposition to the spirit of the preamble of the constitution of the American Legion by appeasing and recognizing Communist elements whose admitted purpose is to overthrow the Government of the United States by force: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Byron W. Thornburg Post, No. 10, of the American Legion, Department of Indiana, declare that the spirit and creed of the American Legion can best be promoted by demanding that the foreign policy of the United States embody the following directives:

1. That the United States Government not recognize the communistic Chinese Government.

2. That the United States Delegates to the United Nations work against and vote against admission of Communist China to the United Nations, and in the event it shall become necessary that the Delegates of the United States to the United Nations exercise the veto power of the United States for the purpose of preventing the admission of Communist China to the United Nations.

3. That the island of Formosa never be turned over to Communist China.

4. That the Manchurian bases of Communist China be bombed by the United Nations forces fighting in Korea if deemed necessary by the Far Eastern Command.

5. That Nationalist China manpower be utilized in the war against the Communists.

6. That Communist China not be permitted to take part in the Japanese peace treaty.

7. That the United Nations forces in the Far East be permitted to blockade the Chinese Communist ports; be it further

Resolved, That Byron W. Thornburg Post, No. 10, American Legion, Department of Indiana, demand the resignation of the present Secretary of State of the United States Government and his aides and counselors responsible for the present United States foreign policy; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this meeting of Byron W. Thornburg Post, No. 10, American Legion, Department of Indiana, and that copies thereof be forwarded to Senator HOMER E. CAPEHART, Senator WILLIAM E. JENNER, Representative JOHN V. BEAMER, National, Department, and District Headquarters of the American Legion, and to the members of the press.

Approved and adopted by special meeting of Byron W. Thornburg Post, No. 10, American Legion, Department of Indiana at Marion, Ind., this 13th day of April 1951.

WILLIAM IRELAND,
Post Commander.

General MacArthur Underestimates Fanatical Faith of Chinese Communists, Says Marquis Childs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article by Marquis Childs, which appeared in the Washington Post of Friday, April 27, 1951. The article entitled "The Error of Easy War," follows:

THE ERROR OF EASY WAR
(By Marquis Childs)
EXAMPLES IN HISTORY

Confronted with the dynamic of communism since 1917, the West has reacted with a series of errors that add up to something close to disaster. Those errors seems to me to have grown primarily out of repeated underestimation of the force of communism as an ideology, as a godless religion, as a system of capturing the hopes and imagination of millions.

In the long tragedy of errors two stand out with glaring conspicuousness. And what is more they suggest that a third blunder arising from this same underestimation will be made if some powerful people have their way.

The first error lay in the effort of the British with a little help from the other allies, to put down the Bolshevik revolution after the end of World War I. Intelligence reports indicated widespread disaffection in Russia directed at the little band of conspirators who were beginning to apply the techniques of a new tyranny.

These reports, which were substantially correct, led the British to believe that by backing certain Cossack generals and sending in an expeditionary force the revolution could be put down and the threat to the stability of all Europe brought to an end. But the means used for this objective were pathetically small. The expedition sent to Archangel was a mere handful of men and the Cossack generals were so discredited that they rallied little or no support behind them.

If the western allies had been prepared to send in a force of several hundred thousand trained and experienced men, the response of the Russian people might have been different and the shaky Bolshevik regime overthrown. In the war-weary west a force of that size and cost was out of the question. So the net result of the feeble and futile intervention was to leave a heritage of resentment and suspicion among the Bolsheviks and disillusion among those who had hoped to see the regime toppled over.

The second fundamental error was also, in my opinion, due to underestimating the force of communism as an ideology fanatically bent on world conquest. The mistakes of Yalta and Potsdam at the end of World War II derived from Roosevelt's belief that Soviet Russia would be willing to live side by side with the western powers in a peaceful world. It was in the hope of gaining Soviet confidence and cooperation that concessions were offered the Russians both in Europe and in Asia.

Roosevelt sincerely believed that he would win them around and only at the very end of his life was he at least partly brought to a sense of the realities by certain insulting messages from Stalin. The only small gain in this was that the rest of the world could not help but be convinced that America had done everything possible to get peaceful cooperation with the Soviet Union and that therefore the blame must be on the Russian side.

In his speech to Congress, General MacArthur included a review of developments in China in the past 50 years in which, incidentally, he made no mention at all of Sun Yat-sen, who was the principal leader of the revolution against the feudal regime of the Manchus. Then he said:

"There is little of the ideological concept either one way or another in the Chinese make-up. The standard of living is so low and the capital accumulation has been so thoroughly dissipated by war that the masses are desperate and eager to follow any leadership which seems to promise the alleviation of woeful stringencies."

This once again, it seems to me, underestimates the fanatical faith of the Communists in China who are seeking to weld an iron grip on the Chinese masses. Consequently, it encourages a serious underestimation of the task to be accomplished if communism is to be overthrown in China.

The long-term national interests of this country and of Asia may well coincide with such a goal regardless of its cost. But it cannot be won on the cheap and easy. It would call for military preparation far in advance of anything now planned and would in turn mean a resolution and determination on the part of the American people which would persuade us to accept continuing sacrifices and restrictions.

To try to do it on the cheap and easy could be expected to produce the results that came out of the feeble, half-hearted efforts to suppress the Bolshevik revolution in 1919 and 1920. America's friends in China, and they are undoubtedly numbered in the millions, would be made disillusioned and resentful. The Communist regime in Peiping would be strengthened.

It is revealing that many of the Republicans who have flocked around MacArthur's banner are those who have sought to curtail the draft, to put a ceiling on military manpower, to impede plans for the defense of Europe, and to cut military appropriations. They are seizing on what they think is a cheap and easy way to bring the war to an end with a sudden and miraculous victory.

General MacArthur has held out no such promise. Since he has advocated strength everywhere, it must be deeply disturbing that his words should give aid and comfort to men who seem to want to scuttle America's position in the world.

Decoration of Paul W. Ward by President Auriol, of France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in connection with the recent visit to Washington of President Vincent Auriol, of France, a distinguished honor was conferred upon Paul W. Ward, a member of the Baltimore Sun Washington bureau, who has specialized for a number of years in international affairs.

By authority of President Auriol, Mr. Ward was designated as a Chevalier of the French Legion of Honor, the citation listing it as a token of appreciation for an outstanding service to the cause of freedom and peace in the journalistic field.

Other newspapermen well known to Members of the Senate and to the people of this area generally who were accorded a like honor by President Auriol were James B. Reston, of the New York Times, and Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., of the Washington Post.

The people of Maryland were particularly pleased at the designation of Mr. Ward. Although still comparatively young, he has covered many of the world's important political developments here and abroad during the past critical 10 years.

The account of his award which appeared in an article in the Baltimore Sun suggests in all-too-brief fashion many of the important matters throughout the world which Mr. Ward has recorded for the Baltimore Sun. His excellence in the field of international reporting won for him in 1948 a Pulitzer Prize for a distinguished example of reporting of international affairs.

In these days when proper dissemination of information throughout the world is so important to the attainment and preservation of peace, objective reporting of international affairs is of the highest importance, and Mr. Ward and the other gentlemen mentioned are to be highly congratulated on the recognition that has been accorded them in this important field.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Baltimore Morning Sun of March 31 be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAUL WARD MADE CHEVALIER OF FRENCH LEGION OF HONOR

WASHINGTON, March 30.—Paul W. Ward, member of the Sun's Washington bureau and specialist in international affairs, was notified today of his designation as a chevalier of the French Legion of Honor.

The award was bestowed by authority of President Vincent Auriol, of France, now visiting in Washington, "as a token of appreciation for your outstanding services to the cause of freedom and peace in the journalistic field."

Mr. Ward is in Paris covering meetings of the Deputies who are trying to arrange a conference of Big Four Foreign Ministers—Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States. He received notice of his decoration in a cablegram from Henri Bonnet, French Ambassador to the United States.

TEXT OF MESSAGE

The notification message stated:

"The President of the French Republic has instructed me to inform you that you have been named chevalier in our national order of the Legion of Honor. This award is granted to you on the occasion of President Auriol's visit to the United States as a token of appreciation for your outstanding services to the cause of freedom and peace in the journalistic field."

Similar honors were awarded to James B. Reston, of the New York Times, and Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., of the Washington Post.

A member of the Sun staff since 1930, Mr. Ward, 45, has devoted more than half of that time to writing of world politics in Washington and abroad. In 1948 he was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for a distinguished example of reporting of international affairs.

The Pulitzer award was given in recognition of a series of articles on life in the Soviet Union, written in 1947 as a result of inquiries made by Mr. Ward while he was covering extended sessions of a foreign ministers' conference in Moscow that year.

Although nominally attached to the Sun's Washington Bureau since 1933, Mr. Ward has spent a great deal of his time abroad. From 1937 to 1939 he was the paper's London correspondent and was at that post when the Nazis started their sweep across Europe.

RETURNS IN 1940

After the British and French declarations of war he spent considerable time in France, reporting the progress of the conflict from various vantage points. He returned to the United States in 1940.

In Washington Mr. Ward makes the State Department his base of operations. He covered the Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1944, where the ground work of the United Nations was laid, and in 1945 followed through with coverage of the San Francisco Conference where the world organization actually was born.

Mr. Ward covered the meetings of foreign ministers in Paris in the summer of 1946, and in New York in December of the same year. In 1948 he spent 2 months in Italy, reporting the parliamentary elections of that year. He was on that assignment when notified of his Pulitzer prize award.

REPORTED ON UN

In 1949, Mr. Ward was back in Paris again to report a meeting of Big Four foreign ministers, and in 1950 he was in the French capital for North Atlantic Treaty discussions. Through the years since the United Nations began to function he has spent much of his time at United Nations deliberations in Lake Success and Flushing Meadows, N. Y.

Mr. Ward is a native of Lorain, Ohio; a graduate of Middlebury College, and lives with his wife and their two children in Chevy Chase, Md.

Secrecy in MacArthur Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Secrecy Is Blunderers' Refuge," by David Lawrence, which appeared in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRECY IS BLUNDERERS' REFUGE—ADMINISTRATION SEEKS ONLY ITS OWN SECURITY BY CLOSED HEARINGS IN MACARTHUR CASE

Secrecy and suppression are the refuge of the incompetent and the blunderere in government. Publicity, with everything put on the table, is the enemy of scandal and abuse of power.

These principles apply equally to military and civilian affairs.

The Kefauver hearings proved the point conclusively.

The decision to carry on in secret the investigation touched off by the President's arbitrary removal of General MacArthur is, therefore, serious error which can only increase the distrust that the American people feel now about the administration and the Democratic Party, which is in control of the Government.

It is a curious thing that the Democrats voted solidly for secrecy and the Republicans voted for open sessions of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The only excuse for closed sessions which has a semblance of logic is the claim that there are secret directives of a military nature, the texts of which ought not to be revealed for security reasons.

The principal security reason, of course, is the security of the democratic administration. It is doubtful if there is a single document now in the records really needed for the hearings which could give military aid to the enemy if made public. The habit of recent years in Washington is to put the "top secret" or "classified information" label on anything or everything that might cause a bureaucrat annoyance or put him on the defensive.

The ends of a legitimate safeguard or secret information can be served by paraphrasing the documents so that the enemy will not be able to decode anything they may have picked up heretofore of our secret messages. Once this paraphrasing is done—and it is being done nearly every week in some form with respect to diplomatic exchanges—there is no real danger in the publication of the information.

But in the event that a document emerges or is referred to in the open hearings which could be the source of military information, all the presiding officer at the hearings has to do is close the hearings for an interval at that point until that particular document is examined in secret. Whereupon the open hearings could be resumed.

The procedure decided on by the Democratic majority in the Senate Armed Services Committee will be to hold secret hearings and then allow a transcript to be edited and the edited version will be issued to the public.

The newspapermen will have to buy the transcript from stenographers, paying about 40 cents for every 150 or 200 words of testimony. The press will have no opportunity to observe the demeanor of witnesses. The delay between the time the testimony is given and the time the transcript will be available for publication may be hours, if not days. Meanwhile, the reporters will ask both the witnesses and the members of the committee what happened, and will get paraphrases and condensed versions which may or may not be influenced by the prejudice of the Senators who give out the information.

The press does not as a rule reproduce an exact copy of what has previously been paraphrased in the first dispatches. The end result is that a hearing of profound importance to the safety of the American people, involving past actions and the evolution of our foreign policy as well as our military policy, will get to the public for the most part in fragmentary and confusing form.

General MacArthur himself declined to specify how he wished the hearings to be held—whether they should be open or closed. He took the position that he, as a witness, really should not express an opinion and that it should be left to the committee to decide. This was a wise approach because the committee intended to vote for closed sessions anyway. The pressure from the Pentagon is to keep from the public as much information as possible would should that the military men concur even in part with General MacArthur. There is such fear in the Pentagon of getting in bad with the civilian or political side of the Government that officers prefer not even to discuss the MacArthur affair.

So it all boils down to the fact that, while America is suffering casualties in Korea due to a policy of limitation which General MacArthur has questioned, the American people are not going to get the full story of the reasons why the civilian authority in Government has substituted its own opinions for the judgment of competent military men in the field.

The Plasterer's Glee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article taken from the March 1951 issue of the Plasterer and Cement Mason, an official organ of the Operative Plasterers and Cement Masons International Association of the United States and Canada. The poem follows:

THE PLASTERER'S GLEE

We are a band of plasterers,
We beautify man's home;
Without our magic art
Oh, say, what would be Greece or Rome?

It was Hiram Brave, a widow's son,
God's temple did adorn,
And the plasterer's trowel
Made it seem as though of beauty born.

The Sistine and the Vatican,
St. Peter's majestic dome,
Were by the plasterer's trowel
Prepared for the grand cartoons of Rome,
Until a Titian, a Raphael, and an Angelo in glorious frescoes shine
That might be said to be born of the brain of Jove Divine.

The splendors of our Cap'tol,
And of the Taj Mahal,
The Parisian's pride—fair Notre Dame,
And London's grand St. Paul,
Are to the plasterers' art accredited.

The plastic art by God to man was given that so might man's enlightened heart cemented be to heaven.
Then glory be to the plasterer art,
So beautiful and bright;
It cheers both man and woman's heart,
With life, with love, with light.

We meet upon the level,
We part upon the square;
In union sweet our true hearts beat,
And joys and sorrows share.

We are a band of plasterers,
By love's cement united;
By the trowel and not the sword
Our brotherhood is knighted.

National Defense Requires Full Cooperation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday evening, April 29, 1951, I was privileged to address a very fine group of citizens in Brooklyn organized as the Committee of Brooklyn Gaglianese, which is headed by our distinguished colleague the Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO. This organization is presently engaged in furthering a very laudable project, the construction of an orphanage for the homeless and orphaned children of the Sicilian community Gagliano Castelferrato, in Italy.

Among the prominent guests at the dinner arranged by this organization, which took place in the Hotel Towers in Brooklyn, were the following: the Very Reverend John A. Flynn, president of St. John's University, who delivered a very inspiring and thought-provoking address regarding the international situation; Rev. Cyril F. Mayer, vice president of St. John's University; Rev. Giuseppe Grippaldi, director of the orphanage in Sicily; the Honorable James Amadei, member of the New York Workmen's Compensation Board; the Honorable Austin G. Cocuzza, former assistant district attorney for Kings County, who was general chairman; and Mr. and Mrs. Charles L'Episcopo, Angelo Manno, Joseph Di Stefano, Salvatore Abramo, Domenico A. Abrama, Mariano Fiorenza, Anthony Fagone, Guiseppe Muscolino, and many other prominent citizens of Brooklyn.

Since the greater part of my address was devoted to a discussion of international affairs and is, therefore, of general interest, I am placing it in the RECORD and commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

Mr. Chairman, reverend clergy, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, my colleague, Congressman ANFUSO, who as a freshman in the House of Representatives in Washington is doing such a masterful job, has indeed been very kind and gracious in his introductory remarks about me. I appreciate the opportunity to address my many friends who have foregathered here. I know of the magnificent work you are doing for the orphans in Italy, a humanitarian endeavor which is very close to my heart.

I love children, as we all do. I love their carefree laughter. I love their innocence and their simple approach to life and its problems. My only regret is that we have not been able to build a happier world for them where they could grow up as dignified citizens and healthy human beings. In this country, however, we are fortunate that we have made considerable progress in this respect, and we have been able to help people in other countries.

It is for this reason that I admire the work you are doing in raising funds for the construction of an orphanage in Italy, modeled somewhat along the lines of our own famous Boys Town, in Nebraska. A project of this nature is, in my opinion, truly laudable, not only in terms of the humanitarian motives which inspire them but also in terms of the reservoir of international good will and understanding which they are bound to make manifest between the people of this country and the people of Italy.

What is particularly pleasing to me is that my very good friend, the Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO, is taking such an active part and is doing such splendid work toward the realization of this worthy project. I think this is a very fitting occasion to pay tribute to him for his untiring efforts in furthering the cause of this project. Congressman ANFUSO deserves the highest commendation for his endeavors to establish a home for underprivileged children in this Sicilian community, which is located in one of the less developed areas of Sicily where housing and educational facilities are inadequate and the standard of living is low, despite the fact that the people there are hard-working and industrious.

Besides performing a humanitarian service, the establishment of this orphanage in Sicily, with the help of private American funds, can make a real contribution to the cause of the promotion of friendly relations between the people of the United States and the people of Italy. In these trying and tragic days, when it has become necessary to supplement formal methods of international relations with the informal amenities of human relations, the proposed orphanage will serve to foster good will and a constant reminder to the young and old of Italy that their hopes and aspirations are ours, too.

I should like to turn now for a brief discussion of international affairs, since these affairs affect us as citizens of the United States. Our country is faced today with problems which are greater in scope and significance than any it has encountered in the 175 years of its existence. It is difficult for us to evaluate the historical importance of the times, because we are living in this era which for us is still very much a reality, and also because of the lasting tension which threatens the peace of the world. We are very likely heading into a period of greater tension and new crises which threaten not only to disrupt world peace, but to enslave the whole free world, perhaps for decades to come.

It is extremely important for us, therefore, as peace-loving and freedom-loving citizens, to be fully informed and thoroughly acquainted with these problems. The decisions we are called upon the make during this tense period and the plans we are formulating will determine the sort of world our children and grandchildren will inherit. What we do today will determine whether future generations will be able to live in peace and freedom tomorrow.

The history of mankind is sometimes described as a history of continuous welfare. Although this statement has the element of truth in it, it is a cynical way of interpreting human history and the progress of civilization. During the last two centuries peoples and nations have not been fighting wars for the mere glory of it, rather can we say that the conflict of ideologices has often developed beyond its bounds and resulted in warfare and bloodshed. Basically, the struggle of mankind has developed into a struggle between two irreconcilable ways of life: Freedom and human dignity versus enslavement and the oppression of humanity. We can also put it another way: Are we to be Governed by justice or enslaved by force?

We can find many notable examples in history to illustrate this point. The French Revolution and the American Revolution were milestones in the struggle of freedom against enslavement. The Civil War in this country about 90 years ago was a struggle against slavery. The First and Second World Wars were a struggle of the forces of freedom and democracy against the forces of evil and human oppression.

After experiencing two devastating wars in our lifetime, we are faced with the prospect of a third world war which threatens to engulf all humanity. Sometimes we have the feeling that we stand helpless in the face of events and decisions over which we have no control. Actually, however, this is not a new experience in American history. Nearly a century and a half ago, when the United States became embroiled in the War of 1812 against its wishes, Thomas Jefferson made this very timely observation: "Experience has shown that continued peace depends not merely on our own justice and prudence, but on that of others also." Jefferson also voiced some very keen comment on the question of war which, in my estimation, deserves to be brought to the attention of all Americans as the message of one of the founders of this Republic and the father of American democracy. In discussing war and the alternative of war, this is what Jefferson said:

"All men know that war is a losing game to both parties. But they know also that if they do not resist encroachment at some point, all will be taken from them, and that more would then be lost * * * by submission than resistance. It is the case of giving a part to save the whole, a limb to save life. It is the melancholy law of human societies to be compelled sometimes to choose a great evil in order to ward off a greater."

Robert A. Vogeler, the American businessman who was released yesterday from a Hungarian prison after being confined by the Communist regime of that country for 17 months, put it this way: "You will never know what freedom is until you lose it."

Unfortunately, the path to peace and freedom is not easy to travel, because we live in an age of great happenings and equally great controversies, which keep us in a continual state of anxiety and worry. Witness all the fire and fury around the MacArthur issue, the turning of citizen against citizen, the denunciation of our leadership by people who have lost their heads, and the condemnation of our foreign policy by people who are not acquainted with the facts and have thrown all logic to the winds, not realizing that the fate of our Nation and the future of western civilization are more important than the fate of an individual.

It is the old problem of getting an informed citizenry which will seek the facts and evaluate the truth. Free and open discussion of our national problems are imperative in a democracy. Only by understanding these problems and clearly realizing our aims can we hope for democracy to survive; otherwise, we shall become quivering reeds in every storm of emotional controversy in which, in these trying times, we are caught so often.

I have reached the conclusion that one of the most important contributions that you and I, as individuals, can make to preserve freedom and safeguard peace is to help develop an informed and enlightened public opinion in this country. The whole world is looking to us for guidance toward a peaceful world of law and order. But if our own ranks are rent asunder by confusion and controversy, how can we expect our allies and the bulk of freedom-loving humanity to have confidence in us and to help us preserve peace and freedom? We must rely upon our allies for all that they can offer in the common defense, and we must in turn give them complete assurance that the United States will be ready to defend the free world, should such an emergency arise.

The question of world peace is a task for whole nations. Harsh criticism of our Government and impatience with the workings of the democratic process of government only contribute to the confusion in the public mind and result in great disunity of our people and loss of American prestige in the eyes of the world. This is one luxury we can easily forego in times such as these.

In the great conflict of ideologies which is now raging throughout the world, it is not enough for us merely to be against something, but to indicate to the world in unmistakable terms what we are for. At the time of the American revolution the people of this country were struggling for freedom, for equality, and for the inalienable rights of man. These ideals are still timely today, only we would add also the preservation of American values, the safeguarding of the democratic way of life, the dignity of the individual, and the maintenance of human rights.

This is not a time for bickering and fighting among ourselves. This is not a time for shirking our responsibilities and obligations. We must have sincere and full cooperation in our national life. We must work together as a team, and not at counterpurposes; otherwise, we shall be lost. We must continue to build the defenses of our country, but at the same time we must also continue our best efforts in the great endeavor to build a free and peaceful world in which we and our neighbors may live in contentment and security.

The defense of our country depends on the whole American people. In the long run, it is the people that count—all the 150,000,000 people of the United States—to champion the cause of peace, freedom, human progress, and a safer world for us and our children.

If there is any admonition or advice the people of this country need at this time, it is contained in the words of advice which Hamlet received from his mother in that great Shakespearean tragedy, when she said to him: "O gentle son, upon the heat and flame of thy distemper sprinkle cool patience."

If we could only remain calm and discuss our problems with more light and less heat, we shall find that we can achieve greater unity of purpose and better results for our country and ourselves.

"Fighting in Korea Is for the Preservation of Life, Liberty, and the Right to the Pursuit of Happiness for All Freemen"—General Van Fleet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of Saturday, April 28, 1951, entitled "Van Fleet's Inspiration":

VAN FLEET'S INSPIRATION

Courage, faith, humility—these are the qualities that stand out in General Van Fleet's first message to his troops. In simple language the new commander of the Eighth Army in Korea has brought encouragement to his soldiers in the face of the Chinese onslaught. He has done more, however, than praise the skill and determination of the United Nations forces and cite their superiority in all but numbers. With a directness which gains additional eloquence by the fact that it comes from the battlefield, he has summarized the larger issues in the fighting:

"You are fighting to stop armed aggression and maintain peace not only in Korea but in your respective homelands. This renewed battle is for the preservation of life, liberty, and the right to the pursuit of happiness of all freemen. These are fundamental in the rights of man—the rock upon which our civilization is founded—and they are the first rights which communism denies its own people.

"The time has come when all men of the free and decent world must steel their souls to face the desperate, bitter, and uncompromising battle with armed Communist aggression. Our strength rests on the solid foundation of belief in God and the rights of man rather than on the will of dictators, imposed through cruelty and complete disregard of human rights."

Even in the grimness of war, these words are inspiring to those who hear them, the more so because, as the troops must know, they spring from a deeply religious nature. They tell a lot about the character of a man who uttered them, and they carry a conviction borne of fighting experience and spiritual toughness which must show to the soldiers in Korea that their commander has the quality of leadership.

One Hundred and Sixth Birthday of Mrs. Martha Hiatt, of Moravia, Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the vast strides made in medical science during the last century, together with higher living standards, have contributed in making the life expectancy of an individual longer. However, even in these times, few live to be much older than "three score years and ten." So I am sure all Members of the House will be interested to learn of the recent one hundred and sixth birthday of Mrs. Martha Hiatt, of Moravia, Iowa. She has lived in Appanoose County, which is in my congressional district, for 99 years. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to mention these facts:

Mrs. Hiatt was born in Randolph County, N. C., April 26, 1845, and in 1852 moved to Iowa with her parents, a journey by covered wagon which required 3 months. In 1864 she was married to Mr. Oren Hiatt and she is the mother of 11 children, 5 of whom are still living. Her oldest son is 84 years of age.

All of her life Mrs. Hiatt has been active, and while she is in frail health at this time, she is looking forward to enjoying the spring weather when she can be outdoors and she even has made plans to visit relatives this summer.

Through the years Mrs. Hiatt has kept up an interest in world affairs and has voted in nearly every election since women's suffrage. She voted last fall.

Mrs. Hiatt's life has not only been long but also useful, and she is proud of the wonderful family she has reared. She enjoys talking about her children and grandchildren and has 47 direct descendants.

So unusual is it for one to live to be 106 years of age that Mrs. Hiatt's picture appeared yesterday on television on the Ted Mack show, the American Family Hour.

MacArthur Ouster May Alter Military Concepts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. J. BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky from the New York Journal-American of April 22, 1951:

MACARTHUR OUSTER MAY ALTER MILITARY CONCEPTS

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky)

The dramatic dismissal of General MacArthur from the supreme command in the Far East, though momentarily bewildering, may prove a blessing in disguise. Its most important result may be to bring about a bold reappraisal of our country's military concepts and leadership in line with its true strategic position.

Certainly such a reappraisal is desperately needed and cannot be much longer evaded if we are to head off catastrophe. The demand for it is implied in every one of the General's controversial pronouncements.

There is reason to surmise that he deliberately risked his personal status in order to force some grim facts upon the public mind.

The Korean tragedy is the product of confused foreign policies, which in turn rest on an unrealistic estimate of our military capabilities. MacArthur knew this better than anyone, for he had been compelled to fight an old-style land war in a limited and primitive theater of operation against overwhelming odds.

CHANCED RECALL

He is far too intelligent not to have foreseen the possibility of his own recall for talking out of turn. But he chanced it as a patriotic duty. He had to choose between this deep sense of obligation to the men in Korea and the Nation, and the consequences of overstepping the bounds of protocol.

As commander in the field, MacArthur saw the likelihood of a military debacle unless his hands were untied to strike at the privileged sanctuary of the enemy. He saw the critical value of imposing a second front on the Chinese Communists by unloosing a Nationalist offensive.

The debacle, in his view, would have been due to decisions in Washington and Lake Success, but the major blame would have been loaded on his shoulders. The brilliant record of a great soldier would have been tarnished.

CAN JOIN GREAT DEBATE

In a sense he is fortunate that the recall came in time to prevent this. More important, however, is the fact that he can now join the great debate on national strategy. He can do his share in helping to lead America out of the blind alley of archaic thinking in the Pentagon.

MacArthur, of course, is not the first military leader to stake his career in opposition to official policy in the interests of national security as he saw it.

There was Gen. Billy Mitchell in the twenties; there was Admiral Louis E. Denfeld in 1949. Whether they were right or wrong—and I think the admiral was wholly wrong—these men acted out of patriotic convictions.

FOUGHT FOR AIR POWER

Mitchell believed our military set-up would be calamitous unless air power was recognized as a service on a par with the Army and the Navy. He provoked a court martial by openly challenging his superiors.

It was said at the time—as now in the MacArthur imbroglio—that he should have resigned first and spoken out afterward. But we know that in our country an issue must be dramatized; that a resignation does not focus public attention like defiance and punishment.

Mitchell, Denfeld, now MacArthur prove that our military leaders are Americans first, officers second. When sincerely convinced that the country is in danger they do not hesitate to stick out their military necks.

THE PEOPLE DECIDE

This is all to the good. In a democracy basic strategic decisions are ultimately made by the people through their elected representatives. Individual acts of technical insubordination are sometimes essential as an appeal to the highest authority—the American people.

MacArthur has learned through the bitter experience of the last 9 months that a fundamental reorientation in military thought is essential. His recall obliges all Americans to take part in the process.

Unhappily, peace still has to be guaranteed by force. But if it is force of the wrong kind it cannot perform this job. On the contrary, fallacious strategy—the acceptance of an enemy challenge in the wrong place with the wrong forces—can only lead to war.

At best it brings a stalemate from which there is then no way out except humiliating retreat or a full-scale conflict.

IDEOLOGICAL BATTLE

The world is today in the throes of an ideological struggle on a global scale. Orthodox military concepts, in which the conquest of a piece of territory by foot soldiers is the goal, no longer apply.

Different strategy and tactics, revolutionary application of forces and weapons, are called for. But military minds steeped in traditional warfare are unable to grasp these new conditions.

MacArthur is a unique exception. My personal contacts with him in Tokyo on several occasions have convinced me that, compared to other ground generals, he has the broadest understanding of the implications of air power. Whether his successors will be able to deal with the new military equation remains to be seen.

AIR FORCE VITAL

In Asia the odds on the ground are so tremendous against us that our success depends on the effective use of air forces. Though the brunt of the casualties have been borne by soldiers, Asia—in any conflict involving the United States—can only be an arena of air operations if we are to win.

We can never hope to overcome the astronomic superiority of enemy numbers on the surface unless we obtain and exploit freedom of air navigation. But when we obtain such command of the air we can impose our will upon the enemy without the use of ground forces.

If a change had to be made in the Far East command, the supreme post should have gone to an airman. Now that the Communists are throwing air force into the scales, the air phase must become increasingly decisive.

INSURES GROUND-WAR BIAS

The ability to smoke an enemy out of fox holes will hardly tell the story. Generals Ridgway and Van Fleet, gallant soldiers both, are of the Marshall school, and their promotion is almost a guaranty of ground-warfare bias, with air power held more and more to an auxiliary role.

MacArthur's deeper appreciation of the air factor was indicated in a recent informal interview which did not get the attention it merited. Speaking to British Lt. Gen. H. G. Martin, he said that the Chinese lacked an industrial potential—oil, rubber, food.

Consequently, "the United Nations forces had only to blockade their coasts and smash their tenuous railway system to reduce them quickly to impotence."

To airmen this view makes strategic sense, of course. It comes close to what they urged in reference to Korea as the one effective alternative to mile-by-mile ground war to which generals of the balanced-forces school were committing us.

AIR-NAVAL BLOCKADE

Though MacArthur referred to "bombing," his proposal, if carried out by airmen, would amount to a combination of air siege and naval blockade—the strategic use of air and sea power as a strangulating application of military force.

That sort of blockade and siege can be made effective without use of ground forces, except perhaps in occupational roles after the enemy's will to resist has been broken. It is the strategy that could and should have been employed in Korea from the outset.

That a ground general of MacArthur's age is able to come close to such a revolutionary proposal seems to me a striking measure of his stature. Fortunately, his views will be even more sharply stated now that he has been relieved of his command.

The Real Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal on Tuesday, April 24, 1951, entitled "The Real Threat," which follows:

THE REAL THREAT

General MacArthur touched on the possibility of Soviet intervention only briefly in his speech to the Congress. While it was lucid on the problem of Red China, the address nearly overlooked the crucial Soviet question.

MacArthur believes, according to his speech, that the Soviet will not necessarily mesh its action with our moves like a cobra—our moves, in this case, being the bombing of Manchuria and blockades as proposed by the general.

"Any new enemy will more likely strike whenever it feels that the relativity on military and other potentials is in its favor on a world-wide basis," General MacArthur says. All of which means that only the enemy knows when he will strike.

At one time General MacArthur was confident that the Red Chinese would not intervene in the Korean affair. Other leaders thought so, too, but they were proved wrong. MacArthur now admits that China is engaging with the maximum power it can commit.

Either General MacArthur is so confident that the Soviet Union would not intervene that he passes lightly over the subject, or he is uncertain of the possibility and stays away from the subject. Whatever his situation, the prospect of Soviet intervention is, at the moment, the most important issue, and it cannot be passed over.

Were we certain the Soviet is not yet ready, we doubtless could do as MacArthur suggests and bomb Red China. But if we do, we must be prepared for the very likely prospect that the Soviet will change its passiveness to a terrible activeness, even as did the Red Chinese. In his intense concentration on the problem at hand—Conflict with the Red Chinese—General MacArthur may have overlooked the possibility of Soviet intervention that is the real threat in the Far East.

Brooklyn's Welcome to Senator Estes Kefauver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, the Borough of Brooklyn was host to a very distinguished visitor on Monday, April 23, 1951, the Honorable ESTES KEFAUVER, United States Senator from Tennessee and chairman of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee. Senator KEFAUVER addressed the twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Federal Grand Jurors' Association for the eastern district of New York at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which is located in the district I represent. Some 1,500 persons attended this meeting. Later that same evening Senator KEFAUVER addressed another 1,000 persons at Midwood High School at a meeting under the auspices of the Brooklyn Chapter of the Atlantic Union Committee.

It was truly a memorable and eventful evening for all those who attended either of these two meetings and heard the distinguished Senator speak. I was privileged to spend the whole evening with him from the time of his arrival and to accompany him to the various gatherings which the citizens of Brooklyn arranged for him. I met Senator KEFAUVER at the airport, and we proceeded from there to the Brooklyn Club, where a dinner was given in his honor by the Federal Grand Jurors' Association.

Present at the dinner were the following honored guests: Federal Judge Edward A. Conger, of the southern district of New York; Frank J. Parker, United States district attorney of the eastern district; Irving H. Saypol, United States district attorney of the southern district; Brooklyn Borough President John Cashmore; District Attorney Miles F. McDonald, of Kings County; District Attorney Frank S. Hogan, of Manhattan; Morris J. Solomon, commissioner of jurors; and United States Marshal Eugene J. Smith. They were singled out for special greetings and introduction at the annual meeting later.

Anthony W. Fitzgerald, counsel for the association, then presented a general report on the importance of the association in the life of the community and the work of the various committees. During the course of his address, Mr. Fitzgerald made the following interesting observations:

Under our American system of justice, the grand jury is the bulwark of the ordinary citizen, the honest law-abiding citizen, against an unjust or unfounded accusation of a crime. Under our American system, I repeat, no man can be dragged into court on a trumped-up charge—or without cause; nor can any man be brought to trial capriciously by an overzealous or venal prosecutor.

The distinguished aggregation of Federal and district attorneys on my right must bear witness to the statement that no man can be tried for a capital or other infamous crime without having first been indicted by a grand jury. A majority of our States—and all our Federal courts—require that 23 fellow-citizens of an accused must first hear and weigh the evidence against him before he can be brought into a trial court for any serious crime.

How different our American justice from the so-called justice—better, mockery of justice—in Communist and Communist-dominated countries, where judge, jury, prosecutor—and even the defense attorney have only one purpose, to convict the accused, or—as they put it, to make him "confess."

Those 23 persons constitute what is known as a grand jury and their qualifications illustrate the fairness of our American system, for they are required to be an intelligent cross section of American citizens, not chosen by fear or favoritism but subject to a very solemn oath by which they acknowledge the existence of God and swear to hear and weigh evidence without prejudice, without hope of political favor—without fear.

Of such is the grand jury composed; of such individuals is our Federal Grand Jurors' Association composed. Our members are, in all truth, a cross section of average intelligent America. Permit me to quote to you a short excerpt from the preamble to our association constitution as revealing clearly our goals:

"To impress upon all persons that it is the duty of grand jurors to weigh all facts and evidence presented to them; That they must inquire into all facts, whether or not clearly brought out by the prosecution, so as to judge fairly the person brought before the grand jury for indictment; That they should accept their choice as grand jurors as an honor and a patriotic duty."

Those stirring and sincere words, ladies and gentlemen, reveal better than any halting expressions of mine, the heart and soul of this association, the credo which governs our every action, our every effort.

This association—and its component committees—is not an aggregation of busybodies, of do gooders, of pests who plague busy public officials. Rather, like the grand jury itself, it is a group which wishes to learn and then to teach to others those essentials of citizenship and patriotism which today, more than at any other crucial time in the history of our Republic, are so necessary if we are to continue to exist as a free Nation under God.

Raymond A. Young, president of the association, delivered the annual report of the president, from which I quote the following timely remarks:

One thought crosses my mind as I look upon this vast throng; and that thought is how wonderful it is to live in America, with our right to such freedom of assemblage as we have here tonight, without compulsion, without the dictatorship of some bureaucrat forcing us to come here, without fear.

As our counsel has remarked, this association is in a sense the extension, the complement, of the grand jury itself. Our ideals, our goals, our standards are identical with those which every grand juror learns and adopts when he first enters the grand-jury room (in our Federal building)—loyalty to country, devotion to the cause of justice, protection of the innocent, punishment of the guilty.

Out of almost 100 Federal districts in this country, there are only 2 which have associations such as ours. We have been told the value of the grand jury itself; the FBI or other agencies may bring in evidence; a competent district attorney may prepare the case, but it is the grand jury who must hear and weigh the evidence against an accused and bring him to trial.

Since associations such as ours extend the work of the grand jury itself in educating the public, surely there is a crying need throughout our country for many more Federal grand jurors' associations, extending from coast to coast, and carrying out the same purposes as we here in the eastern district strive to do.

We pledge ourselves here tonight to aid any Federal grand jurors' group in the formation of an association so that they, too, may become a strong factor in their own communities. For it is our sincere belief that the grand jury and grand jury associations are a powerful weapon against crime and communism in this country.

The oath of office and the induction of the board of governors and the officers for 1951 were administered very ably and in a most charming manner by Chief Judge Robert A. Inch of the eastern district. Appointed to the United States district court in 1923, Judge Inch is one of the most beloved jurists that has ever graced the Federal bench and in every sense a judge in word and deed.

Inducted as members of the board of governors of the Federal Grand Jurors' Association were: Calvin A. Davis, Howard G. Launsbach, Erik Marcussen, Marshall L. Ong, Cornelius S. Zeuner, Vincent F. Donohue, James J. Gannon, H. D. McKeige, David M. Newman, S. Thomas Pearson, William E. Breul, Jr., Robert W. Drummond, Robert Elliott, Jr., Edward F. Hannigan, and Samuel C. Sander. The association's new officers for 1951 are: Raymond A. Young, president; Walter Davidson, first vice president; George Devoy, second vice president; Charles A. Barkie, third vice president; Byron D. Forster, secretary; Harry J. Smith, treasurer.

A special word of commendation is due to Charles A. Barkie, chairman of the program committee, and to the members of his committee, for a well-planned and most successful evening.

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, who was the principal speaker of the evening, made an excellent impression on the capacity audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. He paid public tribute to District Attorneys Miles F. McDonald, Frank S. Hogan, Frank J. Parker, Irving H. Saypol, and to me as the representative of this district in Congress.

From the Academy of Music we drove to the Midwood High School, where Senator KEFAUVER delivered his second address of the evening, this time discussing the international scene and the Atlantic Union. Our very able colleague, Representative HALE BOGGS of Louisiana, also addressed this gathering and acquitted himself with eloquence and distinction. The meeting at Midwood School was presided over by the well-known County Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, and County Judge Louis Goldstein also spoke.

Brooklyn will long remember the visit of Senator KEFAUVER. He made a great many friends among our citizens and left a lasting impression on Brooklyn. In order to fully complete my account of his visit, I am placing in the RECORD a news item and an editorial on the subject which appeared in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, April 24, 1951:

RACKETEERS RUN 76 LEGAL BUSINESSES, SAYS KEFAUVER—SEES COLOSSAL TAKE FROM UNITED STATES CITIZENS

United States Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, here in Brooklyn last night for a doubleheader speaking engagement, termed colossal the amount of money taken from United States citizens by racketeers with legitimate business connections.

Addressing the annual meeting of the Federal Grand Jurors' Association of New York's eastern district, KEFAUVER declared that the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, headed by him, has compiled a list of 76 legitimate enterprises operated by such figures.

"Everything you wear or eat costs extra," he said, in a situation where racketeers bring with them into business "methods of intimidation and coercion which give them unfair advantage over their competitors."

The Senator told the capacity audience gathered in the Academy of Music that the people of Brooklyn "have much to be thankful for. One of the most outstanding jobs of turning the spotlight on crime and corruption has been done right here in Kings County by your grand jury and District Attorney McDonald."

PRAISE FOR M'DONALD

He said he wanted to pay the people of Brooklyn "the highest compliment" for supporting McDonald during the early days of the rackets probe when the district attorney was under critical fire.

He also paid tribute to Manhattan District Attorney Frank S. Hogan and United States Attorneys Irving Saypol of the southern district and Frank J. Parker of the eastern district. Saypol and Parker were present on the dais.

Senator KEFAUVER said he saw "very positive signs that America is undergoing a moral awakening. I do believe something has been started to give us a cleaner and more decent government."

Hailing the institution of citizens' crime committees, such as the one recently established in New York, KEFAUVER announced that similar organizations have been created in "35 or 40 States during the past few months."

The Senator outlined some of the recommendations his committee will make in an effort to minimize crime on a national scale. He said the group will recommend prohibiting the transmission of gambling information. A tightening of deportation regulations will also be urged in order that the heads of certain gangs can be deported.

The committee will also recommend improved income-tax laws, he asserted, to force racketeers to report the sources of their income and file statements of net worth. A further recommendation will be improvements in the laws covering the sale of alcohol.

He also said the committee will suggest securities and exchange regulations whereby owners and directors of large corporations will be required to make their names a matter of public knowledge.

More than 1,500 persons attended the meeting, which was preceded by a supper at the Brooklyn Club. Presiding at the meeting was Raymond A. Young, president of the association.

Among those on the dais were Federal Judge Edward A. Conger of the southern district, United States Commissioner of Jurors Morris J. Solomon and United States Marshal Eugene J. Smith, both the eastern district, Borough President Cashmore and Representative LOUIS B. HELLER.

OFFICERS INSTALLED

Senior Judge Robert A. Inch of the eastern district installed Young and the other officers for 1951. They were Walter Davidson, first vice presedent; George Devoy, second vice president; Charles A. Barkie, third vice president; Byron D. Forster, secretary, and Harry J. Smith, treasurer.

From the academy, Senator KEFAUVER was driven, with motorcycle escort, to Midwood High School, Bedford Avenue and Glenwood Road, where he addressed almost 1,000 persons attending a meeting of the Brooklyn chapter of the Atlantic Union Committee.

Presiding over the meeting was County Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, who introduced the Senator as a "homefront general."

Senator KEFAUVER said he could see no way of preventing a third world war, a "push-button affair," other than through international cooperation. He warned, however, that the United States would have to give up its "piecemeal system of alliances."

Asserting his belief that the people of the country are in favor of international cooperation, he suggested that if the United States had been more active in world cooperation at the time of the League of Nations it might have helped avert World War II.

"We can't go on fighting aggression by ourselves in a haphazard fashion," the Senator said. "We can't beat aggression if we are fighting the Chinese in Korea while our friends are doing business with them in Hong Kong."

Senator KEFAUVER said "Stalin has a federation of nations on his side which he can call upon when he needs them. This federation, formed by force, would not have the moral strength of a volunteer federation among free nations of the world."

Among those on the dais were County Judge Louis Goldstein, Representative HELLER and Representative HALE BOGGS, of Louisiana.

The Senator made joking comment on the big "KEFAUVER for President" sign which hung from the balcony of the school auditorium with a Confederate flag.

KEFAUVER, HERE, MAKES STRONG CASE FOR FEDERAL UNION IN CURRENT CRISIS

Senator KEFAUVER came to Brooklyn last night for a much different reason from what he had during his last stay in this city. However, there was a similarity between the two visits—each was aimed at a form of crime.

His first visit attacked the criminal element in this Nation and did much to instruct the country as to the extent and seriousness of the danger.

His visit last night was concerned with international crime—the crime of allowing a disunited free world to face the organized menace of the communistic bloc of nations. Senator KEFAUVER spoke in behalf of the Atlantic Union resolution, which he introduced in the Senate some months ago.

He urged once again the passage of this resolution, which calls upon the President to convene the nations which signed the Atlantic Pact to explore the possibility of forming an even greater amalgamation—a federal union.

The Senator asked this Nation to continue the orderly revolution begun by our founding fathers when they created the first and most successful federal union by joining the Original Thirteen States. This is a great and far-reaching goal and worthy of exploration, as we have said in the past.

Only a few days ago, General MacArthur recalled for Congress a passage from his address on the occasion of the surrender of the Japanese:

"Various methods through the ages have been attempted to devise an international process to prevent or settle disputes between nations. From the very start workable methods were found insofar as individual citizens were concerned, but the mechanics of an instrumentality of larger international scope have never been successful. Military alliances, balances of power, leagues of nations, all in turn failed, leaving the only path to be by way of the crucible of war. We have had our last chance. If we will not devise some greater and more equitable system, our Armageddon will be at our door."

This is the prophetic consideration upon which Senator KEFAUVER bases his adherence to the hope for an Atlantic Union. When the world is in such great danger, again it becomes reasonable to state that the Atlantic Union venture is worth exploring. We hope that the Senate will not disband this year without giving the proposal its most serious study.

Trade and Service Unions Protest Freeze on Low-Wage Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an informative statement by Hugo Ernst, general president of the Bartenders and Hotel Employees International Union, recently appearing in the Catering Industry Employee publication:

TRADE AND SERVICE UNIONS PROTEST FREEZE ON LOW-WAGE WORKERS

(At the suggestion of Hugo Ernst, general president, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, a conference of A. F. of L. international unions in the trade and service industries, was convened in Washington, D. C., March 19, 1951, to consider the impact of wage controls on the 15,000,000 workers in trade and service industries and to work out a joint program for the defense of the living standards of these workers. General President Ernst, who served as chairman of the conference, made the following statement as a basis for discussion. The statement was unanimously endorsed by the conference.—EDITOR.)

In proposing this conference of unions in the trade and service industries I did so because I have become increasingly convinced that the millions of workers in our industries are being totally disregarded in the discussions and developments since the beginning of wage stabilization.

There is cumulative evidence for this conclusion. Since the January 25 freeze there have been several modifications of the original freeze order—all designed to meet the needs of unions and employers in the basic industries, none providing relief for the millions of workers in service and trade.

MINE, AUTO RAISES O. K.'D

Thus the first modification, General Regulation 2, extended the freeze date from January 25 to February 9 to legalize the mine workers' wage increase.

Another basic modification, General Regulation 8, relaxed the 10-percent formula under General Regulation 6 to legalize cost-of-living escalator clauses only in those cases where such clauses were already in effect on January 25. Obviously General Regulation 8 was designed to satisfy the CIO auto workers, since, with few exceptions, this was the only large union with contracts containing cost-of-living escalator clauses.

Two subsequent modifications—General Regulations 9 and 10—were also designed to meet certain special needs in basic industry.

NO RELIEF FOR SUBSTANDARDS

Although the United Labor Policy Committee on January 11 raised the basic question of substandard wages with the Economic Stabilization Agency, nothing has been done on this point, except that:

1. General Regulation 3 was issued to legalize adjustments under existing Federal or State minimum-wage legislation. For workers in service and trade, who are outside the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act, this regulation means that all they can hope for to eliminate substandards are existing State minimum laws, which provide such wages as 55 cents an hour for non-tip hotel and restaurant workers in a State like Ohio, or 55 cents for building service workers in a State like Massachusetts. There are many other examples of what General Regulation 3 means in practical effect.

2. General Regulation 6, which holds wage increases down to a maximum of 10 percent above the January 1950 base, obviously perpetuates the low, substandard wages which now exist in the service and trade industries.

I repeat, nothing, absolutely nothing, has been done to get at the problem of substandard wages which exist in our industries. And these low wages will become more and more substandard as living costs rise while the National Wage Stabilization Board gives its attention exclusively to the problems in basic industry.

FIFTEEN MILLION OUT IN COLD

The problem of workers in service and trade is of major importance. First, because of the number of workers in these industries, and, second, because of the grievously low wage levels which now exist.

There are 15,000,000 workers in all branches of service and trade—as many workers as there are in all manufacturing industries combined. These 15,000,000 workers account for one-third of the total employment in all industry outside of agriculture. Most of these 15,000,000 workers are unorganized—which is one of the reasons for the low wages which exist.

WE'RE NOT EXPENDABLES

Whereas manufacturing industry is 80 to 100 percent organized, whereas coal mining, construction, railroads, etc., are almost completely organized—the service trades are only 20 to 39 percent organized. This, perhaps, is one reason why the National Wage Stabilization Board has paid so little attention to our problems. But this is a major reason for the problem of substandard wages—to which the Board must pay attention. Fifteen million workers with their families are a lot of people—their living standards are important. These people are not to be considered expendable in the current mobilization drive.

Contrast the wage levels of workers in other industries with those of workers in service and trade, and you get some idea of the problem of wage substandards:

Average hourly earnings in manufacturing are $1.51 an hour; in coal mining, $2.01 an hour; in railroading, $1.54 an hour; in construction, $2.04 an hour. (Labor Department figures for November 1950.)

But in service and trade—the average for all branches of retail trade combined is $1.20, and in such service industries as hotels, laundries, and cleaning plants only 80 cents, 88 cents, and $1.03 an hour, respectively.

But even these averages are misleading. Whereas under the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act a 75-cent minimum is in effect, in service and trade workers are dependent on State legal minimums as low as 40, 50, and 60 cents an hour, and in some States no legal minimums exist at all.

TEN PERCENT ON 40 CENTS AN HOUR

Of what good is a 10-percent cost-of-living adjustment to a trade or service worker now getting a 40-cent rate? Such an adjustment does not even begin to correct for substandards. Obviously the Wage Board must set some figure as the dividing line between what is, and is not, substandard, perhaps $1 an hour, up to which wage increases should be legal without prior Board approval and without reference to other stabilization formulas.

OUR WAGES LAG FAR BEHIND

No flat percentage adjustment is enough in itself to cope with the wage problem in our industries. Service and trade workers have fallen behind other workers so far as their wage levels and living standards are concerned. For example:

According to Labor Department figures for November 1950, laundry workers averaged $35.82 a week. Expressed in purchasing power of 1939 dollars after adjustment for price inflation, the average laundry worker earned $20.28 a week compared with $17.69 in 1939, a net increase in real earnings of only $2.59 a week in 11 years, without allowing for the effect of taxes.

Manufacturing workers, on the other hand, earned $62.38 a week, or $35.31 in 1939 purchasing power, compared with earnings of $23.86 in 1939. Thus their real earnings have increased $11.45 a week. While real earnings of coal miners even before their last wage increase have risen $17.76 a week.

What is true of the way laundry workers have fallen behind workers in basic industry is true also of hotel workers, and of service and trade workers generally. Their earnings simply have not kept pace with the rise in over-all American productivity, with the result that millions of workers in our industries today are barely able to subsist.

SUBSISTENCE WAGES

At today's costs, the Labor Department estimates that a worker's family of four persons needs $75.50 a week to live on a minimum standard of decency in Washington, D. C.; $70.17 in New York; $67.76 a week in Midwestern Kansas City; $73.23 in San Francisco.

But in November 1950 the average American hotel worker made $34.66 a week; the average laundry worker, $35.82; the average worker in a cleaning and dyeing plant, $42.68; and the average worker in retail trade, $47.84.

This shocking disparity between what workers in trade and service now earn and need to have to live decently, the shocking disparities between wages of workers in our industries and in the rest of the American economy—must be narrowed. Substandards of living must be eliminated. We cannot have a healthy economy able to meet the demands of defense if one-third of all nonagricultural workers live perilously close to, or below, the level of subsistence.

We are faced with other problems, to which the Wage Board has given no attention, beyond freezing us entirely out of the picture. Take the 40-hour-week question, for example.

WE NEED 40-HOUR WEEK

Under normal collective bargaining, service and trade workers in unions like ours have slowly been negotiating contracts providing time and one-half for the sixth day. Most of these workers today still get straight time for the sixth day. Now comes the Wage Board. Its regulations bar us from getting time and one-half for the sixth day—except as an offset against the 10-percent cost-of-living formula under General Regulation 6.

This is a gross inequity, when we consider that most other workers—even on the railroads—now get time and one-half for the sixth day. During the last war Presidential Executive Order 9240 permitted the negotiation of new contracts allowing time and one-half after 40 hours. Today no such provision has been made under wage stabilization.

LOW WAGE WORKERS HURT MOST

Taken as a whole, the wage stabilization program is plainly discriminatory against the 15,000,000 workers in service and trade. It discriminates against the very workers whose wages are lowest, whose living standards are being most hurt by rising living costs.

Pressed between rising living costs and substandard wages in our industries, workers will look actively for employment elsewhere. They will be drawn out of service and trade to plants where higher wages are paid, to the favored industries. Our employers will be unable to compete with these industries in holding their labor. Service and trade employers may want to raise wages and grant other economic inducements to their workers, but the character of the stabilization program is such that they will not be able to pay enough to hold their people. Unable to hold their workers, and to get replacements because of substandard wages, many of our employers face bankruptcy.

In effect the stabilization program discriminates against small business for the benefit of big business monopoly, because service and trade are made up of relatively small employers, and workers will be drawn away from these employers to the corporation giants in basic industry.

BLOW AT SMALL BUSINESS

Is it the purpose of the mobilization program to put small enterprise entirely out of business? Small business is at the basis of the free, competitive enterprise system. Is that system to be destroyed at the direction of the big business monopolists now running the stabilization program to suit themselves?

This is a serious question. That same question is being raised by many small-business men, was in fact raised just recently before the manpower subcommittee of the Senate Small Business Committee. Many small-business men have complained to that committee that present policies are forcing them to the wall by driving their key personnel to big business with its higher wage rates and defense contracts.

$1 MINIMUM DEMANDED

Obviously one answer is to end the discrimination against the trade and service industries by allowing them more freedom in raising wages. A high enough minimum—$1 or more—to eliminate substandards would help hold workers in these industries.

I don't know what all the answers are, but I do think that we in the service and trade unions need to think about these problems. I submit no one is going to bother about our needs, our problems, unless we make ourselves heard. And as a basis for further discussion this morning, I therefore make the following recommendations:

PROGRAM FOR JOINT ACTION

1. That the service and trade unions represented here today appoint a special committee to present our special problems to the National Wage Stabilization Board;

2. That the United Labor Policy Committee be requested to accept on that committee two representatives of the service and trade unions to participate in all policy discussions with the National Wage Stabilization Board, the Economic Stabilization Agency, and the Office of Defense Mobilization;

3. That the National Wage Stabilization Board be requested to create within the Board, on both the national and regional levels, a special tripartite Trade and Service Stabilization Commission to provide proper consideration for workers in our industries;

4. That, on the initiative of the internationals here represented, regional and area interunion conferences of local unions in trade and service be called to discuss ways and means of protecting the rights and living standards of workers in our industries before the regional wage stabilization boards. We must not forget that policy questions decided on the national level must be applied on the local level, in the cities and regions, and it is here that flexibility in the wage program on a case-by-case basis can be secured if our local unions are coordinated through appropriate machinery to get that flexibility out of the regional wage boards.

New Price Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post, April 27, on the new price order:

NEW PRICE ORDER

The manufacturers' general ceiling price regulation is designed to correct the inequities of the January 26 price freeze. It applies to about 75,000 manufacturing concerns, some of which have raised their prices excessively—that is, increased them to an extent not justified by the post-Korean rise in labor and materials costs. Their ceiling prices will have to be lowered. On the other hand, in cases where prices have lagged behind post-Korean cost increases and the freeze order has prevented profitable operations, ceiling prices will be raised. The ceiling price in each case is the highest base-period price of a commodity (the base period being April 1 through June 24 or any one of the three preceding quarters), with adjustments for subsequent increases in the cost of labor and materials.

Wholesalers and retailers will also be required to reflect changes in manufacturers' prices. Similar regulations covering manufacturers' prices, applicable to various industries having special problems, will soon be issued and calculations required under the present order will be repeated in the near future to allow for the impact on costs of the regulation itself and other OPS regulations. For it is not practicable, as the price-control officials explain, for each producer to postpone calculations until other ceiling prices down the line have been determined.

Price control is a slow process, necessitating extensive preliminary study and involving a mass of paper work for the concerns affected. But so far as a layman can judge, the OPS is going about its herculean task in a systematic way and doing its best to correct the unavoidable inequities of the price freeze. The result will not be spectacular, although Price Stabilizer DiSalle thinks the new regulation will result in a reduction or roll-back in the general level of manufacturers' prices. At any rate, it will curb profiteering price increases, and pave the way for eventual replacement of general ceiling price regulations by specific dollars and cents price ceilings, thus making the task of enforcement much easier.

A Time for Reflection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BYRON G. ROGERS
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Rocky Mountain News of April 25, 1951:

A TIME FOR REFLECTION

It would be well if there could be at least a 48-hour moratorium on public statements incident to the MacArthur controversy—a period that could be devoted to serious study and reflection by everyone concerned.

This country is at war, and let's not forget it.

This is grave and awful business.

The present is not a time for hysteria, smear campaigns, or personal recrimination.

General MacArthur has stated his case, and he did it with dignity and restraint, abusing no one.

The questions he raised are not issues in a political campaign but matters of vital concern to the American people. They should be regarded in that light—and not as an attack on the Democrats or as political ammunition for the Republicans.

President Truman has been temperate in what he has had to say on the subject, and his side of the controversy deserves thoughtful consideration.

The overriding question with which we are concerned is Communist aggression—and whether the measures we have adopted are adequate to meet the challenge.

This demands a searching examination of the American position in all parts of the world, by the appropriate committees of Congress.

One of the MacArthur critics says the general will be asked why he believes Russia would not move elsewhere—say in Iran or Europe—if the Korean war were expanded by bombing the Red supply bases in Manchuria.

What could be more ridiculous than to pose such a question, that only the Kremlin can answer?

Gen. Lucius D. Clay, who knows the Russians better than most people, believes Russia will go to war "only in accord with the program which has been developed by its leaders, and even then only if conditions are propitious."

It also is his opinion that our present superiority in atomic weapons may suffice to prevent war with Russia for the time being.

That is an informed guess, based on sound military considerations. But mere guessing isn't going to help us.

The immediate problem is how best to get out of the war in Korea in which we are presently involved, and then how to prepare against the larger war which threatens.

Quickening events on the Korean front may decide the issue there. Bullets speak louder than words, and bullets may determine whether the advocates of limited war were right or wrong.

Meanwhile there must be no lag in the preparations to meet a bigger war.

Those who say we will be ready to meet a Soviet attack by 1953 offer small comfort in face of the possibility that it may come sooner than that.

Instead of talking in terms of 1953, or even 1952, we should be asking ourselves how much more can we do right now, and during the remainder of 1951.

General MacArthur knows war as few Americans do. His views can be of great service to his country in this emergency, if the Democrats and Republicans will forget their differences long enough to hear him out.

Our other military leaders also should be heard, particularly those who know Asia and the Pacific area.

But the emphasis throughout should be on the immediate situation and the war which may come—not on past mistakes which cannot be recalled.

Asia has been the neglected front, to be sure. But what can be done now to make the best of a bad situation?

What areas can be saved that are vital to American security, either because of their geographic position or their natural resources? What manpower is available to support an anti-Communist position? Would our resources be spread too thin by attempting to defend both oceans?

These are among the questions to be examined, in the search for a balanced, adequate defense program. What has been done belongs to history.

Houston American Legion Post Supports MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the following resolution was adopted at a special meeting of Houston Post, No. 52, American Legion, supporting the position of General MacArthur on far-eastern military policy and calling for an investigation of the State Department and the removal of Secretary Acheson:

"Be it remembered that pursuant to the request of the commander, Department of Texas, that each Legion post determine its opinion on the following questions, to establish a policy of the Department of Texas on foreign affairs, Houston Post, No. 52, at a special meeting of 300 of its members, on Thursday, April 19, 1951, at 8 p. m., did answer as follows:

"(a) Should the United States continue the delaying war confined to Korea only? Answer: No.

"(b) Should we blockade the China coast with our Navy? Answer: Yes.

"(c) Should we furnish equipment to Chiang Kai-shek for an invasion on the mainland of China? Answer: Yes.

"(d) Should we bomb the Manchurian bases? Answer: Yes.

"(e) Do we believe in the foreign policy as outlined by General MacArthur or do we believe in the foreign policy as outlined by the President in his radio broadcast, April 11? Answer: MacArthur; and further

"Whereas the State commander additionally points out that an undeniable crisis, perhaps the most ominous in the history of the United States does exist; and

"Whereas this crisis has been occasioned by the continued muddling in the field of foreign affairs by President Truman and Secretary Dean Acheson, culminating in the firing of General of the Armies MacArthur; and

"Whereas General MacArthur has proved in the highest possible measure a full and complete knowledge of Asiatic problems as evidenced by the success of his military and civil administration of Japan and other assignments handed him involving the Far East, in contrast to the innumerable mistakes in the European theater: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by this post that in addition to the above answers to questions submitted by the department commander, That it is the sense of this post that the Department of Texas should reaffirm the resolution passed by the national convention of 1950 calling for an investigation of the activities of the State Department and of the Secretary of State and calling for the removal of Dean Acheson from that office. And further, in recognition of the fact that food and certain materials of war which we believe are being utilized to the detriment of our efforts in Korea, are reaching the Chinese Communists via several foreign nations which are receiving the same from us through various agencies of our Government that the recommended blockade of the China coast include all ports of entry irrespective of nationality or interests; and be it further

"Resolved in expansion of question 4 submitted by the department commander, That General MacArthur's recommendation No. 4 involving logistical support to Nationalist China's efforts should be complied with strictly; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the department commander in compliance with his instructions as contained in his directive and that a copy be sent to each of our Senators in Washington, to the Congressman from the Eighth Congressional District of Texas, and to General of the Armies Douglas MacArthur."

The foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by unanimous vote at special meeting of American Legion Post, No. 52, Department of Texas, on Thursday, April 19, 1951.

JOHN L. COMPTON,
Post Commander.

Communist Rule in Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to protest Communist rule in Poland

Whereas the people of Poland are being deprived of religious and political freedom and are being subjected to indirect coercive methods of government and are the victims of Communist subjugation by an outside power, namely, Soviet Russia; and

Whereas these people in the vast majority are thoroughly imbued with democratic ideals and are opposed to totalitarianism: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts urges the Congress of the United States to protest the present communistic rule in Poland and the subjugation of the Polish people by an outside power, namely, Soviet Russia; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted April 5, 1951.

LAWRENCE R. GROVE,
Clerk.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, April 10, 1951.

IRVING N. HAYDEN,
Clerk.

Attest:

EDWARD J. CRONIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Future of Slovakia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a memorandum to the President and the Congress of the United States prepared and accepted by the executive committee of the Slovak League of America on April 25, 1951:

MEMORANDUM TO THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

As Americans of Slovak descent, we are naturally interested in, and vitally concerned about the future of Slovakia, the land which our forefathers and the succeeding generations of Slovaks have inhabited for the past 1,500 years.

The recognition of the inherent and God-given right of the Slovak nation to freedom and independence cannot concern us less than the recognition by the United States of this same right granted other nations of the civilized world.

The United States, we have been told over and over again, has never opposed the aspirations of any people in Europe to determine by their own free choice the state of form of political organization under which they wished to live. On the contrary, we have been repeatedly advised by responsible people in Government that self-determination has been a fundamental principle of President Woodrow Wilson, and that our Government has not departed from that policy even in the case of the Slovaks.

But the fact is that the principle of self-determination for all practical purposes, never did apply to the Slovak nation, and its inherent right to freedom and independence was not and still is not recognized or respected by the United States Government.

The Slovak League of America, the civic and cultural institution of Americans of Slovak descent and outspoken champion of the rights and liberties of the Slovak Nation, again strongly urges the Government of the United States to recognize and respect the right of the Slovak Nation to freedom and independence and to offer such moral, political, and material support to patriotic representatives of the Slovak people in exile, namely to the Slovak National Council Abroad, as is offered to other representative nationality groups of the nations behind the iron curtain.

The Slovak Nation is not a young or a new nation. It is in fact one of the oldest nations of central Europe, and it is a Christian nation.

As Americans, we firmly believe in the principle of the inalienable right of all men and all nations without exception to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If that is the belief of the people representing the United States Government at this time, they must manifest it clearly and concretely without fear of equivocation in all departments and agencies of Government. The United States must make it unmistakably clear that it does not and shall not recognize and favor any representatives of the Czech or Slovak nations who do not recognize and respect the inherent right of the Slovak people to freedom and independence.

The Slovak Nation, forced behind the iron curtain by Dr. Edward Benes and the victorious United Nations, and its representatives in exile are not willing to toil and sweat, to suffer and die to regain positions for bankrupt, professional politicians, even though they are favored by the United States Government and the governments of other democratic countries. But they are most willing to suffer and sacrifice their lives for the ideals of real democracy and freedom.

The Slovak people at home and in exile are anxiously waiting to hear the Government of the United States tell them clearly and unequivocally whether America intends to recognize and respect their right to freedom and independence.

For the past 10 centuries the Slovak people were dominated by nations and political systems that tended to destroy the foundations of their national structure, nay their very national existence. The Slovaks have been and still are persecuted and exploited by aliens who are hostile to their national and religious traditions. Today they are enslaved by the proponents of the ruinous ideology of godless communism which they had consistently rejected and resisted openly for over a hundred years. The Slovaks find themselves in this terrible predicament through no fault of their own. They had no choice in the matter. The irony of all this predicament still seems to be favored by the United States Government and other democratic governments.

The Slovak Nation has had its fill of the political system represented by Czechoslovakia and, presently, by the Czech National Socialists, other Czech groups, and the so-called Czechoslovaks in exile. The Slovak nation has had enough of Zenkl and Papánek, Ripka, and Lettrich and their ilk, who reminds it so much of Gottwald and his followers.

We state most emphatically that we consider it immoral and undemocratic to give moral, political, and material help to people who have in the past denied the right of self-determination to the Slovak nation and who, even today, proclaim that the Slovaks have no right to freedom and independence. They are the so-styled Czechoslovaks, the pseudo-democrats, who have used and abused—and are still using and abusing—American democracy for their own interests and are compromising the good name of the United States.

We strongly urge the resolution of the Czechoslovak question for once and for all time. American interests and the interests of the democratic world at large are ill-served by supporting bankrupt Czech politicians and former Red collaborators who propagate the fiction of a united Czechoslovak Nation. The Government of the United States and all other democratic governments of the world must recognize the fact that has been so apparent to both the Slovak and the Czech peoples for quite some time—the Czechs are not and do not want to be Slovaks, and the Slovaks are not and do not want to be Czechs.

If it is the policy of our Government to refuse to recognize the Slovak Nation and its patriotic representatives in exile; if our State Department is determined to continue a policy which threatens the very existence of the Slovak Nation; if the persons in the United States Government are determined to force the Slovaks under the rule of the Czechs, then we believe the Government of the United States should in justice inform the American public accordingly.

As Americans, united in the Slovak League of America, we plead for the recognition of the fundamental rights of the people we are descended from. Those rights are predicated in the elementary principle that all peoples, wherever they may be found and however few their numbers, are morally entitled to speak in the council of nations, there to defend their rights to survival and self-fulfillment. The right of self-determination cannot be exercised vicariously; liberty is not exercised by proxy. In the peaceful and orderly reconstruction of the world, all peoples must have a voice in the determination of their futures, their destinies. The Slovak Nation must not be excepted. A just and lasting peace can become a reality only if the fundamentals of democracy, the principles of right and justice, are applied to all nations and denied to none.

The Slovak League of America, representing an overwhelming majority of organized Americans of Slovak descent, earnestly appeals to the President and the Congress of the United States of America not to fail the Slovak Nation in this hour of peril and persecution. The recognition of the inherent and God-given right of the Slovak Nation to freedom and independence will give aid and comfort and hope to the oppressed millions behind the iron curtain in Slovakia and added initiative to thousands of her patriotic sons in exile. The recognition would also serve the best interests of America and the rest of the democratic world. The Slovaks have fought against the plague of communism for over a hundred years and today are determined to resist and fight it more than ever before.

The Slovaks, however, need encouragement in this their darkest hour from the United States and the other democracies. They are in the fight against communism primarily because they still firmly believe that godless communism is the greatest evil humanity has ever been exposed to, but the Slovaks are also vitally interested in their own freedom and independence.

To tell the people of Slovakia that they must resist communism in the name of Czechoslovak democracy, or in the name of the Czechoslovak Republic, or in the name of Dr. Edward Benes—such propaganda is all wrong. Nay, it is immoral and undemocratic. Such propaganda only tends to drive the Slovaks into despair and, therefore, into the arms of Stalin, whose agents are ever on the alert to use such propaganda to their own advantage against the United States and the other democracies by telling the Slovaks that western democracies are not interested in Slovak freedom and independence. It is no secret that Moscow is ever ready to have her agents in Slovakia proclaim the independence of Slovakia and incorporate her into the U. S. S. R.

The Slovak League of America strongly urges the United States Government not to abandon the principle of nationality—the ethnic principle—in the case of the Slovak Nation. We sincerely believe it is a more effective weapon against communism and all totalitarian systems than the A-bomb. The United States and the other western democracies must not fail the Slovak Nation in its darkest hour.

As Reason Replaces Emotionalism Opposition To Starting Big War Grows

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an excerpt from Frank Edwards' broadcast of April 30, 1951, over Mutual Broadcasting System, which follows:

About 2 weeks ago I asked you folks a question: Should we invade the Chinese mainland? Some irate listeners wrote to tell me that no one was even thinking about such a thing—a statement which has been disproved by subsequent events. One general and several Senators have all advocated the use of American fliers and sailors as our contribution to taking part in an invasion of China by Nationalist troops. Senator CAIN, Washington Republican, presented a resolution asking Congress to declare war on China.

My listeners sent in more than 96,000 replies to the question: Should we invade the Chinese mainland?

The first 16,000 ran about 5 to 1 against invasion. By the time we had reached the 60,000 mark the score was running 7½ to 1 against invasion of the Chinese mainland.

And we noticed this very interesting aspect of the poll: After Senator CAIN's pronouncement asking for war with China—the cards postmarked after that date ran heavily in opposition to CAIN's proposal—the final 30,000 cards ran 30 to 1 against invading China.

The count showed that the tide of opinion among my listeners gained momentum as time went on. As reason began to replace emotionalism, perhaps we might say, the flood of cards showed an increasingly heavy opposition to starting a big war to get out of a little one.

To all those who so kindly took time and trouble to cast their votes by postal on this very important issue, my sincere thanks. It is a rare privilege in our times to be able to express your opinions with complete freedom and without fear. Most of the people of the world do not have that privilege—others who have had it have lost it because they never used it. Freedom is strongest and healthiest when it is kept in action.

Proposed Legislation Relative to Persons and Corporations Doing Business With Communist Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Resolutions memorializing the Congress of the United States to publish the names of all persons, firms, and corporations who are doing business with Communist countries and to bar them from doing business with the United States Government or with any agency thereof

Whereas the Government of the United States is in the process of preparing itself against aggression by Communist countries; and

Whereas there are certain persons, firms, and corporations which continue to do business with such Communist countries and to provide them with essential materials of war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby urges the Congress of the United States to take such actions as may be necesary to publish the names of all persons, firms, and corporations which are doing business with Communist countries and to enact legislation barring such persons, firms, and corporations from doing business with or entering into contracts with the United States Government or with any agency thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth send forthwith copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted April 5, 1951.

LAWRENCE R. GROVE,
Clerk.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, April 10, 1951.

IRVING N. HAYDEN,
Clerk.

Attest:

EDWARD J. CRONIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Ten Honest Politicians—Liberty Awards, Eighty-second Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, recently 10 Members of Congress were honored by awards from Liberty magazine. It gives me real pleasure to include the tributes paid to these outstanding citizens and legislators in Liberty:

TEN HONEST POLITICIANS—LIBERTY AWARDS, EIGHTY-SECOND CONGRESS

Today Congress legislates more, spends more, and has greater influence on the fate of people the world over than any similar body in history. How worthy are the 531 Representatives and Senators who have so much power?

Liberty spotlights 10 outstanding, honest politicians in the Eighty-second Congress. There are others who merit inclusion, but these 10 are leading examples. They are not just politicians who keep out of trouble and in office; they are dynamic and outspoken. They are not the hacks who have made the words phony and politician interchangeable.

These lawmakers were picked because Liberty believes they all sincerely try to serve the people—though they represent varied, conflicting viewpoints. The 10 deserve respect because they have risked their political necks for principles, and have been able enough politicians to win elections without selling their souls. They are in the tradition of Teddy Roosevelt, Al Smith, FDR, and LaGuardia. Some are straight party men, some are independents, but be they regulars or mavericks no boss casts their vote and the only strings are to their conscience.

Here are sound reasons why these meet the test—and why some others failed to qualify:

They refuse to be errand boys for pressure groups or front for special interests.

By investigation and study they know issues and know why they vote the way they do. By becoming experts in special fields they provide leadership for the rest of Congress.

They are not fanatics nor are they troubadours for funny money, pie-in-the-sky, panaceas and give-away programs. Serious and sane, they put in twice as many hours as most of their constituents.

You never find them wrapped in a sanctimonious cloud while hatchet men run around doing dirty political chores for them. Their left hand knows what their right hand does, and both hands are clean. They don't "yes" the little people privately and vote against them on the floor.

They never use congressional immunity to say anything they wouldn't repeat to your face.

They are not glamour politicians wracked by lust for publicity. Surrounded by prima donnas they are team workers, ready to act even if a colleague gets the credit.

They would rather be right than President—and it is entirely possible that some of them may be both. All are good material.

Senator HERBERT LEHMAN, of New York, has won more political successes than any living American. After a brilliant record as governor, he refused to regard the Senate as retirement. Serving a 1-year term in 1949, LEHMAN became a "young Turk," rallied less energetic Democrats to the Fair Deal, and helped put over the DP bill. When a crude measure to control subversives (McCarran Act) was introduced shortly before election LEHMAN waged a hard, lonely fight. The majority, convinced it was suicidal to object, shamefacedly passed it. Last fall LEHMAN diligently explained to the voters that the real issue was the bill of rights. He ran a million votes ahead of his party. "When you take a risky stand to defend a principle," he says, "you may lose votes temporarily but you establish a reputation for independence. If you're building a political career, it's reputation and the general impression that count most."

Representative HUGH MITCHELL has, at 43, an elder statesman's distinction of having been Democratic Senator from Washington and now serving the House. Had he not championed necessary but unpopular price controls in 1946, he could have saved his Senate seat. Today the voters say they are tired of big real estate and banking influences and would like MITCHELL back in the Senate. Either MITCHELL or his colleague, HENRY JACKSON, will run in 1952.

First to propose a Columbia Valley Authority (similar to TVA), a champion of middle income housing, MITCHELL is respected as a leader with a long view. He will win his finest laurels in the international field if he can put through his plan for a Pacific Marshall plan. "Democracy must become a shattering force in raising the hopes of millions in Asia," he declares. A Mitchell plan might avert a war by removing the cause. He intends to fight for it.

Senator WAYNE MORSE, Republican, of Oregon, in his sweeping campaign for reelection last fall, closed each speech with these words: "I don't want anybody to vote for me who doesn't want me back to Congress a free man—absolutely free to exercise my judgment on the merits of an issue in accordance with the facts as I find them. Also, I don't want a single isolationist vote; isolationism offers you a war you can't win."

A skilled tactician, MORSE piloted the world court measure through the Senate, generaled the fight against Taft-Hartley, and now keeps a sharp eye on power-greedy brass hats.

MORSE believes his party has a genius for snatching defeat from the jaws of victory. In 1947 he warned Republican bosses that if they neglected public demands, they would wake up the morning after the 1948 election to find the Democrats in. Which is exactly what happened.

Representative CLIFFORD P. CASE, of New Jersey, though warned by old-timers to let sleeping dogs lie, insisted on making his maiden congressional speech a challenge to JOHN RANKIN's anti-Negro anti-Jewish tirades. A Republican, CASE firmly believes "people will never join our party in the South until we Republicans offer an alternative." CASE works "for a party that keeps its doors open to all groups; we must avoid being a class party."

Labor is enthusiastic over his stanch fight against antiunion curbs. His conservative Republican constituents, a little breathless keeping up, respect and reelect him solidly. Weekly he discusses issues with them, currently emphasizing practical steps for international cooperation. Should his party ever switch to CASE's brand of Republicanism it might win some astonishing victories and CASE would rise as a national personality.

Senator JAMES DUFF, of Pennsylvania, explains why his political obituary keeps reappearing: "Because I play table stakes." He'll gamble everything rather than trim or compromise. This independence dates to his service as a Bull Moose elector for Teddy Roosevelt. His first act as Pennsylvania's Governor was to throw the manufacturer's association "fix" man out of his office, and set up a vast water project "cleansing the filthy cesspools so that now you can see a silver dollar 5 feet down." Trying to purify the Republican Party, DUFF was crushed when the Grundy machine steamrollered Dewey's nomination in '48. He took the issue of Grundyism to the people and humiliated the bosses. He feels his party can talk Presidential candidates only "after developing a sound political philosophy." DUFF, who fights TAFT's isolationism and regards Dewey as a "lip-service liberal," might be the man.

Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, looks back to 1921 "when I introduced a law in the State legislature making it an offense to wear disguises for the purpose of terrifying anybody." He thinks this blow against the KKK the proudest risk of a career packed with battles against predatory bullies.

As co-author of the Robinson-Patman Act his name is a milestone in antitrust law. Last year he led an aggressive fight against "basing points," a device by big steel companies to raise steel prices by charging customers for nonexistent freight.

Few Congressmen are equipped to deal with the lawyer lobbyists of corporations and cartels. The public must rely on wise WRIGHT PATMAN to protect it, and keep small business and free competition alive. Had he made a deal with the oil companies the political escalator was waiting for him—but PATMAN would rather be right.

Representative HENRY JACKSON, 38-year-old Democrat, of Washington, has spent 10 impatient years in Congress struggling for more electric power, more production, more industrial development, more things for more people at less cost.

As a congressional watchdog on atomic energy he stoutly defended civilian director Lilienthal against efforts to smear his efficient administration. JACKSON angrily labeled Senator HICKENLOOPER's bumbling charges "a carnival of confusion" and insisted this vital project be free of political and military interference.

A keen constitutional lawyer, JACKSON fights Communists without destroying individual liberties. A great champion of labor, he wants resources exploited, not people. In Washington State they would like him as governor, or to send him to the Senate if his colleague HUGH MITCHELL isn't the candidate. Wherever he serves, he'll be doing a job for the people.

Senator RICHARD RUSSELL, of Georgia, is the voice of the South. Called an unreconstructed Georgian by liberals he likes to point to free lunches for United States school children and the farm security program as proof that he has political know-how while others talk.

He was the southern bloc's choice against Truman in 1948. The Dixiecrats bolted to hold a separate convention, but RUSSELL refused their nomination, preferring to remain a regular Democrat, thereby saving his party from collapse. He may be compared to Henry Clay.

A popular orator he refuses "to play Dixie on the heartstrings." In 1936 he trounced

Gene Talmadge in an acrid campaign and today at 53 he is the Senate's master parliamentarian, an adroit and powerful lawmaker. While RUSSELL gallantly shields old traditions he also champions profound measures which hasten the day when Southern attitudes will be extinct.

Representative JACK JAVITS, Republican, of New York, keeps winning in Tammany's bailiwick. He thinks his party could win everywhere if it adopted his zealous strategy of "the feasible alternative. Not just opposition but come up with some positive answers." He is one of the few Congressmen who has not wavered on civil liberties at home and who opposes alliances with Fascists abroad. While working to speed wheat to India he said "fighting communism must involve economic and spiritual forces as well as military."

JAVITS feels he makes his real impact speaking. On countless TV, radio programs and forums he explains issues and answers questions. Appearing outside his district he often sparks a community to make demands which help put something through Congress that no amount of debate or politicking could do. He says "the public really holds the whip."

Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH, of Maine, but for her enemies, would merely be known as the first woman to enter the Senate strictly on her own merit. Last year she issued a "declaration of conscience"—a clarion call for Congress to make a stand for decency. Leveling fire on Senator MCCARTHY, she denounced efforts to turn Congress into a forum of hate. Those who hoped to ride to a Republican victory through the selfish political exploitation of fear, bigotry, ignorance and intolerance winced under her seething indictment. The MCCARTHY bloc is now sharpening knives for vengeance against Mrs. SMITH.

With her New England conscience the Senator combines a sincere human approach which has given Maine an effective Washington advocate. She likes to have major issues thoroughly discussed at home before voting on them. In Maine, frankness is a political asset.

Banks' 1950 Profits Are Greatest Ever

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article which appeared in the Washington Post of Monday, April 30, 1951:

BANKS' 1950 PROFITS ARE GREATEST EVER

Bank profits in 1950 were the greatest in history, Maple T. Harl, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), said yesterday.

Reports from the 13,446 FDIC-insured commercial banks showed net profits after taxes amounted to $937,000,000, a 13-percent gain over 1949, he said, adding:

"Stockholders of the banks shared directly in this prosperity, with record dividends of $391,000,000, or 42 percent of net profits after taxes."

The profits after taxes, Harl said, represented "an average of 27.72 percent on basic common capital and 8.51 percent on total capital accounts, the highest rate of profits since 1946."

The FDIC Chairman described dividend payments to common stockholders as equivalent to "a direct return of 11.45 percent on this stock, the highest dividend payment in the history of the Corporation (FDIC)."

"On May 12," Harl said, "we will cross the threshold of the eighth year in which there has been no receivership of an insured bank, nor a penny's loss to any depositor in an insured bank. This represents an all-time record for depositors' safety in this Nation."

He declared that loans—which the Government has lately been trying to stem for anti-inflation purposes—reached at the end of 1950 the highest point ever up to that time.

The loan rise accounted for most of the gain in bank earnings—gross current operating earnings were an unprecedented $3,931,000,000—as the average rate of return on loans advanced slightly to 4.34 percent.

Total income from loans rose 14 percent over 1949 to a $2,008,000,000 total, while interest on United States Government securities was practically unchanged at $1,015,000,000.

Address of Justice William O. Douglas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAT SUTTON
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, recently, Mr. Justice William O. Douglas, a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, very graciously accepted an invitation to address the general assembly, in joint session, of the State of Tennessee. Under permission heretofore granted, I insert Justice Douglas' remarks in the RECORD. His observations are very interesting and most enlightening indeed. I am sure that the Members of Congress and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will greatly enjoy the expressions of our eminent jurist:

ADDRESS OF MR. JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS BEFORE THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, NASHVILLE, TENN., FEBRUARY 22, 1951

TENNESSEE ACROSS THE WORLD

The invitation to address the Tennessee Legislature is an honor I will always cherish. The distinction has special value to me because of the ties I have to this Commonwealth. They are not ties of birth or residence. They are in part ties of friendship with members of this body, with Tennesssee lawyers, with Tennessee fishermen and hunters, and with a long and illustrious line of Senators and Representatives to the Congress. The list is too long to mention; but you will appreciate the quality of these friends and their enduring nature when I say that the Dean of them all is Cordell Hull, of Carthage.

By reason of her distinguished sons, Tennessee had a hold on me long before I ever walked her ridges or explored her lakes. Tennessee so far has given the Nation three Presidents—Andrew Jackson, James Polk, and Andrew Johnson. These were special heroes of mine. Andrew Jackson and Andrew Johnson were men of tough fiber who believed in democracy and would fight its opponents to the death. Polk too had a special claim to my affections. It was Polk who saved the Pacific Northwest (and the special part of the old Oregon Territory which is my home) for the United States.

In later years I came to identify Tennessee with distinguished lawyers and jurists. I knew Grafton Green, the late Chief Justice, and was privileged to call him a friend. Five Tennessee lawyers have served on the Supreme Court of the United States: John Catron (1837-65), Howell E. Jackson (1893-95), Horace T. Lurton (1909-14), Edward T. Sanford (1923-30), James C. McReynolds (1914-41).

Each of these men, true to the character of his State, was a strong individualist with values to which he was as devoted as Andrew Jackson was to his. These men helped give the Court the quality of independence which has distinguished its long history.

Recorded history could produce many more examples that are illustrative of the strength which Tennessee has given the Nation. During the journeys I made the last two summers into the villages of Asia I learned what hope Tennessee has given the world.

It may come as a surprise even to Tennesseans to learn that the word "Tennessee" is well known all the way across from the Mediterranean to the Pacific. To millions of people in that area the word is, indeed, the symbol of a new order, a new way of life—security and independence for themselves and their children.

They know about Tennessee because they have heard of the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is the Tennessee Valley Authority that fits their needs and will solve many of their basic problems. The TVA can also be utilized as one of the major influence to turn back the tide of communism which today threatens to engulf Asia.

The country I speak of is the vast underbelly of Russia that extends from Lebanon and Syria on the west through India on the east. Its geography tells in part the interest of the people of the region in the TVA. The Lebanon Mountains rise from the Mediterranean and form a high barricade where moisture collects. This range once covered with juniper, pine, and the famous cedars of Lebanon is now mostly bare. The Lebanon Mountains extend south and become geologically the Mountains of Judea where Jerusalem sits. Judea too has long been shorn of trees.

East of the Lebanon Mountains some 20 miles is the Anti-Lebanon range guarded over by Mount Hermon of Biblical fame. This range is also mostly deforested. The Anti-Lebanon runs south to form the Mountains of Moab, where Moses is buried. Moab like Judea has been scrubbed clean of trees. In between Moab and Judea runs the Jordan.

East of the Anti-Lebanon is Damascus, an oasis that sits on the edge of a vast desertic steppe running 461 miles to Baghdad, Iraq. It is an empty domain where anyone but a Bedouin would get lost and die of thirst.

Baghdad sits in between the Tigris and Euphrates and not far north of their confluence. It is the center of the ancient Mesopotamia. Beyond it to the east 200 miles are the Zagros Mountains which form the western border of Persia. These are high mountains, rising 15,000 feet. On their east are high plateaus and basins broken by minor ridges that run to Afghanistan and Pakistan and finally to India.

All of this vast domain is practically treeless. In ancient days the interior was rich in oak and juniper. Now one can ride horseback for days on end and see no trees except date orchards in Iraq or peaches and apricots in Persia or such poplars as may have been planted in a village. The region is treeless because of the goat. But for the goat new forests would have grown when the old ones were cut for lumber and charcoal. The goat, however, ate the seedlings. Unrestricted grazing and uncontrolled cutting of trees produced erosion the like of which Americans have never seen. The trees are all gone; the grass is going; hundreds of thousands of acres have been despoiled.

The result is that rains and snow water run off in torrents, washing top soil away. Some parts of this inland empire get only 20 inches of rain a year; and it is mostly wasted. Other sections, such as portions of India, are heavy with rain; but it too comes and goes in a roar. There may be 40 to 60 inches a year; and yet no water is left for the growing season.

To the people of this area TVA means the harnessing of floods, the storing of rain water and the installation of modern irrigation systems. Everywhere I went people asked, "Why can't we have a TVA?"

A Druse chieftain south of Damascus inquired about it. I was asked about it many times as I traveled the length of the Tigris and Euphrates. Below Baghdad I saw 50,000 people homeless by reason of a flood. They, too, had heard of the TVA and wanted one for themselves.

In Persia I traveled the length of the Zagros Range—from the Russian border in the north to the Persian Gulf on the south. In practically every valley I heard the same plea, "We need a TVA."

In New Delhi, Nehru, Prasad, and other high officials of India spoke enthusiastically about their many projects of reform. Yet their eyes lighted up the most when they mentioned India's four new TVA's that come into operation in 1951 and the great TVA on the Kosi River (still in blueprint) that will overshadow anything we in America have ever known.

Yes, the Tennessee Valley Authority has caught the imagination of all the people across this broad belt of Asia. They think of it as a device for insuring crops in a land where crop failures mean death from starvation. TVA also means to them increased productivity of the land, new forests, the end of erosion, modern methods of farming.

TVA means more than this. The Middle East and southeast Asia are areas which have long been exploited. Huge profits have been taken out of the region; few profits have ever been left for the social and economic development of these countries. Some foreign power has for centuries bled those nations white. The TVA is a community project whereby the benefits accrue to all the people, not to a few promoters. Some call this socialism. But the people of Asia are not bothered by labels. It is the result that counts; and one thing they like about TVA is that it is a device which avoids exploitation of the many by the few.

The TVA is even more than that. It represents an idea that at this juncture of history can be utilized on behalf of civilization against the threat of totalitarian communism.

If we are bold enough to make this device an instrument of our Asiatic foreign policy, we can take the political initiative away from Soviet Russia, turn the tide, and win country after country for the democratic cause. The reason the TVA can have that profound and revolutionary effect is due to the character of the problem that confronts Asia.

We in America are apt to think of Asia in terms of teeming millions who live in squalor and who are doomed to stay there. Poverty, lack of medical care, and illiteracy are, indeed, the first to meet the eye of the newcomer to that area. But the future of Asia is bright if we will only study its potential. And the alliance of Asia to the democratic front can be steadfast, if we heed the warnings and sponsor liberal political groups rather than reactionary ones.

The rock bottom of Asia's problem is landlordism. By and large the governments of Asia are of the landlords, by the landlords, and for the landlords. India under Nehru is an exception, for Nehru is splitting up the huge estates and distributing the land on an installment basis to the peasants. Persia under Razmara can easily be another exception. The recent announcement by the Shah of Persia of the sale of the Royal lands to the peasants points the way.

In this part of the world the land for centuries has been owned by a few. The rent is usually on shares. It runs as high as 80 percent of the crop. The tenant is customarily in debt to the landlord on loans paying interest of 20, 40, and even 100 percent. So his actual share of the crop is often much less than 20 percent. He is bound to the landlord throughout all time. His grandsons will be serfs just as he is and just as his great-grandfather was.

A few men may own a whole nation. It is not uncommon to find one man owning 100, 200, 600 villages. The profits are exported abroad or at least not reinvested in the villages; the life of the villages goes on as it did centuries ago; men and women live in squalor under an extortionate tenancy. There are no schools, no doctors, no first-aid centers. The peasant has about concluded he has no escape from his tenancy except by revolution.

There are grumblings in every village I have visited across this broad belt. Revolution is brewing. It's the kind of revolution the stalwart sons of Tennessee once brewed. If we in America knew the facts and appreciated what was at stake, we would be on the side of these miserable tenants. We would help them make their revolutions. We would help them make their revolutions in the pattern of our own American Revolution.

Unfortunately, we do not do that. As a result of a combination or circumstances, we are mostly signed up on the side of the landlords. In Asia change is certain; but it is not necessarily a change to communism. To Asiatics we appear to be against change. We strive for stability in governments when there can be no stability. We aline ourselves with the status quo; and as a consequence America becomes identified in the eyes of the peasants of Asia with the forces that hold them in their eternal serfdom. Soviet propaganda about America, these peasants often told me, is proved to be correct. We talk democracy and peace and in our foreign policies support persons and governments and policies that make democracy and peace impossible in Asia.

This criticism of America is not fair; we intend no such consequences. It is, however, a product of our wholly negative attitude. In our foreign policy we are merely anti-Communist. We have not become identified in the eyes of the peasants of Asia with their aspirations. The opposite has in fact been the case. We have been so violently and relentlessly anti-Communist that we have rushed to the support of every group that opposes Soviet communism. That has put us in partnership with the corrupt and reactionary groups whose policies breed the discontent on which Soviet communism feeds and spreads. Thus we have ended up as allies of some of the worst foes of the peoples of Asia.

It is easy to reverse the trend. We can begin by utilizing the idea of the TVA as the political instrument for remodeling the economy of Asia. Take the Tigris and Euphrates as an example. Today 200 men own and control Iraq. Three million five hundred thousand people are the poverty-ridden, diseased, and illiterate employees of this group. A TVA on the Tigris and Euphrates could rather quickly alter this condition. If a TVA were constructed, it could provide the conditions which would transform this poverty belt into a prosperous area. It could create an economy based on a democratic rather than a communistic foundation. If a TVA is built, American capital will largely build it. We therefore can attach conditions to it—conditions similar to the ones that settled our own West and that prevented for all time the ancient problem of landlordism from haunting this Nation. The basic condition is that every man who works the land shall own it and that no man shall own more than say, 30 acres.

This undertaking would have profound effects on both the problem of the standard of living in this area and on the problem of population. It would at once spread the dividends of increased production among the broad base of the peasants and lay the foundation for medical care, schools, and all of the other necessities of healthy village life. It would, moreover, supply the largest part of the answer to the population problem. Iraq today has 3,500,000 people; Persia, 16,000,000. With proper land utilization Iraq could support 40,000,000; Persia, 100,000,000. We think of India as overpopulated. Her 400,000,000, located on tired and saturated land, seem to us to create an insoluble problem. Nehru, however, is convinced that India is underpopulated; and after seeing India's potential I am inclined to agree. India's TVA's can greatly increase the fertility and productivity of the earth. India's TVA's can start vast industrial projects. India's future is bright. Her natural resources are great. She has, for example, richer iron deposits than we ever knew in America. Her electric power potential is unequaled. There is no reason why India cannot enjoy as high a standard of living as our own.

If America sponsored the kind of TVA in Asia that we sponsor at home, the political tide would soon turn our way. Deep in the hearts of each of Asia's peasants is the desire to own land. He wants to be able to fence it, to call it his own. Land ownership is a real passion. The Soviets know it. In the propaganda which they beam to Asia or spread by word of mouth, they do not talk of collective farms. Instead they promise every tenant his own farm. While the Soviets are talking, we of the Western World can promote actual projects. We can be the promoters of living TVA's in this entire area which will make the farmers the landowners.

Today the peasants in these countries have little to fight for. Today they will not form armies of strength and determination against Soviet communism. They will not rise up and fight for their landlords. They have been too long exploited. They cannot be expected to form reliable armies in defense of the system which has held them in their lowly estate. They must have ideas of freedom for which to fight. Those ideas must be concrete and specific. For example, once the Communists in China changed from Marxist slogans to agrarian projects that caught the imagination of the peasants; they began to march to victories. People are the same the world over. Armies that fight to the bitter end are armies that fight for ideas. The aim of the Soviet influence is to produce native armies that will fight for the projects of Soviet Russia. There is no reason why the democratic world cannot do the same. Our task is in many respects easier than Russia's. For in Asia, Russia is the much-suspected neighbor whose Marxist philosophy has precious little appeal even to the masses.

If the peasants of Asia are given personal stakes in their countries, they will rally in defense. While they will not rise up and fight for their landlords, they will rise up and fight for their own. Only when those conditions exist can we build security in that area.

We of the Western World have sacrificed our strength in Asia because we have been purely on the defensive. We let China go communistic, because we attached no conditions to the $2,000,000,000 we advanced to Chiang Kai-shek. If we had insisted on reforms as a condition of our help and supervised the expenditure of the great wealth we poured into China, the chances are China would not be Communist today.

To date most of the funds we have spent in Asia have been wasted. In spite of our expenditures the democratic world has been growing smaller and smaller. The truth is that we cannot save the world from communism by dollars. We can, however, save it from communism by a liberal, aggressive, positive program of reform.

The TVA is a great political invention of the century. It has made Tennessee a word with revolutionary overtones the world around. Tennessee is today a word that inspires millions of Asiatics to the hope of a better life. The concept of water control and land utilization which the TVA embodies can become the solvent of the main problems of Asia. The idea of the TVA can become even more than that. It can be made the major influence for obtaining in Asia a verdict against communism and for civilization.

Appearance of General MacArthur Before House Committee on Armed Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

STATEMENT BY CONGRESSMAN JAMES T. PATTERSON IN CONNECTION WITH HIS INTRODUCTION OF A RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING THE APPEARANCE OF GENERAL OF THE ARMY DOUGLAS MACARTHUR BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN PUBLIC HEARING

The awful enormity of military operations in Korea has strengthened my conviction that it is the duty of Congress to determine that American lives shall not be lost needlessly in this conflict.

A half-informed Congress can accomplish little more than an uninformed Congress. It is ridiculous to assume that the scheduled hearings before the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees of the Senate will resolve the extreme doubt which many Members of Congress have as to the wisdom of the present course of action in Korea. Further, executive sessions will serve to increase that doubt beyond reasonable proportions.

Feeling that now is the time to take the American people into our confidence, I have proposed by resolution that the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives shall, upon completion of the Senate hearings, conduct a full, open public inquiry to which General MacArthur and Defense Department representatives will be invited to testify. It is expected that invitations would be issued to Secretary Marshall, Secretary Acheson, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as to others with special knowledge of our policies, both diplomatic and military, in Korea and on the continent of Asia.

The future security of the world depends upon the wisdom of our decisions. Personalities have no place in those decisions. The Congress is desirous of being fully informed and acting upon the information obtained.

Vehement attacks upon the President of the United States and upon General MacArthur, both in and beyond the confines of the Congress, make it mandatory that we hear both views as to the conduct of military and diplomatic operations in the Far East. The American people have split terribly over recent events, and despair instead of hope has pervaded our Nation. The people sincerely want to believe in the principles which brought our forces to Korea. They sincerely want to have us, as a nation, resist aggression. And, above all, they want to secure a just peace and an enduring one so that their children and their children's children shall not have to make war with despots.

I trust that my resolution will be adopted by the House and that the Armed Services Committee will conduct such an inquiry in the same nonpartisan manner in which all other deliberations of the committee have been held.

The Free Enterprise System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BLAIR MOODY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. MOODY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by John S. Coleman, president of the Burroughs Adding Machine Co., at the annual Michigan congressional dinner, held in this city on April 30 last. The address was on the subject of the free-enterprise system.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Detroit is about to celebrate its anniversary of 250 years. But, let no one say the city is old. Look at the headlines. They tell of the need for strength. And to whom does the Nation turn?—to young and dynamic Detroit. In World War II, without partisan interest, we fulfilled our commission, and we will fulfill it today.

Upon all of us, gentlemen, now rest new and grave obligations. There was a time when the typical company president was totally absorbed in the single purpose of running his own business. He had no extra curricular activities. He did not preside at community chest luncheons. He did not appear on television. He did not mount the rostrum at this association meeting or that convenion. He was not an airline commuter. He could be found in town and at his desk. And patient vice presidents had no reason to remind him that the company was in business to make a profit.

Why do we leave our desks and apply ourselves to problems outside the immediate commission of our boards of directors? In a free society, there is no escape from social responsibilities. And this is true for all of us, whatever our job. The citizen who will not dirty his hands with politics soon gets a brand of politics which is plenty dirty. He gets what he deserves and it may be he gets dictatorship.

Similarly, corporations ignore at their peril the world beyond their board rooms. For the problems of the world certainly will not pass the corporation by. The impact of taxation, social security, labor legislation, and banking policy on our daily business is clear and direct. But in the broader issues of foreign trade, of peace and war, of the ideals and purposes of a free society—in all of these too, the corporation as the representative unit of our economic system is inextricably mixed.

It may be right to call a corporation a legal fiction; but within its gates, millions of Americans spend most of their waking hours. To them, it is far from fiction. It touches intimately their homes and families. It is a factor in local affairs. Its representatives spread its influence across the country, and often, through subsidiaries or agents, to the world overseas.

The corporation is not an organ of the state, but surely it is an organ of society. On Government rests a broad jurisdiction. But the corporation, too, has rights. It, too, has its appro,riate sphere of action and its indispensable functions. These two, Government and industry, are not contestants in a struggle. They are partners in a common cause; that of the fulfillment of the individual man. And if this purpose is not pursued in harmony, it cannot be achieved at all. Tonight, therefore, here in Washington, before my colleagues of Michigan industry, I am encouraged to make a few remarks on our part in that elusive harmony.

Let me begin, gentlemen, by saying that we must first be aware of our own place in society. To determine this is not as easy as it seems. If we manage to snatch a few moments to look up some things people may have written on this subject, we meet with violently contradictory assertions. The Wall Street Journal and the writings of a Sinclair Lewis, the publications of the Chamber of Commerce and various professors of social science bear witness to a mutual dislike.

As someone has suggested, if one were to take one's opinion of American business enterprise from the Broadway stage, one could only conclude that it is a noxious form of skullduggery practiced by offensive heels. Though this unfortunate picture may be discounted as perhaps the normal relationship between "creative artists" and those doing the housekeeping, nevertheless, there is one fact which deserves some thought. Beyond its own journals, American business has a bad press. I am concerned with the bitter critics to be found in the highly influential academic and literary fields. And I am concerned with the ineffective response we have been making to this threat.

I use the word "threat" carefully. For if capitalism is to survive, it must do more than produce a greater and greater flow of goods and services. It must also win the acceptance and more, the loyalty, of the broad community. Unless the average citizen is convinced that our system is compatible with and encourages personal expression and fulfillment, he will search for alternatives. People may vote us success by buying our products, but that is small consolation if they then go to the polls and vote us out of business. Capitalism is the means to abundance; but if it is ideologically inadequate, it will die.

It is true that businessmen have not all become angels. Some are still battling the tide. But undoubtedly we have reached a large measure of industrial democracy. And our urgent task is to show the connection between these contemporary facts of business and the purposes of a free society—not by platitudes, far less by slogans and commercials; but by consistent, cogent, and tireless demonstration.

I am not going to attempt to draw a syllabus for an educational program. But this is perhaps an appropriate place to indicate certain prerequisites. Surely, the first is to understand those to whom we speak. Neither a thousand full-page spreads nor a torrent of after-dinner speeches will have the slightest effect unless we know what interests the listener. And of one thing I am sure, as Fortune magazine recently reminded us, abstract apologetic ads for free enterprise leave Joe Doakes cold.

The louder we proclaim its virtues, possibly the more suspicious he gets. Unctuous generalities about the corner drug store and Abraham Lincoln do not add up to the individual American dream. And over-simplified readings of economic history do not come within a mile of the desires and aspirations of the average man in the shop. It is time we gave a much-needed rest to the vague and negative words "free enterprise." I am not always sure I know what they mean, and I am sure that even after a million dollar advertising campaign, Joe Doakes doesn't.

Free enterprise in the sense of a broad freedom to buy and sell without a complicated apparatus of controls, certainly existed once. In this freedom America grew rich and great. But an elementary course in history is enough to show that, in this growth, great achievements were associated with grave abuses. And these abuses were bound to bring decisive modifications in the system.

So free enterprise has given way to a mixed economy in which management is to a large degree limited by public policies—and as we know only too well, this system has also developed its crops of ills.

The average American is not interested in business apologies. He does not want a course in the American system. * * * Interpretations of the past may be interesting enough, but he will ask what do they do for him now. Whatever free enterprise was, he will judge the system by how it works today; not in the ads, but in the machine shop and at the desk. Frustrations or suspicions in the factory or the office will not be resolved by offering the contemplation of abstractions. It is an elementary truth that the worker is interested first in his own welfare—and understandably so. Hence, I am inclined to agree with Governor Dewey that he does a poor service to his party who uses welfare as a term of abuse.

I am trying to be frank, gentlemen. For we must face the fact that the influence of businessmen in the community has been slowly declining. The great majority of people have looked elsewhere, to the Government or the labor unions, for the fulfillment of their aspirations to a better life.

As one piece of legislation has followed another, limiting the discretion of management, we have retreated to our associations and committees. And from them—at least it seems to the onlooker—we have looked out to fire broadsides at each successive project that others may put forward.

Inevitably, we have created the impression that we are obstructive and negative. Others have their inventory of proposals for reform; but we, it seems to many, do not even admit the problems.

It is time for us all to look at the problems of the Nation—not as management or labor, farmers or professional men; but as citizens. Perhaps this is easier said than done. But God knows that our society—and I speak of government, business, labor, and every segment of that society—will perish unless we recapture a capacity for disinterested action. I am not suggesting, then, a bigger and better lobby. But I am proposing that we participate to a greater extent in the formation of public policies; not just as watchdogs or critics of other proposals, but as the sponsors of practical measures to meet the problems of the day.

Indiscriminate opposition to programs, which to the average man appear to be designed for his benefit, is a sure way to lose public confidence. And yet we must admit that this has sometimes been the business attitude to major pieces of legislation.

Important acts affecting business are placed on the statute book without business participation and over business opposition. And those individual enactments in the end add up to the transformation of the economy.

It might have been better in some cases, and I am thinking of such examples as the Federal Reserve Act, the Securities and Exchange Act, and the Social Security Act, if we had accepted the need and participated fully in the writing of legislation.

We are not opposed to the aspirations of the common man. We are all common men, and we believe with all our hearts that a thriving capitalism is the best and greatest means to personal fulfillment. We do not believe that our system is perfect. But we must be sure that we are taking the initiative in the ceaseless search for development and improvement.

Here perhaps the greatest difficulty is the assumption that these aspirations can all be satisfied tomorrow. If all or even a majority of the unexecuted proposals for social welfare were in a brief period implemented by corporations or governments, our system would certainly collapse under the burden.

The great discovery of Socialist governments abroad has been that national resources are limited, and that for even nationalized undertakings, profits are desirable and even essential. Meanwhile, we are confronted with the tasks of reconciling these deeply established expectations with the requirements of the engine of production.

At Burroughs, we plan for efficient production; but we also endeavor to make a better place to work. And, indeed, the two objectives are inseparable. We must recover a lost intellectual initiative. We must make our proper contribution to the problems of the community and the State. We must get back into the stream of history.

The American economy remains the most productive in the world. It still has the stimulus of individual intiative. It is sparked by vigorous competion. It is dynamic. In it, new ideas are born and can rapidly become great industries.

We are not surprised that such vigor should bring its problems. Industrial relations, full employment, balanced international trade, the clash of progress and security, are but a few. But in the final analysis, the American economy meets the test. It is the envy of the entire world. Hardly a worker in Naples or Belgrade but would exchange his dwelling in Europe for a tent in Bay City. A Sears-Roebuck catalog is a book of wonders in Yugoslavia.

America has provided wide opportunities and reasonable security, and it is built on a concept of individual human dignity. If we have failed in communication, if we have encouraged suspicions, if we have not related our efforts to larger social purposes, then, in the words of the proverb—rather than abuse the darkness, let us light a candle.

Is Red China or Red Russia the Main Issue?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention of the House to the following article by Mr. James Reston, of the New York Times. Mr. Reston is one of our most excellent writers. His article merits careful study.

IS RED CHINA OR RED RUSSIA THE MAIN ISSUE?—"GREATER DEBATE" HAS POSED A QUESTION WHICH THE NATION MUST DECIDE

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, April 28.—Next week's foreign policy debate on Capitol Hill is likely to center around two statements made this week, one in the Senate by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, Republican of Ohio, and the other in Chicago by Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

1. The United States, said the Senator on Thursday, "mustn't be stopped" from adopting General MacArthur's program "by any possibility that the Russians may come into the war."

2. "However great the effort," said General MacArthur, "to distract attention from the main issues by introducing into public discussion extraneous and irrelevant matters, the fundamental question still remains the same: What is the policy for Korea?"

Last month, in the troops-to-Europe debate, Senator TAFT was arguing against sending large American forces to Europe on the ground that might provoke the Russians to make war.

His argument now, however, is that the United States can adopt the MacArthur program of bombing Manchuria, blockading the the China coast, and opening a second front in South China with Chiang Kai-shek's troops without worrying about the possibility that the Russians would retaliate.

MAC ARTHUR'S POSITION

General MacArthur implies much the same thing. In his first speech, he at least considered the possibility that the Russians might come in if we followed his policy. He also conceded that our strategic problem was global, and that to consider the problems of one area without considering the problems of all other areas was to court disaster for the whole.

Since then, however, while the general atmosphere has become less tense, the attack by President Truman's opposition has become no less severe. "Our objective," said the general in Chicago without clarifying whether he meant Communist China or Russia, "is victory over the nation and men who, without provocation or justification, have warred against us."

"What," he kept asking, "is the policy in Korea?" That, he said, is the "fundamental question."

The administration, of course, does not believe at all that Korea is the fundamental question, or that the defeat of Communist China is the fundamental question, or that victory in the Far East can be achieved by defeating China, or that such a big victory can be achieved cheaper than under the present policy.

It believes the Soviet Union is the fundamental question. It believes the survival of the United States and its principal allies in Europe and Asia is involved in that question. It believes Korea is an important but secondary part of that question. It does not want to risk a war of survival with 20 divisions against Russia's 300, and it does not want to risk that war in Manchuria.

The paradox of the present situation is that General MacArthur and, to a surprising extent, Senator TAFT are now urging President Truman to adopt a literal interpretation of the Truman doctrine while Mr. Truman, having learned a little more geography and suffered a little more from history in the last 4 years, is now insisting that that doctrine must be interpreted rather carefully.

The general is saying that we should block the expansion of communism wherever it occurs, and especially in Asia, for if we don't, he argues, its expansion in one area will weaken our defense against it everywhere. the administration, however, now rejects so simple a strategy and argues more or less as follows:

1. The United States must do what it can to block the expansion of communism throughout the world, but it must risk an atomic war to do so only when areas vital to the security of the United States are at stake, and only when it is strong enough to wage such a war with the support of dependable allies.

2. A Soviet conquest of Western Europe, Japan, or the Middle East would directly jeopardize the security of the Western Hemisphere. It would tip the whole world balance of power in Russia's favor if any one of these things were to happen, and particularly if the industrial and brain-power resources of the Ruhr and the rest of Western Europe were at Moscow's disposal.

CAUTION NECESSARY

3. Therefore, in allocating our limited forces, and in planning our strategy in Korea, we should do nothing that would threaten our defenses in more vital areas, or bring about a world war which neither we nor our allies are prepared to wage.

This is not an easy policy to follow, or even to explain, but the administration is prepared to defend its present limited-war policy in Korea and its rejection of the MacArthur policy on a number of different grounds, including the following:

(a) The limited-war policy gives the United States and its allies time to rebuild their defenses.

(b) The limited-war policy not only uses up men and material slower than a bigger war, but it gives us time to develop a whole range of atomic weapons for use on the battlefield, and a variety of important antitank weapons as well. There was a lot of talk about these weapons just a year ago—far too much talk, as officials here now agree—but important developments have taken place in the last year toward the production of atomic artillery, atomic-guided missiles, and various other weapons.

(c) The limited war in Korea has been far more damaging to the enemy than it has been to the United Nations.

(d) The Communists started out to seize South Korea. It has been denied to them. They started out to test our will to resist, and they have discovered that we will fight them, 6,000 miles from our home base if necessary. Moreover, if, as both General MacArthur and the administration believe, Korea was merely the first step in a campaign of Communist imperial expansion, the limited war there has denied them, not only South Korea, but the much more fruitful conquests of Southeast Asia.

COALITION HELD TOGETHER

(e) The limited-war policy has held the Allied coalition together, maintained our treaty obligations both to the North Atlantic nations and to the United Nations itself.

(f) Moreover, the limited-war policy enables the Allies to retain the initiative in the deployment of their armed forces. So long as the demands of the Korean war do not greatly exceed present requirements, the Allies can slowly build the defenses of key areas such as Western Europe, Japan, and the Middle East, but once the Red army is committed to battle, then the initiative in the deployment of forces rests, not with the Allies, but with the far larger forces of the enemy.

The administration does not, and cannot promise victory as a result of this limited war. The most it has been willing to imply is that if the UN forces can contain the present Chinese Communist offensive, then it may be possible to negotiate an honorable settlement. And even this hope is probably not so real as officials here make out.

Thus, a limited war for an unlimited time is not an easy thesis to argue. It is against the tradition and temperament of the country. It is complicated. It rests, at least partly, on the necessity of maintaining common cause with the British, the French, the Canadians, and others, who have not done as much to defend the common cause in Korea as they could have done.

Moreover, the thesis is being put forward by an administration which has made grave miscalculations of Soviet intentions in the past and which is now again at a low ebb in its popularity.

Finally, the opposition, in contrast, has a simple thesis and a glittering and eloquent hero to present it. He cannot prove that he is right, but the administration cannot prove that he is wrong, either, and it merely has a casualty list to place against his promises of relief.

PSYCHOLOGICAL ADVANTAGE

Thus, the general has retained a psychological advantage in the argument so far. He is the one illustrious American public figure of his time who has been relieved for over 10 years of the embarrassment of having to answer questions in public. He has been free to attack and retreat, either into his embassy in Tokyo or the "privileged sanctuary" of the Waldorf towers.

For the past 10 days, too, he has been favored not only by his simple and plausible argument, but by the natural and proper adulation of a grateful populace for a great soldier.

Now, however, he must not only assert his eloquent themes from a platform, but he must answer the questions he himself has raised:

What makes you think that the Russians will not retaliate if we do as you propose?

What sources of information do you have about Soviet intentions?

How would you carry on the battle against communism in Asia or Europe without allies and their bases?

Since you guessed wrong about the Chinese Communists coming into the war, isn't it fair to question your judgment about what the Russians will or will not do?

How could we defend Japan or Western Europe with our present forces if they were attacked in retaliation for our attacks on Manchuria?

How can you stop the slaughter of America's sons by making the war bigger?

Is Korea really the main issue, or Red China—or is it not the Soviet Union?

When these questions have been answered, then the people to whom he has appealed will be in a better position to judge whether they wish to adopt his proposals or reject them.

Resolutions Adopted by Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. DAVIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, at this critical period of our Nation's history, it is gratifying and heartening to note that the women of our Nation have not lost sight of the need for good citizenship, law observance, and law enforcement.

They realize, as we all realize, that particularly in this period of stress and danger, the country cannot afford to give ground in the slightest degree to the criminal element and to those who would for financial gain debauch the character, morals, and decency of our people, particularly the younger generation.

As an evidence of the concern of the women of our country over these important matters, I insert herewith two resolutions adopted on April 4, 1951, by the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled. These resolutions were officially certified to me by Mrs. T. A. Maxwell, president, and Mrs. Gartha Peterson, chairman of the federation's department of legislation.

The above-mentioned resolutions follow:

Whereas the increase in narcotic addicts among young people has become a matter of deep concern to many parents over the Nation and to the United States Treasury's Bureau of Narcotics; and

Whereas the Bureau of Narcotics has only 200 men to cover the entire United States; and

Whereas the Bureau gives as the main reason for narcotic trafficking and the resultant addiction to narcotic habits, the light prison sentences given to dope peddlers, and is urging a minimum sentence of 5 years for any second offense, and at least 10 years for a third offense; and

Whereas young addicts tend to associate with criminals and become active criminals through the need to secure narcotics: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled go on record as approving a strengthening of the narcotic law through increasing the penalties for persons convicted of selling narcotics; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the members of the Georgia delegation in Congress, and to the Governor of the State of Georgia.

This 4th day of April 1951.

Mrs. T. A. MAXWELL,
President.

GARTHA PETERSON,
Chairman, Department of Legislation.

Whereas the revelations of the Senate Crime Investigation Committee have shocked the whole country and have shown all too clearly that graft, gambling, bribery, and organized crime are eating at the very foundation of this Nation's democracy; and

Whereas such conditions could not have come into existence but for the condoning of disrespect for law for the moral callousness of too large a segment of our population nor without the knowledge and, at least, the tacit consent of the authorities and the law enforcement officers; and

Whereas our Government and our way of life are threatened unless there is a return to honesty, decency, and respect for law, and to the once high moral standards which made this country great; and

Whereas we recognize that adequate laws are necessary but not the sole answer to the problem: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled this 4th day of April 1951 call upon our Federal, State, county, and municipal governments to see that such additional laws as are needed to cope with the underworld be speedily enacted, that the guilty be brought to the bar of justice and punishment be meted out; be it further

Resolved, That we call upon the authorities and law-enforcement officers to see without fear or favor, that the laws are observed; be it further

Resolved, That the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs pledge its cooperation and best efforts to a program of improving moral conditions by improving people, ourselves first; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the members of the Georgia delegation in Congress, to the Governor of the State of Georgia.

Mrs. T. A. MAXWELL,
President.

GARTHA PETERSON,
Chairman, Department of Legislation.

An Historic Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD A. PATTEN
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD, an editorial entitled "An Historic Address," which appeared in the Arizona Daily Star, under date of April 24, 1951. In my opinion, it is an excellent evaluation of General MacArthur's speech:

AN HISTORIC ADDRESS

While praise cannot be too lavish about the historic address that General MacArthur made last week in Washington, the wonderful thing about it is the way it demonstrated so dramatically the perfect functioning of the American democratic process.

Since in nearly every American there is a bit of the rebel, General MacArthur's conduct in challenging Presidential policy is something that is bound to happen from time to time. Correctly the President disciplined him; but correctly also, Congress invited him to speak before its two Houses in a joint meeting.

There on the one hand we saw that President acting to restrain a military commander of widespread popularity. On the other hand we saw the Congress, which is the legislative branch of our Government, acting on its own initiative, not only to honor one of our great military leaders, but to allow the country to be informed fully from the lips of a man whom the President disciplined.

The lesson in that process is one in which all of us, admirers as well as critics, can take pride. Each person, or office, has its power checked; yet out of all the differences of opinion that process permits to be expressed, our Government goes on, and each of us from the lowest to the most exalted is free to have his say, too.

What more can we ask of life than such a privilege?

That is freedom, despite its defects, performing successfully before a world where during the past 20 years freedom has been steadily losing out.

Behind the eloquence of General MacArthur's address was the experience of a lifetime, and thoughts which he had been resolving for many years. Although he spoke only from notes, he had been writing that talk for years in his mind.

Those who have talked with him in recent years heard numerous familiar words. His anxiety over the destructiveness of modern war; his love for the Philippines and admiration of his work there; his pride in the reconstruction of Japan; his hatred of communism; his military estimate of what our new frontiers are; his opinion on Formosa and the role of Chiang Kai-shek represent an expression of his soul as well as his mind.

But so did he reveal some of his weaknesses. When he said that the object of war was victory, the soldier in him was speaking. He did not realize that we Americans have won two great world wars, but have failed to win the political successes, as distinguished from victories, for which wars should be waged.

His exasperation over the apparent stalemate in Korea, and the failure to use Chinese Nationalist troops, again represent the soldier speaking, and an unjustifiable contempt for the slower and more laborious processes of political methods.

His call for what would amount to a world military campaign against communism—in China as well as in Europe—brushes aside too hastily the possible wisdom of keeping our commitments within the limits of our strength and limiting the scope of the present war in Korea.

Fortunately, now that General MacArthur has had his say, the public debate will move with more speed toward a decision. Whatever is done now will have an open public record behind it and therefore a united country. We have that much faith in the democratic process, which has been so dramatically staged before our own eyes and those of the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I want to include two editorials on the life of Spencer A. Canary, former editor of the Daily Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio; one from his good neighbor, the Defiance Crescent-News, of Defiance, Ohio; and one from his beloved paper, the Daily Sentinel-Tribune:

[From the Bowling Green (Ohio) Daily Sentinel-Tribune]

GOOD NIGHT, SWEET PRINCE

Those among us whose lives have spanned the last five to eight decades will probably agree with our late editor, S. A. Canary, that it has been a privilege to have been a part of life during the era in which he lived, baffling though so often the social, economic, and industrial changes have been.

To keep pace with those changes and to accept the responsibility of editorial leadership in this community during the last 43 years required the complete loyalty of a man who spent his life in the interest of others.

"He was a man, take him for all in all, I shall not look upon his like again."

Whether readers agreed with his editorials or not, they held a deep respect for his opinion because no word was written without long study and consideration of a problem or without comprehensive reading.

The expression that an institution is but the length and breadth of the shadow of one man is very true in the case of the policies of the editorial staff of the Sentinel-Tribune.

The late editor loved this community and this paper as though they were his children. His guiding motto in editorial work and in contact with people was Charles Reade's "Put yourself in his place," "Very little matters very much."

He often voiced a philosophy of "Don't take yourself too seriously—the world will go on without you." Along with that was a self-restraint practiced daily in which he tried not to criticize anyone before 9 o'clock in the morning because of a desire to be better adjusted to the problems of the day by that time.

Bowling Green has been most fortunate in the kind of men who have lived here during the past 75 years. Spence was one of many whose sacrifices of time, money, and effort have made this city the outstanding community that it is today. It is not possible to name them all without omitting many who deserve places in the community hall of fame.

But those men, whose vision, self-abnegation, industry, and community ambition gained for this city the Bowling Green State University, the H. J. Heinz Co. plant, and other industrial, cultural, and civic benefits that have helped Bowling Green to grow from a village into a city of 12,000 people, performed services for which the people will be eternally indebted.

No little part of this constant change for the better was influenced by the late editor. He was the confidant of leaders of both political parties, although his pen spoke with strong Republican convictions. His opinions were respected by Members of Congress and were often printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

His advice was sought and gladly offered in countless problems on local, State, national, and world-wide scale.

Above all, Spence practiced love and charity toward his fellow men. His benevolences, tendered always in deep humility and tenderness without even his closest friends being aware of them, were countless.

Yes; the world will go on without him. The Daily Sentinel-Tribune continues to progress forward with plans for greater service and improvements ahead, but the philosophy he developed will continue to characterize its columns and the community is better for his having passed this way.

"Good night, sweet prince, and flights of angels sing thee to thy rest."

MAUMEE VALLEY LOSES A VALUED LEADER

Death of Spencer A. Canary, of Bowling Green, takes from the northwestern Ohio scene a man whose influence in behalf of constructive enterprises will long be felt in this region. As editor of the Bowling Green Sentinel-Tribune, he played an effective part in promoting the best interests not only of his home community but the entire Maumee Valley.

Mr. Canary probably was known personally to few people in Defiance, but he was a sincere friend of this city. In his more active days he was a frequent visitor here, and one of the most ardent advocates of giving proper recognition to Fort Defiance and all other ground hallowed by the achievements of Gen. "Mad Anthony" Wayne and his illustrious colleagues.

A keen student of history, Mr. Canary never could be accused of living in the past. He did contend that youth can never properly appreciate the American heritage of freedom and opportunity without a knowledge of the forefathers' hardships and sacrifices. The Maumee Valley is blessed as are few regions with important materials of American pioneer history. Spencer Canary insisted that those materials be employed by the schools, the press, and every avenue of communication to teach the basic lessons of Americanism and democracy.

Mr. Canary never tired of emphasizing the fact that without the campaign of Gen. Anthony Wayne, the history of Ohio and the entire Northwest Territory, comprising six present States, probably would have been far different—a barrier State under Great Britain with the western boundary of our country at the Allegheny Mountains. And in support of one project for which he was an effective champion, he once wrote:

"What greater appreciation of what General Wayne did for America could the United States show, and what more useful, enduring, and patriotism-inspiring memorial to him could it devise than a parkway along the trail which he and his men so wearily trod and which countless motorists would traverse in the years to come?"

The Anthony Wayne Parkway in its eventual development will be the fruition of one of his most cherished objectives.

Nearly two decades ago, Spencer Canary's work and influence were powerful factors in preserving for the public rather than for private benefit important stretches of Maumee River frontage. He served as president of the Maumee River Scenic and Historic Highway Association and for many years was a member of the Fort Meigs Memorial Commission. He was a member of the editorial board of the Northwestern Ohio Historical Society. He was the moving spirit in creation of the Wood County Park Board which has accomplished much of value to this entire area. Even after physical disability forced curtailment of his former strenuous activity, he responded without hesitation to many calls for help in projects of area-wide interest.

Spencer Canary will be missed not only by his fellow townsmen but by a host of others who regarded him as a first citizen of the Maumee Valley.

Formula for History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. MILLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call to the attention of the House the following editorials which appeared in the Buffalo Evening News.

The first, Formula for History, which appeared in the April 13, 1951, edition; the second, MacArthur Pleads a Potent Case, which appeared in the April 20, 1951, edition; and the third, Internal Security at a Snail's Pace, which appeared in the April 25, 1951, edition.

The editorials follow:

[From the Buffalo Evening News of April 13, 1951]

FORMULA FOR HISTORY

Two highly skilled American generals were maneuvered into false positions in the history of World War II by inept and eccentric decisions made in the State Department and, presumably, approved by the White House.

In a running battle with the politicians, which has been climaxed by his dismissal from the Far East command, General MacArthur has made certain the same thing won't happen to him. When the chronicle of this war is written in perspective, his obdurate resistance to administration Asiatic policy—whether it turns out that he was right or wrong—will not be a clouded issue. It is on the record that he felt so forcefully that he was executing a bankrupt policy he exceeded military proprieties in political statements and courted banishment as his dissent.

The first example of an able military man being euchred into an untenable position by the diplomats, which General MacArthur may have had in mind, is that of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, commander of Allied troops in Europe in the last war and now Supreme Commander of North Atlantic Treaty forces there. Headed full-tilt for Berlin in the closing days of the war against Hitler, the Eisenhower forces were brought to an abrupt halt by orders from Washington. General Eisenhower was to allow our stanch allies, the Russians, the glory of entering the conquered capital first and without provision for an allied corridor into the city. He was resigned and laconic about it. "A political decision," he said.

The result of that snap political decision is that when Germany was carved up and Berlin zoned, the Allies found themselves isolated in an island in the city with no communications corridor connecting with the outside. When the Soviets choked off supply routes through their sector, the expensive airlift was brought into being to keep residents in the free zone alive. It would never have been necessary if the Russians hadn't been handed every concession they asked for by the State Department politicians in an expansive mood.

Second victim of similar murky decisions at the political level was Gen. Mark Clark when he was American High Commissioner in Austria. He hasn't been as reticent about it as General Eisenhower and recounts his troubles in his book, Calculated Risk. His first taste of devious diplomatic maneuvering, which impaired his command of the area, was when the zones of influence were being defined. In the original plans, agreed to by Russia, he maintained full command of a vital transport route along the north bank of the Danube. "A grevious error," said the Soviet to Washington, which appeared horrified that this important territory was under American aegis. Without a syllable of consultation with General Clark as commissioner, Washington agreed to extend the Russian zone to include the critical strip and a part of upper Austria.

General Clark cites another instance of bizarre State Department usurpation of his authority—the case of the captured Yugoslav barges. He had orders to keep them for bargaining purposes. The Secretary of State's office wired him, as he writes, "Return those barges to the Yugoslavs or else." He did. Everywhere he turned in an effort to administer his command effectively he was hobbled by similar arbitrary orders, execution of which played into the hands of Soviet Russia.

General Eisenhower kept quiet and didn't hit back. General Clark sat out his mission but took out his frustation in print. With their experiences in mind—and what American military man isn't aware of them?—the less inhibited General MacArthur has taken good care that if United States and UN policies bring disaster in Asia he has lodged his protests and advanced alternatives, though it cost him one of the greatest military commands in warfare's history.

[From the Buffalo Evening News of April 20, 1951]

MACARTHUR PLEADS A POTENT CASE

Gen. Douglas MacArthur used the magnificent forum at his disposal Thursday not to take a bow, but to plead a case. He pleaded it eloquently, dramatically, and effectively. He left the issue sharper, the debate angrier, and the Nation decidedly more impressed than when he arrived. On all counts, it was one of the most moving and historic speeches it has been this generation's privilege to hear—and see.

It was a soldier's report, but with tremendous political overtones. Confining himself to a "military estimate" of the Asiatic conflict he had just left under curt dismissal orders from his Commander in Chief, General MacArthur pulled no punches and wasted no words in pressing his view of what it will take to salvage military victory out of the Korean stalemate.

Nor was the Capital's emotional tension eased when he bluntly hinted that the Joint Chiefs of Staff would fully share his "military estimate" if they were politically free to do so. It was that one bombshell remark, perhaps more than all the rest he said, that threatens to put his dismissal—indeed, the whole question of what to do about Asia—in a startlingly different light.

Until then, it had been represented that this was not merely MacArthur versus Truman, but MacArthur versus the Joint Chiefs—not only a field commander's difference with his civilian Commander in Chief but one respected soldier's opinion against that of other soldiers, having perhaps a broader, more global responsibility. But if it must now be accepted that the MacArthur view of how "to bring hostilities to an end with the least possible delay and at a saving of lives" has been "fully shared" by "practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff—then we do indeed have a case calling for the sternest congressional scrutiny of a civilian executive authority that would dare to ignore and to silence such counsel.

General MacArthur's reference to the Joint Chiefs was qualified in only two particulars—that they shared his view "in the past" and "from a military standpoint." Possibly they have since rejected it on other counts, perhaps that the world political repercussions would more than offset the military advantages. This is the implication of the hasty retort Thursday night that the Joint Chiefs had all advised his dismissal.

Be that as it may, the MacArthur speech has unquestionably put the Joint Chiefs on the hottest political spot of their lives, and we may be sure they will be haled before the congressional military committees to explain precisely where, how, and why they would modify the MacArthur prescription for waging the Korean war.

Close rereading of General Bradley's Chicago speech on behalf of the Joint Chiefs of Staff last Tuesday shows, significantly, that he did not directly contradict the MacArthur viewpoint. He gave the closest thing yet to a military justification for the strategy of stalemate; he made strong answer to those who would abandon Korea, and he said, without elaborating, that action which would enlarge the war is "contrary to our best interests." But as to waging that war more effectively, he said only that it should be limited "if at all possible" and that "the confinement or extension of the area of combat is in the realm of diplomacy and international politics."

General MacArthur does not disagree. What he had asked repeatedly was new decisions "in the diplomatic sphere." He has flatly disavowed any idea of all-out war in Asia, but felt that military necessity made these measures essential once the Chinese Reds committed their full strength: (1) Intensification of our economic blockade; (2) imposition of a naval blockade; (3) removal of restrictions on air reconnaissance, and (4) removal of restrictions on the Chiang Kai-shek forces on Formosa "with logistical support to contribute to their effective operations." Without such measures—and with reinforcements denied him—General MacArthur told Congress he had made it clear to his superiors that the military position of his command "forbade victory." At best "we can hope for only an indecisive campaign with its terrible and constant attrition upon our forces."

This, to be sure, is not the first time a field commander has been under such frustrating wraps. MacArthur himself was in that condition during most of the Pacific war, when that theater was purposely subordinated to the European. But that was in truth a strategic decision by military men waging a global war. This one, by contrast, appears to be a strategic decision imposed on the military on the basis of international politics. If General MacArthur's understanding of the Joint Chiefs' military views is correct, it means that these have been changed or overruled for political or other reasons about which the bewildered public can only guess. When Congress brings them to light—as it now most surely will—the explanations had better be good. General MacArthur has raised an issue that will not be downed by dismissals, deceit, or double talk.

INTERNAL SECURITY AT A SNAIL'S PACE

Remember the McCarran Communist Control Bill—and the great urgency about getting it on the statute books?

That was last summer, and the fifth column would have us by the throat if Congress didn't act at once. There was an election coming up and everybody had to be more anti-Communist that everybody else.

So the McCarran bill went roaring through over a Presidential veto, and with scarcely a handful of dissenting votes. If there were flaws in it, they could be fixed later, but time was of the essence. Or at least so it was represented then.

That, as we say, was late last summer. The bill became a law 7 months ago. It gave every Communist-action and Communist-front organization 30 days to register voluntarily. The month went by. Nothing happened. Another month went by. Then the President appointed the Subversive Activities Control Board, which the law created to compel reluctant Red outfits to register if they don't do it on their own initiative. At the same time, the administration formally petitioned the new board to require the Communist Party, U. S. A., to register as a Communist-action organization.

That was 5 months ago. Chairman Seth Richardson of the Subversive Control Board promised there would be no hysteria, no undue haste. He indicated the hearings would be protracted. How right he has been.

This week—7 months after the law was passed; 5 months after the petition was filed—the hearing on the first case finally began. But the Communists promptly challenged the whole proceedings. Their grounds: the Richardson board hasn't even been confirmed yet. The point has dubious legal merit.

But it's a fact that these nominations have been before the Senate since November—and there has been no action, either confirming or rejecting them. That's how big a hurry the Senate is in to get this law properly implemented—the Senate that just couldn't wait to perfect the law last September, because time was of the essence.

And what of the board? Confirmed or unconfirmed, is it now at last going to give the Commies their day in court, and make its ruling?

Not on your life. This is just the beginning of the hearing. It will continue, board sources indicate, for probably 3 months if not longer. After that, there presumably will have to be time for consideration before it is determined whether the Communist Party is a Communist-action organization and thus compelled to register.

Why? you may well ask. Is there some question about the Communists being Communists? Well, the law defines a "Communist-action" organization as one which "is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign * * * organization controlling the world Communist movement * * * and operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement."

So, you may wonder, isn't it pretty obvious that the description fits the Communist Party, United States of America, on all counts? When it comes to singling out one of the devious Communist fronts or other hidden organizations, maybe the proof will be harder to come by. But this petition is directed against the Communist Party itself. Why should it be so complicated?

Why, indeed? If this was the urgent piece of internal-security legislation it was represented as being last fall, why has the Senate waited 5 months to consider the nominations of the board named to implement it—and why has the board waited 5 months to begin a drawn-out hearing on so elementary a question as whether the Communist Party is in fact a Communist organization?

The only answer that suggests itself is that both Congress and the administration were playing tawdry politics with the fifth-column problem last fall—and they still are. The law contains a lot of unrealistic "monkey-business," particularly in its registration procedures. It needs to be rewritten in a forthright manner so that it will be, in truth, an internal security law. Instead, it is being sabotaged by delay and by buck-passing efforts in both Congress and the administration to lay the blame on each other.

Wedge of Despotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. GLENN BEALL
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of April 25 entitled from the "Wedge of Despotism":

WEDGE OF DESPOTISM

Secretary of Commerce Sawyer and the officials who have been supporting him in his defiance of the United States Court of Appeals have been given additional time to show why they should not be punished for contempt. The court has proved to be lenient. Obviously it is reluctant to penalize high officials of the Government—except as a last resort. Yet the court has made unmistakably plain its grave concern over the course the administration has followed in the Dollar case, and everyone who believes in law and order may well share that concern.

The inescapable fact is that Secretary Sawyer and his associates have continued to exercise control over the stock of the American President Lines in spite of the court's order that it should be returned to R. Stanley Dollar and his associates. Various aspects of the case have been before the Supreme Court three times and it is now before the Court of Appeals for the fourth time. The courts have held in unmistakable terms that the stock in controversy belongs to the Dollar interests—that the old Maritime Commission which took it as a pledge had no authority to acquire outright ownership. Yet the executive arm is still resisting this judicial decision. The fact that the Commerce and Justice Departments are acting in this matter under direct orders from the President only makes their defiance of the courts the more outrageous.

"We have the spectacle of a Government which proclaims its adherence to law as the governing force among men," said the latest opinion by Judge Prettyman, "not only refusing for 6 years to submit to its own courts its own claim to private property derived from a purely commercial transaction, but endeavoring by every device to thwart and defeat the judgment of those courts after it has been rendered." The question is not, as the court says, one of high policy. It concerns merely the ownership of a commercial property. The Government should be the first to acquiesce in the judgment of its courts in such a matter even though officials may continue to believe that an injustice has been done. Instead, it has continued its defiance by means of instigating an unseemly conflict between two courts."

The only ground on which the administration has to stand is the fact that the United States in its sovereign capacity was not a party to the case that the courts have decided. After the claim of its agent holding the stock failed, the Government asserted in effect that the stock belonged not to the Dollar interests or the Maritime Commission, but to the United States. But the stock has never been in the Government's name. How could the Government have gotten legal possession of it if the Maritime Commission had no authority to acquire it? The present claim is obviously a quibble designed to frustrate the settled judgment of the court. We do not see how it could be upheld by the courts without making a mockery of the processes of justice.

Undoubtedly the Department of Justice is entitled to pursue its flimsy claim in another court, if it wishes to do so. What is inexcusable is that it used its "quiet title" suit to obtain from a Federal judge in San Francisco an injunction preventing transfer of the stock on the company books and preventing the Dollar interests from voting it. In reply to this, Judge Prettyman says that the injunction could be properly used to prevent Mr. Dollar from selling or transferring the stock (now adjudged to be rightly his) until the Government's claim has been finally settled. But it would be a strange distortion of justice to give a mere unadjudicated claim pressed in a lower court precedence over a finally adjudicated right in a higher court. Such a holding Judge Prettyman cogently says, "Would mean chaos and the complete collapse of every semblance of orderly judicial process, a consummation to the irreparable damage of the public interest."

Regardless of whether the officials responsible for carrying out the President's law-flouting orders are punished for contempt, the administration ought to get itself off this hook. The first step obviously should be to ask the San Francisco court to modify its injunction so that it would in no way clash with the judgment of the court of appeals here. The second should be the surrender to the Dollar interests of all the rights incident to their ownership of the stock as already finally determined by the courts. Then the administration could pursue its flimsy claim without placing itself in the position of a trickster or pretending to be above the law. The big issue here is respect for the judicial system and that ought to transcend the financial gains or losses involved even in the minds of disappointed official litigants.

The American Eagle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 1870 for the protection of the bald eagle in Alaska. A great deal of interest has been shown in this legislation from individuals and organizations interested in the conservation of wild life and particularly in this bird which is immortalized on our great seal.

Mrs. Inez E. Moore, of Valdez, Alaska, has shown particular interest in H. R.

1870 and, pursuant to leave granted, I am including as part of these remarks, her poem entitled "The American Eagle," as follows:

THE AMERICAN EAGLE

I'm the bald eagle, a bird of prey.
I forage for food, God made me that way.
I try not to kill any more than I need,
For unlike human beings, I've never learned greed.
My only weapons are beak and claws
While man is protected by all sorts of laws.
Just lately he placed a price on my head
Two fifty for those who would bring me in dead.
He calls me a predator, a bird of prey,
But what about man, just any old day
With traps, guns, and dogs, he uses no reason,
Takes more than the limit and oft out of season.
In liberty's name and the sake of fair play,
Get busy and pass some protection today.
—Inez E. Moore.

Admiral Badger: His Ships Come Out of Moth Balls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article, entitled "Admiral Badger: His Ships Come Out of Moth Balls," which appeared in Newsweek magazine on April 16, 1951.

I believe that the following article is adequate testimony to the very excellent job that Admiral Badger has done in reactivating the naval defenses of our eastern sea frontier. He has taken a difficult task by the horns and has successfully completed a job, not only in the best interests of our national defense but in the interests of the taxpaying public as well. Congress should take its hat off to Admiral Badger and his staff.

The article follows:

ADMIRAL BADGER: HIS SHIPS COME OUT OF MOTH BALLS

A phantom fleet, more than 2,000 naval vessels of all types, rode at anchor at 8 bases. Victory-flushed veterans of the Second World War, they were moored in long gray lines at Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf ports, robbed of their crews in the great scramble to disarm and demobilize which followed the end of hostilities.

It was not America's first phantom fleet. After the first war, another United States fleet had been tied up. Its crews had been cut to 10 percent, carrying on a losing battle against the greatest enemy of ships—rust. Low Navy budgets and the elements had done a good job of decimating this fleet. Much of what remained had been scrapped by international agreement.

But as the last war drew to a close, Admiral Ernest J. King and the Navy looked for a way to avoid the mistakes of 1918. Their answer was the Atlantic and Pacific reserve fleets—a great armada zippered away in rustproof cocoons against the evil day of a future war.

Double trouble: For Navy scientists, the problem was twofold: (1) To develop a technique which would vanquish rust; and (2) to make the process such that the reactivation of the laid-up vessels could be accomplished in an absolute minimum of time. To make seaworthy the overage destroyers which President Roosevelt traded for British bases in 1940 had taken months. The Navy realized that this margin of time might not be ours in any future hostilities.

The solution was at once simple and effective, a combination of plastics and moth balls. In order not to dismantle the ships, practically everything topside was left intact, sheathed in plastic or aluminum cocoons and blisters. Below decks, each reserve vessel was made airtight. An artificial lung was installed which pulled the damp air from the ship, passed it over the "moth ball"—silica gel, a crystalline substance which removed most of the moisture—and pumped dehumidified air into the ship's interior spaces. A mixture called thin film was applied to nonpainted surfaces.

Good buy: For moth balling the 2,036 vessels in the reserve fleet, and for maintaining it between 1946 and 1951 while it lay inactive, the taxpayers shelled out $213,000,000. It was money well spent. The original cost of these vessels was $12,863,500,000. To replace them today would have cost $26,994,500,000. In fact, maintenance cost 60 cents per $1,000 of material—one-half percent of the naval budget—"the cheapest insurance policy in history," the Navy boasts.

When the Korean war exploded on the world last June 25, the mothball fleet was ready. Vice Adm. Oscar Charles Badger, who holds the dual command of the Atlantic Reserve Fleet and the eastern sea frontier (covering 40 States and the coastline from Maine to Texas), was ordered to begin reactivating his ships.

As the wheels went into motion, ships to be demothballed were designated. In days, new skippers, other officers, the chiefs, petty officers, and seamen were reporting for duty. Dehumidifiers were removed, ventilating systems put into operation; quarters for officers and men were opened up. So well had the mothballs worked that in many cases even mattresses were ready for immediate use.

A "history ticket" had been attached to every piece of equipment, describing exactly what it required before it could be put into use again. In 30 days' time per unit—"activation time is 30 days, whether it's an LST or a carrier like the Tarawa," says Admiral Badger—the ships began coming to life again.

Fast action: Returning ships to service at a steady clip of about 2 a day, the Navy could point last week to 381 reactivations since Korea: 13 aircraft carriers, 2 battleships (the U. S. S. New Jersey and the U. S. S. Wisconsin), 2 heavy cruisers, 77 destroyers, and destroyer escorts, 13 submarines, 31 minesweepers, 7 patrol vessels, 236 amphibious, and auxiliary types.

So efficiently did the job proceed that many of the landing craft used at Inchon by the Marines had come from a mothball base in Texas. In the case of noncombat vessels—transports, tenders, and so forth very little was needed to put them in shape. Some aircraft carriers needed deck bracing to accommodate heavier planes and jets.

"Most of these ships require only minor modifications to bring them up to date," says Admiral Badger, "and in general these involve electronics."

Back to action: The cost for this mammoth job will total $120,000,000—less than 2.5 percent of the replacement cost. The individual cost per ship depends on its size and on its state of repair at the time of mothballing.

The cost of improving demothballed ships varies greatly. An Essex-class carrier the most obsolescent of all ships being reactivated, requires almost as much work as building a new ship and costs almost half what a new carrier would. The battleship New Jersey, on the other hand, came out in 37,000 man-days, where it took 2,500,000 man-days to build. This speed has permitted the Navy to increase its fleet strength by over 75 percent in a few months.

Because the United States has built only one submarine, the K–1 "killer," since the last war, all the new strength in these critical, long-range eyes and ears of the Atlantic Fleet must come from the mothball fleet at New London, Conn. There, huddled in gray, tent-caterpillar-like clusters on the Thames River, some forty-odd sealed submarines have been returning to service.

At the rate of one a month, Rear Adm. S. S. Murray, commander of the Atlantic Submarine Fleet, has stepped aboard the revitalized subs to welcome them back to duty. When, in the 12-above-zero weather last February, the U. S. S. Bang's long-dormant engines were started up, they caught the first time.

Energy in person: When the time came to demothball the phantom fleet, the job fell to Admiral Badger, who had been responsible for maintaining the ships and keeping a scrupulous guard against invading rust and decomposition. Energetic and incisive, Badger in appearance belies his 60 years.

In the last 11 years of peace, war, and cold war, Badger has taken exactly 16 days of leave. He works long hours and keeps two staffs—one for the Atlantic Reserve Fleet, the other for the eastern-sea frontier—going constantly. Pacing both staffs, he is apt to explode over anyone who falls behind.

Admiral Badger believes the moth-ball fleet to be one of the greatest contributions to the security of the country that the Navy has ever made. In any future war, he feels, the country will face critical material shortages. The key to victory will be in what he calls the "true economy," the economy not of dollars but of labor and materials.

Badger realizes that comparisons between the $200,000,000 it would cost to replace the U. S. S. New Jersey and the $200,000 it cost to reactivate it emphasizes dramatically the work he has been doing. But the real worth of the moth-ball fleet, he insists, is in conservation. The ships he has been caretaking represent 7,500,000 man-years in terms of labor. The saving in steel, now in critical supply, is also astronomical—21,864 tons of carbon steel and 4,033 of alloy steel for an Essex carrier alone.

(In addition to these savings, other metals in short supply are liberated for other defense purposes. These are, according to Rear Adm. Homer N. Wallin, Chief of the Bureau of Ships, aluminum, nickel, lead, zinc, and copper. Wallin points out, too, that since Korea it would have been impossible to build up from scratch the reinforcements contributed by the moth-ball fleet even if the Nation's entire productive capacity had been put to the task.)

Problem solver: Badger notes that hundreds of plants, untold tons of steel, vitally needed radar equipment, and armies of workers would have been diverted from other production had the moth-balling process failed.

Although the job of reinforcing and supplying the fleet may be difficult, Admiral Badger is accustomed to tough assignments. He had plenty of them during the war. In 1942, he was largely responsible for the Navy's antisubmarine campaign at the height of the U-boat attacks on the convoy lanes. Later, as director of the logistic plans division of the Navy, he helped solve the complex supply problems of the Navy's two-ocean offensive. As the last war drew to a close, he was back in actual combat commanding the heavy striking forces of the Third Fleet.

In 1944, when every one of his bases and drydocks was working around the clock to get the fleet ready for the Palau campaign, the U. S. S. Tennessee and the U. S. S. California rammed each other in mid-Pacific.

Stateside shipyards estimated that it would take 4 months to repair the vessels. With characteristic energy, Badger flew in welders, ship fitters, and mechanics from all over the Pacific area. In 3 weeks, the two ships were back in operation.

Never say No: Today, Admiral Badger runs the vast eastern sea frontier and the Atlantic Reserve Fleet with the drive and precision of a fighting commander afloat. "We have a great naval base here that can do any damn thing," he says, pointing to the map which delimits the 2,000,000 square miles of his command. "The personnel is wonderful. There's just one thing I insist on. When the fleet at sea wants something, no one says 'No.'"

Last week, as the hibernating ships continued to be ripped out of cocoons in Philadelphia, Portsmouth, Charleston, Green Cove Springs, and New London, Admiral Badger's command was living up to his word. From Maine to Texas, no one was saying "No."

Chelsea Housing Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following address which I delivered at the dedication of the Chelsea housing project, Chelsea, Mass., on Saturday, April 28, 1951:

After a day's work, it is so good to go home. When all is said and done, that is what we live for.

The privacy, comfort, and conveniences of a home that is the center of family life—this is the greatest of all incentives.

When a young man and a young woman start going together it is not long before they are planning to marry and set up housekeeping and create a family of their own.

Not in a dark, unsanitary and broken down tenement, but in a clean, bright housing unit constructed to meet the needs of modern life and designed to please and encourage those who dwell within it.

There are a few landlords and tenants who seem to think that any shelter will do as long as it keeps out the rain and the cold. They forget that houses grow old just as people do. If the house is not cared for, it will suffer from the wear and tear of living and become a burden to its occupants. An aging house that is allowed to fall into disrepair and is not renovated over the years to keep pace with the rising standard of living will degenerate into a fire trap and become a menace to health. And the woman who has to live in it most of the day knows better than anyone else that the roof and the walls and the floors do not make a house. It must be constructed in such a way as to make her housekeeping easy so that her husband and children will be glad to come home to the sanctuary that shows the results of her loving care. In that she finds one of her real fulfillments.

In the world of today where many confused and tired people have surrendered their initiative to an all-powerful state, the United States remains as the one, sure rallying point for those who believe that men can adjust their differences. We are lucky to live in a society that is flexible enough to overcome any social or economic problem without sacrificing human rights.

Housing is one of these problems.

It was a problem that was ignored during the first third of this century.

As towns and cities grew the dwellings in the center of communities began to decay. Private owners failed to reinvest part of their profits to maintain these properties. In some cases they were getting a diminishing income in relation to raising taxes. Broken-down tenements became the breeding place of disease and crime and social tensions.

It was too late then for private builders or realtors to do anything about it. We could not expect them to exhaust their money in tearing down old rental units and erecting new ones for the low-income groups that could not pay the rents necessary to cover such an investment.

We had neglected the spreading slums to such an extent that small and private groups could not cope with the menace. Only the Government was big enough to tackle it. Which it is doing, proving that under our system we can devise new techniques to overcome our difficulties without concentrating too much power in the Federal Government.

This local project is proof of that fact.

The city of Chelsea, like any other American city, did not have the financial means to undertake such a responsibility in addition to its other burdens. Through the medium of the State government, which, in turn, receives grants-in-aid from Washington, there was engineered a team-work approach to the problem. The blueprint has become a reality. The costs of building and maintaining this development are well in hand. And the people of Chelsea, through their own housing authority, retain control of it in a wholesome and democratic manner.

Private enterprise, aided by local, State, and National agencies, is reducing the overall housing deficit. When we look back to the shocking conditions of a few years ago, we may be proud of the progress that we have made. Recalling those conditions which still prevail, especially in the larger cities, we should redouble our efforts until all slums are torn down and in their place are built the dwellings that are fit for Americans. After that, we must adopt a long-range plan of maintenance and replacement to prevent the slums from ever befouling our cities again.

In 1933 the country was faced not only with the problem of stopping wholesale foreclosures on homes and farms but with a great volume of unemployment. The construction industry almost came to a standstill because so many people either had no income or very little income. In 1933 total dwelling units under construction declined to a level as low as 10 percent of the peak year, which was 1925. The population was increasing, but we were falling far behind in providing adequate shelter for the growing number of families.

By 1940 the census revealed that out of 37,000,000 dwelling units in the United States 16,000,000 required extensive rehabilitation or outright replacement. Even though more houses were built and necessary repairs completed since then, the situation is still not as good as it should be. The 1949 Senate Banking and Currency Committee computed the United States housing need, and concluded that we would have to produce between sixteen and one-half and seventeen and one-half million dwelling units by 1960 in order to keep up with the demand.

At the end of World War II the Nation was confronted with a very serious housing shortage. The low pulse of building activity during the 1930's, the curtailment of residential building in order to conserve critical materials that were needed for the weapons of war, and the war's impact upon the rise in marriages and new families caused a serious gap between the supply and demand of housing.

Prices of homes rose 50 to 100 percent above 1941 levels, with the greatest increases in low- and medium-priced dwellings. Those who occupied rental units were spared sharp price hikes because of the Rent Control Act, even though this worked a hardship upon some landlords. Preparatory to the homecoming of millions of veterans, the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 was passed, authorizing, among other things, the guaranty of GI loans to veterans to purchase, build, or improve homes.

Meanwhile there was increasing concern that in the attempt to meet one emergency after another—a deep depression, a great war, and an acute housing shortage—fundamental long-term considerations affecting the housing of the American people were likely to be ignored. After many hearings on the matter the Federal Housing Act was passed in 1949. It established new forms of Federal financial assistance to help cities eliminate slum and blighted areas, it extended Federal financial aid to private enterprise, and it set up a research program seeking to improve methods of construction. Inspired by this direct attack upon the problem, many States established cooperating programs to extend the gains, and Massachusetts was a leader among them.

The public agencies had to step into the breach because the failure to provide for all segments of the population has been a long-standing fault of the housing industry. They provided for some, but neglected others until the neglect overwhelmed them. The slums which exist in every city are proof that private enterprise alone cannot meet the needs of the lower-income families. Even the middle-income group is having its troubles. Nearly 70 percent of American families had incomes below $4,000 a year as of June last year. And this was the minimum needed to buy the cheapest of housing. Even adjusting for fluctuations, building costs have been rising over a long period of time. In 1948 they were 129 percent higher than in 1939, while the general cost of living for the same period had gone up only 75 percent. And all costs have gone up still more since the outbreak of war in Korea.

Under these compelling circumstances, public housing was the only answer. And what are its purposes? (1) It wants to make sure that every family can obtain the minimum requirements for decent, safe, and sanitary housing; (2) to work toward the goal where as many families as possible get better than the minimum requirements; (3) to develop the housing program as a definite contribution to a higher United States standard of living. We have the necessary physical capacity, and now we need the planning that in spite of temporary defense priorities will never lose sight of the fact that we must constantly improve housing for the middle- and lower-income groups. For this contributes to the morale and the general welfare that is basic to our national progress. And it is the duty of government—whether it be local, State, or Federal, or by the cooperation of all three—to promote that general welfare.

Public housing, even in its young record, is doing just that.

What kind of dwellings did American families escape from thanks to public housing? Let's look at those who were first liberated in 1946.

Fifty-eight percent of their former habitations were structurally a menace to health and safety.

Sixty-two percent had no inside private toilets.

Sixty-nine percent had no private bath.

Forty percent had dangerous or inadequate cooking facilities.

Sixty-four percent had dangerous or inadequate heating.

Forty-nine percent had inadequate daylight or ventilation.

Furthermore each former dwelling failed to meet at least four of the nine minimum standards for passable housing.

Where these good people would be living, if they had not been rescued by a government determined to eliminate the slums, is not hard to imagine.

They would be back in the substandard dwellings that would be 5 years older and a greater danger to their health and their safety. And their sons, many of whom are now fighting for all of us in Korea, would not have the fine faith and courage that is animating them today.

They know that their Government will not let them down in those areas where private enterprise cannot do the job.

Which brings us to that quality of balance wherein a free society demonstrates its genius in meeting and solving hard problems.

We must provide every freedom and every opportunity for private enterprise to build enough safe, healthy, and efficient living quarters for all Americans. The postwar building boom is catching up with the housing demands of most people.

But when it fails to produce for those folks who do not make enough money to buy or rent privately constructed dwellings then the people through their government must get on with the job.

You and your fellow citizens, both in this city and in the larger community of our Nation, are working out the balance between free enterprise and government that will protect our society from the mistakes of the past and the extremes that may threaten us in the future.

May I congratulate your city fathers and your representatives in the State government for the foresight and sound leadership responsible for this 128-apartment unit which is a credit to your city.

The Chelsea housing project that we dedicate at these exercises is clear evidence that we as a people are continuing our progress.

How Hard It Must Be for the Military Man To Forego His Own Strategical Dispositions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the current issue of the national Catholic weekly review, America, dated April 28, 1951, contains a very timely reprint of a portion of an address by His Eminence the late Cardinal John Henry Newman nearly a hundred years ago on the supremacy of civilian authority over the military:

THE SOLDIER AND THE STATESMEN

All professions have their dangers, all general truths have their fallacies, all spheres of action have their limits, and are liable to improper extension or alteration. Every professional man has rightly a zeal for his profession, and he would not do his duty toward it without that zeal. And that zeal soon becomes exclusive, or rather necessarily involves a sort of exclusiveness. A zealous professional man soon comes to think that his profession is all in all, and that the world would not go on without it.

We have heard, for instance, a great deal lately in regard to the war in India, of political views suggesting one plan of campaign, and military views suggesting another. How hard it must be for the military man to forego his own strategical dispositions, not on the ground that they are not the best—not that they are not acknowledged by those who nevertheless put them aside to be the best of the object of military success—but because military success is not the highest of objects, and the ends of ends—because it is not the sovereign science, but must ever be subordinate to political considerations or maxims of government, which is a higher science with higher objects—and that, therefore, his sure success on the field must be relinquished because the interests of the council and the cabinet require the sacrifice, that the war must yield to the statesman's craft, the commander in chief to the governor-general.

The Mysteries of the Van Vliet Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

THE MYSTERIES OF THE VAN VLIET REPORT—A CASE HISTORY

(By Julius Epstein)

On July 3 and 4, 1949, the New York Herald Tribune published two articles by this author on the massacre of Katyn. Katyn is a little hamlet, west of Smolensk, U. S. S. R., where more than 4,000 Polish officers, prisoners of war on Soviet soil, were killed during World War II.

The two articles analyzed the massacre and gave a brief summary of all the circumstantial evidence available at that time. The evidence produced, clearly points to the Soviets as the perpetrators of the crime.

Among the letters the author received was one from Mr. Harry Thomas Schultz of Hanover, N. H. Mr. Schultz' letter contained the following two paragraphs:

"I am curious about one omission in your excellent discussion of the subject. You make no mention of the American and British officers who were flown from prison camps by the Germans to the scene of the killing in April or early May of 1943.

"I am sorry to be vague about dates and names, but we all resisted German pressure so strongly at the time that I have no records of the incident and must depend upon my memory. In April 1943, I was held at Oflag IX A/Z, Rothenburg-on-Fulda, when two Americans, Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet and Captain Stewart, and at least one British officer, Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson, R. A. M. C., were taken to Katyn. After their return they refused to answer any questions from any one for fear of playing into the hands of the Germans, but they might now have some valuable information to give."

Mr. Schultz' mention of Van Vliet's name turned out to be an invaluable help in the search for truth about Katyn. Immediately, a thorough search was launched to locate Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. At last the American committee for the investigation of the Katyn Massacre, Inc. (which was formed under the chairmanship of Arthur Bliss Lane, former Ambassador to Poland, as a result of the two articles in the New York Herald Tribune) succeeded in locating Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. A letter was sent to Van Vliet. He answered briefly, saying that he was in no position to give any information about his visit to Katyn in 1943. It was evident that Van Vliet acted under instructions from the Pentagon. Therefore, the Katyn committee asked one of its friends in Congress, Representative GEORGE A. DONDERO, of Michigan, to get in touch with the Pentagon. DONDERO complied with the committee's request. On October 6, 1949, he wrote the following letter to the Director of Military Intelligence:

"Gentlemen: Some time ago I inserted an article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD regarding the murder of several thousand Polish officers, probably by the Russians.

"It has recently come to my attention that certain British and American officers were taken to the scene of the execution of these men while such officers were prisoners of the Germans.

"It has been rumored that at least two of the American officers were Lt. Col. John Van Vliet, Jr., now stationed at Fort Lewis, Wash., and a captain Stewart, otherwise unidentified.

"It is quite possible that a committee will be formed to investigate the matter officially (the committee which had already been in existence at that time was officially incorporated on November 15, 1949.—J. E.) and the purpose of this letter is to inquire whether or not the above-named officers have made a report on this matter and, if so, whether such report is available. If so, I would be very much pleased to receive a copy of the same."

It was not before October 19, that the Pentagon answered. On that day Maj. Gen. S. LeRoy Irwin, Director of Intelligence, United States Army, and a member of the General Staff, wrote the following letter:

"DEAR MR. DONDERO: Reference is made to your letter of October 6, 1949, in which you request information on a report of the Katyn massacre. The Intelligence Division has recently acquired a report on this subject, which was partially based on Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's observations of the German exhumation of the Polish graves at Katyn in 1943. The report is classified and therefore cannot be released at this time.

"In the event this report is declassified, it will be a pleasure to furnish you a copy.

"Sincerely yours,

"S. LEROY IRWIN,
"Major General, GSC, Director of Intelligence."

Representative DONDERO answered on October 31. He wrote General Irwin: "For the life of me I cannot conceive why Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's report on the Katyn affair should be classified." He asked the Pentagon for an explanation of the reasons that impelled the Department to classify the report, 6 years after the event.

On November 8, 1949, General Irwin answered DONDERO's letter. He wrote that "the report contains certain highly sensitive information the premature disclosure of which would be extremely unwise in view of the current international situation. The Department of the Army believes it inadvisable to release the report."

This rather evasive and, as we shall see later, untrue and silly answer caused the indefatigable DONDERO to write to the Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson.

On January 9, 1950, DONDERO wrote to Johnson. The Secretary responded on January 18. I quote from his letter:

"Of the two documents you mention, the only one which we have in the Department of Defense is a report, prepared in the Army General Staff. This report is an accumulation of information from various sources and, although its preparation has been commonly attributed to Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet, he collaborated in its preparation only to the extent of reviewing its contents.

"It is my understanding that you have previously requested the Army to release this report to you and you were informed that since it contained highly sensitive information, its release by the Army was considered unwise. However, shortly before I received your letter, Secretary of the Army Gray raised with me the question of its release. No decision has been reached as yet concerning this matter but I hope to be able to give a definite answer to your request at an early date.

"With kindest personal regards,

"Sincerely yours,

"LOUIS JOHNSON."

From this moment on, it took the Defense Department exactly 8 months to release the Van Vliet report together with a memorandum to the press which reveals that everything General Irwin and Louis Johnson have written was absolutely untrue and that a hardly imaginable confusion and know-nothing about the well-established basic facts about Katyn existed—and probably still exists—in the Pentagon. The documents will tell the whole story.

The Department of Defense released a whole dossier on September 18, 1950. The dossier was composed of a memorandum to the press, the proper report written by Van Vliet, and some letters pertaining to the report as well as of a memorandum by Stanley S. B. Gilder, captain, EAMC.

It is important to notice that on September 18, 1950, neither Louis Johnson nor General Irwin were in office in their respective positions as Secretary of Defense and Director of Military Intelligence, United States Army.

The Van Vliet report itself is of utmost importance in various respects. First of all, because Van Vliet bluntly states: "I believe that the Russians did it. The rest of the group that visited the site stated to me that they believed that the Russians did it." And he adds: "Captain, now Major, Donald Stewart, EA, can be asked to verify this. I don't know his present address. He is Regular Army."

Second, with the release of this report, our Government indicates for the first time that it does not any longer believe in Stalin's lies about the German guilt. This is of tremendous importance in view of the fact that the Government, through its Office of War Information, disseminated for years Stalin's lies about Katyn, and our present Voice of America has always rejected to tell the world the truth about Katyn. This persistence in not telling the truth about Katyn went so far that the Voice even forced Count Joseph Czapski, one of the few survivors of the Russian massacre of Polish officers, to omit any mention of the word and the facts of Katyn when he was invited to broadcast in Polish to his Polish brethren.

It is not the purpose of this article to deal with the special merits of Van Vliet's report, but to reveal the mystery and confusion which surrounds this document as far as the Defense Department is concerned.

As the memorandum to the press reveals, the Van Vliet report released on September 18, 1950, is not at all the Van Vliet report as it was written on May 22, 1945. This original report mysteriously disappeared, notwithstanding the fact that it was classified "top secret" and locked up in a safe in the Pentagon. The report now released is a second one, written exactly 5 years after the first one was dictated in General Bissell's Pentagon office.

This second Van Vliet report, addressed to Maj. Gen. F. L. Parks, Chief of Information, United States of America, starts with the following two paragraphs:

"1. Pursuant to your letter of 26 April, 1950, I am personally typing this report of my recollections concerning the Katyn case. I am retaining one carbon copy for my personal file.

"2. Since 5 years have elapsed since I made the first report to Major General Bissell, this report will have to omit some details such as names which I have forgotten. In order to assist in locating my original report here are the circumstances under which it was made:

"On 22 May, 1945, General Bissell discussed the case with me alone in his private office in the Pentagon for about 20 minutes. He decided that it was important and directed his civilian female assistant (secretary? stenographer?) to go with me to a closed room across the hall and take dictation. I dictated my report, she typed it up and we added the photographs as inclosures. The general read the finished report, directed that it be marked "Top Secret" and filed. He then dictated the letter directing me to silence, and had me sign a copy of it in his presence. He explained the importance of my remaining silent, gave me my copy of the letter and thanked me."

PENTAGON VERSION

The Memorandum to the Press, not written by Van Vliet but by an official in the Pentagon, states the following:

"A memorandum written by an American officer concerning a visit which he made to the scene of a World War II atrocity involving the massacre of thousands of Polish Army officers in Katyn Forest, near Smolensk, in western Russia, has been declassified by the Department of the Army and is herewith made available for public dissemination.

"Decision to declassify the memorandum was made after numerous congressional and press inquiries as to its availability were directed to the Department of the Army and the Department of Defense.

"The memorandum was written by Lt. Col. John H. Van Vliet, Jr., who, while a prisoner of war of the Germans during World War II, was taken to Katyn by his captors and shown the corpses and graves at the site of the massacre.

"Shortly after he was liberated in 1945 Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet dictated a memorandum on this incident for the Department of the Army. Inquiries concerning this memorandum, which was classified, were made to the Department starting in the late months of 1949 and continuing through last week. In answering the first queries, the Department of the Army mistakenly indicated that it was in possession of a report which had been based in part on the observation of Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. Such was not the case, this fact being discovered after the original requests had been answered.

"When this error was discovered, a search was instituted for the Van Vliet memorandum, so that consideration could be given to the question of whether it could be declassified and released to inquirers.

"When it became apparent that the memorandum could not be found immediately, the Chief of Information of the Department of the Army wrote to Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet, on April 26, 1950, requesting him to submit a second memorandum on his visit to the Katyn graves. Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet submitted a detailed second memorandum on the same subject dated May 11, 1950, which has now been declassified and is being released.

"Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet is at present on duty in the Far East Command.

"The Secretary of the Army, after having had a thorough search made for the original memorandum by the Department counselor, has directed the Inspector General to continue the search and to report any findings of the investigation to him.

"Should the original report be found it, too, will be released.

"The search for the original memorandum up to now has disclosed that on August 21, 1945, Maj. Gen. Clayton Bissell, then Assistant Chief of Staff, G–2, of the War Department, wrote the following letter to Mr. Frederick B. Lyon, then Acting Director of the Office of Controls of the Department of State.

"'DEAR MR. LYON: Transmitted for the information and file of the State Department is Report on Katyn, by Stanley S. B. Gilder, captain, EAMC, British medical officer. This report supplements statement of Lt. Col. John H. Van Vliet, Jr., forwarded to General Holmes, May 25, 1945, and generally substantiates all material facts in Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's report.

"'Sincerely,

"'CLAYTON BISSELL,

"'Major General, GSC,

"'Assistant Chief of Staff, G–2.

"('One enclosure: Report on Katyn by Stanley S. B. Gilder, captain, EAMC.')

"The General Holmes referred to in this letter is Brig. Gen. Julius C. Holmes, who at that time was an Assistant Secretary at the Department of State and who is presently the Minister attached to the United States Embassy in London.

"The Department of State has no record of having received the memorandum of Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet on May 25, 1945, and the Department of the Army has so far found no receipt for it and no covering letter of transmittal. The only letter sent on May 25, 1945, from General Bissell to General Holmes was on another phase of this subject, and it contains no reference to transmitting the Van Vliet memorandum. General Holmes has been reached with reference to the matter and does not recall ever having seen Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's memorandum, though General Bissell remembers having sent it to him.

"Maj. Donald B. Stewart, who is mentioned in Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's memorandum, and who was the other United States Army officer present on the visit to Katyn in 1943, concurs generally with Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. Major Stewart is now stationed at St. Mary's University, San Antonio, Tex., in connection with ROTC training.

"The memorandum of Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet and enclosures thereto follow, together with the memorandum of Captain Gilder, British medical officer, which was enclosed in the letter of August 21, 1945, from General Bissell to Mr. Lyon and the distribution of which the British have authorized following their declassification of the paper."

THE ESTABLISHED FACTS

Therefore, the following facts are well established beyond the shadow of any doubt. (They all follow from the Government's own press release):

1. That Van Vliet dictated his report on May 22, 1945, in General Bissell's office in the Pentagon.

2. Van Vliet dictated the report to a female assistant to General Bissell.

3. There was obviously not a single carbon copy or photostat of the report made.

4. The report was immediately marked "top secret" by General Bissell.

5. The report was filed as a "top secret" document and locked up in a safe.

6. The report was forwarded on May 25, 1945, to General Holmes, Assistant Secretary in the Department of State.

7. The Department of State has no record of having received the report.

8. The Department of Defense has not found any receipt from the State Department nor any copy of a letter of transmittal.

9. The report disappeared completely and mysteriously.

10. The report was not in the possession of General Irwin, Director of Military Intelligence, when he wrote on October 19, 1949, to Representative DONDERO that his department had it.

11. The report was not in possession of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, nor has he ever seen it on January 18, 1950, when he wrote to DONDERO that the Department had a report reviewed by Van Vliet.

But this list of horrifying facts does not at all exhaust the list of mystifying confusions in the Pentagon. When they became known through the Government's own press release, Representative DONDERO was shocked and wrote to the new Secretary of Defense, General Marshall. General Marshall referred DONDERO's letter to Mr. F. Shackelford, Department counselor, who answered DONDERO in a letter of October 6, 1950. In view of the importance of this letter which reveals another series of facts, characterizing the mess in the Army's intelligence department, Mr. Shackelford's letter is produced in full:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., October 6, 1950.

Hon. GEORGE A. DONDERO,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DONDERO: Secretary of Defense Marshall, as you know from his acknowledgment of October 5, 1950, to your letter of September 28, 1950, has referred to our attention the matter you raised concerning Lt. Col. John H. Van Vliet, Jr.'s first memorandum on the Katyn massacre.

Gen. S. LeRoy Irwin in his reply on October 19, 1949, to your letter of October 6, 1949, referred to a Katyn massacre "report * * * which was partially based on Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's observations." In making this statement he erroneously thought that a study entitled "Supplementary Report on Facts and Documents Concerning the Katyn Massacre" was based in part on information supplied by Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. This was not so. Instead the supplementary report was an independent and detailed study made by a Polish committee which at no time has consulted or conferred with Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. This study, dated October 1947, supplemented an earlier more extensive report prepared by the same committee entitled "Facts and Documents Concerning Polish Prisoners of War Captured by the U. S. S. R. During the 1939 Campaign," dated February 1946.

The mistake in concluding that the supplementary report was in any way based upon Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's observations was not discovered until some time after General Irwin's letter to you of October 19, 1949. In the course of carefully examining the supplementary report, which was not clearly labeled as to its origin, for the purpose of determining whether or not to disseminate it, it became apparent that it was a report of a Polish committee prepared entirely independently of any observations of Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet. Upon this discovery the files of both the Army and the State Departments were exhaustively searched for Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet's memorandum dictated on May 22, 1945. When it could not be found the Army's Chief of Information asked Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet to prepare another report. The lieutenant colonel's eight-page memorandum dated May 11, 1950, was declassified and distributed along with a press memorandum of the Department of Defense on September 18, 1950. We furnished you with a copy of that memorandum, together with enclosures, on that date, and for your convenience are enclosing an additional copy with this letter.

The two very detailed reports entitled "Facts and Documents Concerning Polish Prisoners of War Captured by the U. S. S. R. During the 1939 Campaign" and a "Supplementary Report on Facts and Documents Concerning the Katyn Massacre" were marked "For private circulation only" and have not been publicly distributed.

Sincerely yours,

F. SHACKELFORD,
Department Counselor.

(One enclosure. Press release of September 18, 1950.)

ADDITIONAL FACTS AND A FEW QUESTIONS

From this letter the following additional facts evolve:

12. Gen. LeRoy Irwin mistook the Supplementary Report on Facts and Documents Concerning the Katyn Massacre with the Van Vliet report.

13. General Irwin believed that this supplementary report was made by a Polish committee.

14. General Irwin, Director of Intelligence of the United States Army, believed that another study, entitled "Facts and Documents Concerning Polish Prisoners of War Captured by the U. S. S. R. During the 1939 Campaign" and dated February 1946, was prepared by the same committee to which he ascribed the supplementary report.

15. General Irwin did not know that both documents were released not by a Polish committee but by the Polish Government in Exile (London) in 1946.

16. General Irwin did not know that both documents, prepared by the London Poles, represent the basic material on Katyn and that they were edited by Professor Heitzman, an eminent Polish scholar and the greatest living authority on Katyn, now living in this country.

17. General Irwin did not know that both documents have been used again and again by many writers who wrote on Katyn and that therefore it was utmost folly to classify them as "top secret" as was done according to Irwin's letters to Dondero.

These are the facts.

The following questions arise:

1. Who was the "female assistant" to General Bissell who took dictation from Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet on May 22, 1945?

2. Why was not a single carbon copy or photostatic copy made of the report?

3. Who locked up the report marked, "top secret"?

4. Who forwarded it to General Holmes, Assistant Secretary of State in the Department of State? By what means?

5. Why did the forwarder not ask the State Department for a receipt?

6. Where is a copy of the letter of transmittal, or was there no letter of transmittal? If not why?

7. How is it possible that the Department of Defense has the memoranda on Katyn, released by the Polish Government in Exile in London, and does not know what they are? How did they get those documents, well known to many hundreds if not thousands of writers, journalists, and scholars all over the world, without ever knowing who sent them to the Intelligence Department?

8. How did it come about that the Military Intelligence Department obviously classified those reports from the London Poles already in 1946 as "top secret," while it is a fact, that everybody interested in them could obtain them from the London Poles?

9. Who is responsible for this mess in the Department of Defense as revealed by the mysterious disappearance of the original Van Vliet report and the unbelievable confusion concerning the memoranda issued by the Polish Government in Exile?

10. What is our Military Intelligence, financed with millions of dollars from the taxpayers' pockets worth, when such a situation can prevail?

11. Who got fired?

These are some of the questions which must be answered.

To get the answers, a congressional investigation should start immediately. The Senate Armed Services Committee, under its new chairman, RICHARD B. RUSSELL, of Georgia, should do the job—and a thorough one.

Anglo-American Amity Faces Test

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Bill Cunningham from the Boston Sunday Herald of April 29, 1951:

ANGLO-AMERICAN AMITY FACES TEST
(By Bill Cunningham)

Careless writing and radio news handling recently made it appear that Winston Churchill had endorsed the MacArthur side of the Truman-MacArthur controversy. That doesn't chance to be the fact, and in view of what Britain's great war leader really was driving at; his words need to be examined and his intent understood.

His flattering reference to General MacArthur, the first made in public by any Briton, was incidental to one of his characteristic slaps at the British Labor Government. His chief concern wasn't the fate of MacArthur, but the deterioration of Anglo-American relations, which he blamed on the British party in power.

This occasion was a brief 8-minute address he delivered at a meeting of the Primrose League in Albert Hall. So far as taking sides in the MacArthur controversy is concerned, Mr. Churchill explained that's exactly what he doesn't want to do. Scheduled for some while now to deliver an address at the University of Pennsylvania a week from Tuesday, the former British Prime Minister announced he was canceling the address for two reasons. The first is because of the current crisis in the affairs of the British Labor Government, which may give the Churchill-led Conservatives their long, eagerly awaited chance to bring it down.

The other reason, he said, is because he feels he "should not become involved in the MacArthur controversy on United States soil." His main target in the short address was "the mismanagement and incompetence" of Prime Minister Attlee's Labor government, and he said one of the worst effects has been the loss of intimate contacts between Mr. Attlee and President Truman.

REFERENCE TO GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

From that, he went on to say: "A wave of irritation is passing across the United States, and the isolationist forces there are glad to turn it upon Great Britain." Then came the reference to General MacArthur.

"The reproaches," he said, "against General MacArthur—that great soldier and great statesman, as his settlement of the difficulties with Japan after the war have proved—indulged in by Mr. Shinwell (British Minister of Defense) and even so staid a Minister as Mr. Chyter Ede (Deputy Prime Minister) enable those who do not like us in the United States to suggest that His Majesty's Government have had something to do with the General MacArthur dismissal.

"I cannot believe there is the slightest truth in this. Mr. Truman is not only the President of the United States, he is also the Commander in Chief, and no one outside the great Republic, now bearing nineteen-twentieths of the whole weight of the war in Korea, has the slightest right to interfere between him and his officers."

This really could be interpreted as an endorsement of President Truman. Calling General MacArthur "that great soldier" is only acknowledging history, and the former British Prime Minister qualified his use of "great statesman" by citing the resurrection of Japan as his principal proof.

More interesting than his estimation of MacArthur is his statement that the United States is carrying nineteen-twentieths of the Korean burden and therefore no outsider has any business trying to pass judgment on what the United States Commander in Chief does to any of his officers. This seems to be another way of saying the Korean action is strictly an American affair, in fact if not in terminology, and that whatever the United States wants to do about it is the United States exclusive business.

That's probably the bald facts of the case, too; but we over here have been told and have been trying to believe that it was and is United Nations business.

If that's not the case, why fire MacArthur? What he wanted to do was fight it out with no holds barred and get it over with. So far as the record goes he was fired because the other member nations were afraid to, and because our own administration agreed with them. Now, in the words of Mr. Churchill, at least, we're told it's really our business and nobody else's.

NO WAVE OF IRRITATION IN UNITED STATES

His main point, however, is the wave of irritation passing across the United States and being turned upon Great Britain by the isolationist forces there. It's to be doubted very much that that's a fair statement of the facts. There's no wave of irritation being turned by any isolationists. There is blank inability of the average American to understand the British position, if Britain has a position.

Britain endorsed the general United Nations program of trying to oppose the spread of communism wherever it moved, yet Britain was the first to extend formal recognition to the Red Chinese, and while British soldiers are dying beside ours in Korea, the British Government has openly sponsored the seating of the Chinese Reds in the United Nations, and the cession to them of the island of Formosa.

While officially denouncing Russia, Britain has continued to do business with Russia, and while actually fighting the Red Chinese, a whopping business in rubber, tungsten, and other strategic materials is being done through the British port of Hong Kong with the Red Chinese, and probably Russia herself. This is disguised and denied in various ways, but all one needs do to get the real information is to talk with returning missionaries, businessmen, etc., who have been thrown out of Red China by way of Hong Kong.

One said to me the other day, "Business in Hong Kong and Singapore has never been so booming. Even the coolies now wear leather shoes." I gathered that latter was the ultimate in general prosperity.

Added in with all this has been the British abuse of MacArthur as a war leader, who was was leading too hard. This is no wave of irritation. It's simply a wonder that's been growing for months—wonder as to where the British stand what they're trying to do, whether they're with us or against us, and what kind of people they can be when they freely commit their sons to die while doing business with the enemy those sons are supposed to be, and are, fighting.

For all this, there are no open evidences of strong and general anti-British feeling here. On the contrary, from a strong evidence coming the other way, the anti-American feeling in Britain seems to be at its highest, at least since the mid-twenties when the British were disavowing their first World War loans. Anti-Americanism has been so general in Britain that some of the British themselves have now undertaken to fight it. That even goes for some of the British newspapers.

If there isn't strong anti-American feeling in the country, how else are we to account for a specimen such as this? It's a copy of the Sunday Mail of April 15, featuring a, for British papers, long article entitled "Stop Envying America." This was written by a professor of political science at Peterhouse, Cambridge, named Denis William Brogan, and since the gentleman studied at Harvard sometime during his career, he apparently has set up as an authority upon America. At least the blurb says "he has published a number of books on America."

TIME SOME HONESTY WAS INTRODUCED

But one of the most interesting things about the article is what amounts to an editorial set above it in heavy type. Officially this is an ad, set five columns wide above the piece to call the reader's attention to it, but behold its content. Its heavy headline says, "It's Time We Had Some Honesty."

Then it proceeds, "It is time some honesty was introduced into our attitude to the Americans. It is time we realize there are only two powers in the world nowadays capable of taking independent action. One is Russia, the other is America.

"To this new and humiliating thought, many British people have failed to make any proper adjustment. They detest Russia, but they are only reluctantly enthusiastic about America. There may be reasons for the reluctance, but, with some people, the reason is no more than an old-fashioned confusion of envy and malice.

"The confusion can only become worse if it is not brought out into the open. On their side, the Americans are weighing up our worth in plenty of penetrating argument, some of it of the chip-on-the-shoulder variety. It is time we had some argument on our own side of the Atlantic. The writer of the article below is a man who has spent the best part of his lifetime studying America and the American people. He provides a starting point for some candid thought."

That last seems to be a fair enough statement. Professor Brogan begins by saying it's obvious, since the recent British budget message, that Britons "are going to be forced to give up some of our hard-earned gains of the past 5 years." They'll be lucky, he says, if they can keep from going backwards economically "and this suspension of progress is due to a world situation that is not of our making."

Other than Russia, he says, the only power now capable of independent action is the United States, and while, he says, it is easy to say, "A plague on both your houses," in practice that means a plague on the American house. If the British want a whipping boy, he says, America is far more available than distant and currently little known Russia.

Of America, he says, they know a great deal because "no people was ever less adept at keeping a secret, nor had more passion for washing dirty linen in public and so providing 'neutralists' with the opportunity of saying it is six of one and half a dozen of the other."

If the British want a scapegoat, he says, America is a natural.

MORE PERMANENT CAUSE OF RESENTMENT

But, says he, there is another and more permanent cause of resentment. He boils this down to the fact that we are richer. It is possible, and perhaps probable, that we can stand the cost of rearmament without lowering our standard of living, whereas the British cannot, "and we naturally resent that."

But resentment, he says, is not argument and it is not a policy. It is not an argument, he says, "to think that America owes us money or goods because 'we fought for her' while she was neutral. We didn't. We fought for ourselves."

While it is true, he says, that they fought for a world in which America would be safer, "if that entitles us to send in a bill to the United States of America, what about the bill to Sweden, Switzerland, Portugal, and Ireland?"

"The money," he says, "the Americans are spending on armaments, nylons, cars, and chewing gum, even on 2-pound steaks, is their money. They earned it and they have been extremely generous spenders of it. But envy is a very human emotion and some envy must be allowed for."

He says the "more respectable emotion which can feed anti-American feeling is alarm. It is not only that Americans love washing their dirty linen in public—they love talking loudly."

Then he goes into trouble loud-mouths have caused, recalling the rantings of Hitler and Mussolini. This is all by way of winding up to take a swing at General MacArthur, whom he hereby inferentially places in their class. The British are not "totally comforted," he says, "when American politicians and, still more, American generals conduct high policy by loudspeaker plus television.

"It is not merely a matter of taste," he continues. "When something has been shouted, it is hard to return to more moderate policies and more subdued voices. Too much American policy seems to be made for the headlines, to be designed to compete for public attention with Danny Kaye or the latest arrests in the world of amateur sport."

And then he really gives it to the general. "Of course," he says "of all talkers, the one who alarms us most is General MacArthur * * * Piano, viano, as they say in music, and one may assume the former professor of moral philocophy in the University of Glasgow, His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington, would say that, too, if he had a free hand.

"It's not merely a question of noise. Behind the noise there is, on the American side, the conviction that, on any showdown, the United States will have its way." Then he says he feels if there is a showdown the rulers of the Soviet Union will have every reason to regret "having, like the Messrs. Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo, underestimated the power of the United States of America."

COLD COMFORT FOR THE SURVIVORS

That, however, he says, will be cold comfort "for such of us as survive the lesson." He thinks, he says, "we are going to live for a long time in a world of cold war." The power of independent action of the British Government is limited, he says, and it will stay limited. The British economic level will remain below that of the United States. Americans will continue to talk loud.

But, for all this, he says, it will continue to be to the interests of the Soviet Union to divide the British and American peoples. There'll be ups and downs, he says, but "it would be a mistake to take too seriously any given incident, even the appointment of an American admiral to the command of the NATO fleets * * *"

Thereafter he trails off into a humorous effort concerning "the sinking of the Oxford boat under American direction," referring to the recent swamping of the Oxford shell in a race with an American coxswain in command. It doesn't seem to have much to do with the rest of his message * * * but why such a theme as this if our classic allies aren't quietly, but actively hating our guts? And what do we do now, such being the case?

Day in and day out, I read as many different newspapers as anybody and I haven't seen anything to match this in any American journal.

Mr. Churchill seems to have his antibusiness the other way round. This entire subject of great importance—who's really with us and how far—may shortly be subjected to terrific strain. Specifically, the subject of our British relations may get its hardest test.

The MacArthur interrogation before the various congressional committees are about to begin. Political maneuvering of the Pearl Harbor investigation variety may succeed in clouding the facts and blanking the record. I chance to know, however, one fact those pressing the investigation are going to try to prove.

They're going to try to prove that Britain forced the firing of MacArthur, and the eventual appeasement of the Red Chinese with the threat to wreck the North Atlantic Defense Pact unless these things were done. I don't know that it can be proved, but unless the signals are changed, that's the way the play will go. Bitter insiders claim that's what happened, and that's what Mr. Churchill was trying to scotch with his remarks in Albert Hall.

Information of that nature, seemingly, would have to be wrung from Mr. Acheson if information there is General MacArthur possibly knew nothing about it. He was simply doing his best to get a military conclusion out of a war which was handed him, as he said, without his being consulted. The sellout, if any, took place behind his back.

If that fact is established, Mr. Churchill had better hurry on over. Possibly the keenest of the Britons, he's already worried, as his recent words clearly attest. His passing praise of MacArthur may not have been too incidental either. He may figure that, in the long run, he might be doing business with the general. Mr. Churchill is probably one man who could. He and MacArthur have much in common, including the ways they've been treated.

The Tuna Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL R. KING

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, recently certain newspapers in Washington have ridiculed certain budget requests by the State Department for funds to be utilized in connection with the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission. I am sure that this action is the result of a misunderstanding concerning the purpose of this commission, which was established by convention between the United States and the Republic of Costa Rica, which on August 17, 1949, received the ratification of the United States Senate and came into force on March 3, 1950.

This convention had the unanimous support of the Pacific Coast States and all factions of the United States tuna industry, including labor, management, and vessel owners.

The convention and the establishment of the joint international commission are considered to be strong and essential steps forward in promoting the peaceful development of the tuna industry by reducing the international friction which has been occasioned from time to time during the expansion of the industry into the high seas off the coasts of nine Latin-American countries.

The United States industry not only fishes tuna in the high seas off the coasts of these several countries; it takes the live bait, which it requires for its fishing, within the territorial waters of these countries. Each vessel does this under individual permit from these countries, paying about $2,000,000 a year for bait-taking permits.

The Latin-American countries have been understandably worried lest such an intense fishery for bait in their territorial waters would exhaust resources which they do not use themselves now, but may wish to use in the future. These worries have also extended to the possibilities of exhausting the supplies of tuna off of their respective coasts.

These worries have been concretely expressed in the form of regulations, policies, and inhibitions in several countries, which are inimical to the development of the tuna industry. These regulations, policies, and inhibitions are not based on scientific research because none of these countries have trained fisheries scientists to survey the situation. Consequently, their regulatory steps have been related to local political action and not to scientific necessities.

All of this has, in the past, contributed to incidents involving United States fishermen and officials of these countries, creating irritations in the relationship between the United States and the Latin-American countries involved.

Until the signing of this convention, these irritating incidents were increasing in number as the tuna fleet and its activities expanded. Upon the signing of this convention and establishment of the Commission, the international tensions surrounding the tuna fishery relaxed markedly because the Latin-American countries believed that there was now to be established a vehicle for the determination of scientific facts upon which regulations can be based in order to prevent an exhaustion of the bait and tuna fisheries.

The function of the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission is to determine scientifically if there is, in fact overfishing, with consequent waste in either the bait fishing or the tuna fishing and to determine when and where it occurs and to recommend to the governments involved measures to be taken to prevent overfishing wherever it may occur.

Under the convention each country agreed to pay its share of the joint expenses of the Commission in proportion to each country's use of the resources involved.

The industry itself is prevented from financing the costs of the Commission's work for the following reasons:

First. The Commission is an intergovernmental undertaking. There is no legal way by which its work can be privately financed.

Second. The research must be done by perfectly impartial scientists or its results will not be accepted by the Latin-American countries. If it is done by scientists in the employ of the industry, no amount of persuasion will convince the Latin Americans that the research is being conducted impartially.

Third. The recommendations for regulations, if any are required, will have to be joined in by representatives of the countries through whose waters the resources migrate. Regulations which do not cover the entire range of the resource are useless. None of these countries are apt to adopt recommendations made solely by the United States industry, by the United States, or by one of its neighboring countries. If they do not have an equal hand in directing the research, the analyzing of its results, and the framing of any regulations resulting therefrom, they will be suspicious that the research, analysis, and regulations are biased in favor of the framers. The bait fisheries, all lying within the territorial waters of these countries, can be studied and regulated only by the country in which it lies or by an intergovernmental body to which has been delegated such power.

Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a letter from Dr. Donald P. Loker, general manager, High Seas Packing Co., San Diego, Calif., taking issue with the Washington newspapers ridiculing the request for appropriations for the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission. I believe his discussion of the Commission and its purposes will be enlightening to my colleagues:

HIGH SEAS TUNA PACKING CO., INC.,
San Diego, Calif., April 27, 1951.

Hon. CECIL R. KING,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KING: I am informed that the Washington newspapers of yesterday carried articles based on hearings of the House Appropriations Committee which referred to the study of the "love life of the tuna" in a manner designed to poke fun at the tuna industry.

I would appreciate it if you would call to the attention of your fellow Congressmen that this great industry is not a proper subject for ridicule. The tuna fishery is the most valuable fishery that the United States possesses, and it makes the fishing industry the fourth most valuable industry of the sovereign State of California.

The many thousands of men and women in California, Oregon, and Washington who are gaining their entire livelihood from the catching and processing of this nutritious food, and the additional thousands scattered through every State in the Union who make a living by wholesaling, retailing, and distributing this food to the Nation will not appreciate the levity with which these newspapers, and possibly some Members of the Congress, are treating the serious problems of this vital food industry.

This industry has grown by its own efforts without soliciting or getting one cent of Federal aid. The $125,000,000 which we have invested in the vessels, canneries, etc., which produce tuna, we have taken out of the sea itself and plowed back into the industry. It has not come out of the Federal Treasury.

If the vast subsidizing structure of the Department of Agriculture were taken from under the beef and pork industry of this Nation, that industry would collapse overnight. If the United States Fish and Wildlife Service were to cease operating tomorrow it would make no noticeable difference to the tuna industry. Yet, last year we produced $100,000,000 worth of food and marketed 11,000,000 cases of delicious, nutritious, boneless, skinless tuna meat in this country—enough to provide three and one-half cans for every man, woman, and child in the Nation. This is not an effort which should be held up to ridicule.

We have not heretofore asked aid from the Federal Government and we would not do so now if there were any way in which we could handle our international problems by our own efforts.

Nearly our entire production comes from the high seas south of the United States border. We fish off the coast of nine Latin-American Republics. We fish for bait, in the territorial waters of most of these countries, under permits which we have to buy from these countries, and for which we pay high prices.

For 15 years we entreated our Department of State to negotiate treaties such as the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Convention. It was not until the accumulation of our problems in several countries began to threaten the friendly relations between the United States and these countries that we could get the Department of State to act. When they did we gave every cooperation. We aided in the negotiation of the treaty; we urged the ratification of the treaty by the United States Senate; we pushed for the passage of implementing legislation through the Congress; we have thrown open the confidential records of our vessel operations and cannery operations to the Commission's staff; we have provided an advisory board from the industry to aid the Commission in its serious tasks; we have given largely of our time and money to aiding this most worth-while project; and now we find that we are being held up to ridicule before the Congress and the Latin-American Republics.

The treaty received the unanimous consent to ratification by the United States Senate. The implementing legislation passed the Congress last fall without a dissenting vote. We understand the Department of State was authorized, because of the urgency of the problems, to use funds already appropriated to its international contingency fund to get this Commission's work under way pending the approval of regular appropriations this year.

The Commission held one meeting in California and a second one in Costa Rica. A plan of research was prepared and approved; a budget to cover these activities was approved by both Governments. The Government of tiny Costa Rica sent its check for its complete share of the Commission's joint expenses to the Commission. The United States sent a check for $12,000 as a first installment of its $59,000 share of the Commission's joint expenses.

The Commission hired a top-notch scientist to direct its investigation. The Director hired a secretary and one assistant and made plans to hire other scientists to carry out the investigations which are so urgently needed.

But no more money of the United States share of the expenses was forthcoming. Through some hanky-panky between the Department of State and the House Appropriations Committee these funds have been held up. We cannot understand why this has been so. The President and his Bureau of the Budget have given their approval to the urgent nature of this work. So has the Department of State. So, we thought, had the Congress to a man.

But now the Commission has run out of money even before it has been able really to get its work started. And in 2 weeks' time it will have to fire its skeleton staff for lack of funds to pay their wages. We have been held up to ridicule before the Latin American Republics, and so has the entire Congress.

The treaty which the entire United States Senate approved is being vetoed by lack of funds. The Commission which the entire United States Congress approved is being strangled for lack of funds. Solemn international commitments made by this Nation to a sister republic are being welched on. No action that the United States could take would be more damaging to this industry than that which it is now doing: to make a bargain with one of our sister republics and then fail to keep it.

Other Latin American nations are closely watching this situation and already the repercussions have begun to set in. Two weeks ago, Panama refused two of our vessels permits to take bait during the regular bait season, and these two vessels, after going 800 miles out of their way to get this bait, have to wander off elsewhere to some other country. Panama does not want its bait resources damaged; Panama has no scientists to determine whether damage is being done or not. Therefore, Panama is just closing its bait grounds to us until impartial investigations are made.

The Nation cries for meat; the Navy wants our ships; the Navy is using our vessels and crews to help guard the Pacific approaches of the Panama Canal from Ecuador to Mexico. Yet the great puissant United States cannot find the paltry $47,000 remaining of its committed share to keep this Commission running and help this industry keep afloat.

I hope—and that hope is shared by the entire tuna industry—that you will bend every effort to see what is holding this money up and to investigate why this industry is being ridiculed instead of aided in the Nation's Capital.

From the standpoint of our international problems, it would have been much better that the treaty had never been negotiated than that it should be allowed to fail. But now that the treaty has been put in force, the Commission activated, and the research started, it is disastrous to us to have the whole thing cast acide. The repercussions on our industry of this welshing by the United States Government is going to be that we will be hurled back into a welter of diplomatic engagements damaging to us and to United States relations with those governments, and which we cannot handle.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD P. LOKER,
General Manager, High Seas Packing Co.

Wide Support Given to World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the following public-opinion release from George Gallup, director of the American Institute of Public Opinion. The poll which he conducted shows that the world-government idea has wide public support.

In analyzing the results of Gallup's poll, there might be some critics of world government who will try and make capital of the fact that only a minority had a clear-cut idea about the meaning of world government before being polled. I think that the answer to this objection is the fact that a poll on the familiarity with the Marshall plan revealed that while two-thirds knew it had something to do with aid to Europe, only 14 percent could define its objectives. This is true of virtually any specific foreign-policy measure, and probably will be in the forseeable future. This poll does not, of course, indicate that the people are crying for or demanding world government, but it does seem reasonable to conclude that they will accept the first steps in that direction.

Being one of the sponsors in this year's Congress of the world-government resolution, I am more than gratified to see the results of Gallup's poll. I might call attention to the fact that this year I sent my annual legislative questionnaire to about 25,000 constituents in which was the following question: "Would you be in favor of our Government taking the lead in the further development of the U. N. into a world federation capable of enforcing world law?" I have tabulated the first 1,000 returns on this question and the results show that 82 percent of those answering the question are for the idea as compared to 18 percent against.

Dr. Gallup's poll follows:

PRINCETON, N. J., May 1.—The world government resolution which has been introduced in Congress has considerable popular backing throughout the country, judging by interviews on the subject, with a balanced cross section of the Nation's voters.

Those better informed about the world government movement are more in favor of it. But even among persons not previously familiar with it, Gallup poll interviewers found considerable support for the idea of strengthening the United Nations to make it a world government.

Approximately two-thirds (64 percent) of all voters questioned by the American Institute of Public Opinion had some idea about the meaning of the term "world government." However, only a minority could explain the term with any precision.

Thirty-six percent were unable to give any meaningful definition.

All persons, whether they had previously heard of the term or not, were then asked: "Do you think the United Nations should or should not be strengthened to make it a world government with power to control the armed forces of all nations, including the United States?"

Yes, it should, answered 49 percent.
No, it should not, declared 36 percent.
The others, 15 percent, were undecided.

When compared with a survey on a similar question conducted in 1946, the above results indicate no great change of sentiment on the world-government issue.

INFORMED APPROVE

Those better informed in today's survey—the ones who were able to give a reasonably correct definition of the term "world government"—approve the idea by the following vote:

Make U. N. a world government, said 53 percent.
Leave it as it is, answered 37 percent.
The remainder, 10 percent, were undecided.

In the last session of Congress approximately 110 Members of the House of Representatives pledged themselves in favor of the resolution.

RESOLUTION TEXT

The resolution introduced in Congress by a number of representatives and supported by the World Federalists reads as follows:

"That it is the sense of the Congress that it should be a fundamental objective of the foreign policy of the United States to support and strengthen the United Nations and to seek its development into an organization of such defined and limited powers as are essential to the enactment, interpretation, and enforcement of world law to prevent aggression and to maintain peace."

Another group, the Atlantic Union Committee, favors a more limited type of world government made up of the Atlantic Powers, whereas the world federalists would open the door to all countries.

The National Home Garden and Home Food Preservation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just a word in behalf of the National Home Garden and Home Food Preservation Program, sponsored by the Department of Agriculture. Gardening in any year is one of the most useful and satisfying of human avocations. It is to be regretted that so many American citizens are deprived of the opportunity to learn by experience more about the soil and the plants from which they derive their daily food. It is good to think that millions of us have space on farm or in back yard where we can cultivate some vegetables and fruits, good for our bodies, and some grass and flowers and shade trees which renew our spirits and our faith in those simple beautiful things which are not too expensive for most of us to own or create with our own hands. We all recognize that the home is the very center of the American way of life. That it should be attractive outside as well as in, goes without saying. And when a garden also makes a contribution in wholesome food it adds to the sense of permanence, security and justifiable pride in American citizenship.

There is particular need for emphasizing home gardening and home food preservation this year arising out of the uncertainties of the time. No one knows how great or how small the food supply will be at the end of the crop year in 1951. No one can predict with certainty the character of the demand and the distribution of fruits and vegetables as they might be affected by military needs and transportation exigencies. Gardens and pantries are very practical storages of food against emergencies. Modern techniques of preservation, including home freezers, low temperature locker storages, pressure cookers, improved home canning instructions and equipment, and the storage of several kinds of fresh vegetables and fruits in cool basements and earth pits, are good ways to insure against possible shortage.

Home gardens, intelligently handled on good soil are important money savers, for low-income families particularly. Naturally, the advantages increase with the size of the family. Some impressive figures showing possible returns from home gardens recently appeared in the March and April numbers of two of the largest nationally circulated magazines—Better Homes and Gardens, and McCall's.

At least five other national magazines with a tremendous total circulation have featured home gardening with very important articles—House and Garden, Life, Look, Country Gentleman, and American Home. The Saturday Evening Post and Life also gave prominent space recently to the achievements of prominent seed concerns in the world of flower growing. All these things reflect the tremendous and growing interest of Americans in the art of gardening both for food and for beauty.

During World War II, the Union Pacific Railroad surveyed some 20,000 employee gardens in each of 2 years and concluded that if the vegetables grown and used had been purchased in the Kansas City wholesale markets they would have cost between $100 and $120 per garden.

It has come to my attention that there is a disposition in some quarters to play down the importance and value of a home-garden program and to regard home gardening as it now stands as adequate for our needs. At the height of the victory garden program the country had 20,000,000, perhaps as much as 22,000,000, gardens—Gallup polls. Extension workers and garden leaders think the number was not over 55 percent as many in 1950; some think about 50 percent. There is no justification for officials or civilian organizations to be complacent with the effectiveness of their programs in the fact of such a steadily falling home-garden effort. In the face of a sadly decreased wheat crop and widespread unfavorable weather conditions this is no time to relax our efforts to produce food on either farm or garden.

Higher food production goals have been set for 1951 in the interest of national defense for such essential cereals as corn and spring wheat and for tomatoes, peas, and sweet corn for canning. In view of the fact that home gardening labor is voluntary and takes no manpower from industry, that it is good for those who engage in it from about every angle one can think of, and that it cultivates a taste for vegetables which reflects itself in larger sales of commercial vegetables, there should be nothing but enthusiastic support for such a program.

I like the emphasis which the program lays on food preservation and use because it encourages many people in cities and towns who have no opportunity to make gardens, to freeze or can vegetables and fruits, and thus become participants, to their own advantage, in the effort.

Many of our political and military leaders think the world will live in a state of tension for several years. A continuing program of self-reliance on our individual production and conservation powers is in the national interest, a program that teaches school children and adults alike the fundamentals of food production, the essentials of sturdy independence of character and intelligent application of heart and hand to winning their daily bread, if necessary, in the event that disaster ever requires them to do so as a matter of survival.

The Menace and Challenge of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Charles Malik, the distinguished author of the following timely discourse, has just succeeded Eleanor Roosevelt as chairman of the United Nations Committee on Human Relations, of which she was chairman for five consecutive years.

Newspaper reports recently related that the Soviet Union member of said Commission was the only member who did not vote for Mr. Malik to succeed Mrs. Roosevelt.

A reading of the following, by Dr. Malik, will make clear why the Soviet spokesman did not care to have Dr. Malik head up this very, very important United Nations Commission.

I commend to your attention the utmost consideration of the article and due emphasis by every Congressman of its analysis and conclusions.

It follows:

CONCERNING COMMUNISM: THE MENACE AND THE CHALLENGE

(By Dr. Charles Malik, Minister of Lebanon in the United States, delivered July 26, 1950)

I

Communism is orginally a doctrine about reality, an ideal, and a call to action. Today, however, it has transported itself into the domain of concrete reality. For communism is now the principle of being of a great power and of a solidly organized group of nations under its hegemony. It is also the ideal and cause of a world-wide movement. It controls the life of about one-third of the globe, formally and directly. At least another one-third of the world determines its ultimate policies in terms of communism, albeit negatively and by way of reaction. Thus between themselves, the Communist and the non-Communist camps—both equally, though in opposite ways, functions of communism—constitute the totality of the effective agents of today's world.

What a difference, then, between the reality of communism today, which affects the life of the whole world, and the reality of communism a hundred years ago, when it was, to all appearance, no more than a bold cry in the wilderness. When Marx and Engels launched their wild attack on all known and existing patterns of life, the opening words of their Manifesto—"A spectre is haunting Europe—the spectre of communism"—were by no means a description of an existing situation; but today, exactly a century later, these same words are more than completely fulfilled. It may indeed have been only a spectre then; but today the spectre has taken on formidable concretion.

And yet, the dangers latent in communism need not have awaited the developments of this whole century to be fully realized; they were already there, in the pages of the Manifesto, for the whole world to read, decades before communism had at its disposal the world's most organized war machinery.

At the outset of the two half centuries that have just elapsed, men failed to realize the full character and magnitude of the challenge of communism mainly because their sight was concentrated on the political and the quantitative. Due to its infinitesimal physical dimensions, the spiritual significance of communism simply eluded men's vision. Those who did read aright the signs of the times—and they were very rare—solitary and suffering figures like Kierkegaard and Dostoyevsky—did so because their visions penetrated beyond the outward dimensions of events and grasped their inner spiritual and intellectual significance. Today, however, those who see only the political, social, economic, and military threat of communism miss its true challenge as pathetically as did their predecessors. For both see out of focus; both are so impressed by the physical weakness or strength of what is essentially a spiritual revolution that they lose sight of its real character.

II

Communism is a thoroughly consistent system of thought. From its basic and initial metaphysical premises, its all-comprehensive materialistic conception of reality, to its interpretation of human-social-historical reality, dominated by historical economic determinism, to its amoral view of human action, determined in its motives, directions, and worth only by its serviceability to the cause of world revolution—communism presents the spectacle of a tightly knit, rigid system of thought, permeated through and through, in its presuppositions, structure, and conclusions, by the spirit of metaphysical monism, ethical and axiological relativism, self-centered, autonomous humanism, impersonalist collectivism, historical dynamism, and militant atheism.

Communism is predicated on the emphatic rejection of God. The whole order of the spirit is rejected; self-subsistent spiritual beings are denied, while the spirituality of corporeal beings, like man, is reduced to a function of their physical existence. The Communist denial of God and the spirit is militant. Communism goes beyond agnosticism, beyond passive atheism; it assumes the form of aggressive and militant atheism. For God is not merely an illusion, but a harmful illusion, ingeniously utilized by priests and bourgeoisie for their own interests, and therefore combated by communism in the name of the class interests of the proletariat.

With the abolition of God goes the abolition of the absolute in any form. There is no absolute truth which man seeks and knows. There is no absolute good which man strives for, which eternally judges of man's actions and intentions and very being. Everything is relative—in its origin, being but a product of the material conditions of human existence, as well as in its form and function, being always subordinate to the interests and desires of classes. The good, the true, the beautiful, thus relativized, are ruthlessly subjectivized beyond any hope at a healthy, corrective relation to an objective order above the whims and interests of man.

The conception of man in communism is accordingly disfigured. Severed from his divine origin and divine destiny; denied the spiritual principle which gives his reason access to the truth, which endows his conscience and will with the craving for the good, which empowers his heart to love; imprisoned hopelessly in this world of strife and frustration, here to center all his hopes and here to erect his paradise—Communist man, thus despiritualized and depersonalized to the highest degree, is pathetically dehumanized. He is but a passing shadow of no duration, a fragment of no intrinsic or ultimate worth, a function of the striving of his generation for a more productive existence. Man's natural and inalienable rights are thus superseded by privileges bestowed by the collective; man's personal, intrinsic dignity is made to rest upon and emanate from his status in and contributions to the community; man's freedom—freedom of thought, freedom of being, freedom of self-achievement—is rendered conditional upon and utterly subservient to the whims and the interests of society.

From the point of view of world peace what is important about this doctrine is its entrenchment as the official monolithic philosophy of one of the two great powers of the world today. This power, whose capital is Moscow, has inherited the vast realms of the former Russian Empire, including its autocratic totalitarian organization. It has annexed to itself further millions of square miles and further hundreds of millions of human beings. Marx and his followers gloried in the fact that they were not only describing history—they were determined to take history into their hands and change it. Next to the bourgeoisie, it was the philosophers who mainly described events from the outside who were the targets of the Communists' sharpest shafts of ridicule. From the very beginning communism was one of the crassest lusts for power the world has ever known.

The actual, historical, political enshrinement of communism in the Russian-Soviet state meant a total concentration of all origination in the hands of the government. Everything flows from and is licensed by the government. Thus there are no independent free sources of thought, creation, activity; the assumption being, as Mr. Acheson remarked not long ago, that the government, which is the source of everything, is made up of gods or demigods, or at least supermen who know the truth and can never err.

Thus communism is not only a total doctrine which is at absolute variance with the deepest persuasions of the West; it is—and this is its importance from the viewpoint of war and peace—a total state. Nor is it just a total state living by itself; it is an aggressive state, absolutely determined to spread its outlook, its system, its power, throughout the world, not indeed under conditions of fair and free competition with other systems and outlooks (this very concept of fair and free competition would of course be the object of vitriolic sarcasm by Marx, Lenin, and Stalin), but by force and subversion and every conceivable subtlety.

Communists usually offer one aspect of their teachings to a group or an individual, that aspect which appeals to the interests of the group or the temperament of the individual in question; to the underprivileged masses, it is equality and security and what they call economic justice; to the peoples fighting against colonialisms, it is emancipation from their imperialist masters; to soft pacifists, it is attacks against warmongers and petitions for world peace; to oppressed races, it is racial equality; to the cosmopolitans, it is the supra-national world-scope of communism; to the intellectuals it is the lure of the ideal of equality and justice; to the liberals, it is what they call the struggle against fascism. Now, so far as they go, these partial emphases of communism have each a germ of truth. But they are not the whole truth about communism; they are not the essence of communism. Nor can the abstract good in them stand up, white and radiant, outside the dark shadow of the whole system.

These various aspects of communism are offered as a bait, cunningly prepared to suit the victim, to be followed gradually but steadily by larger and larger doses of the whole system and to be consummated, once the victim is well on his way toward complete capture, by rigid discipline. This seems to be in the general pattern of Communist infiltration: one-sided appeal to all-round subjugation. But communism is in reality a compact totality of spirit and values and premises, every one of which essentially partakes of the character of the whole. The greatest danger inherent in communism is not its total evil and falsehood which is likely, once communism is viewed as a whole, to be rejected even by common sense, but rather the isolated streaks of good and truth which enter into the fabric of the whole and which, viewed in abstraction, may ensnare the weak and innocent.

III

Superficially, communism is a revolt against the capitalist system, an antithesis to the bourgeoise civilization of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, characterized as it has been by nationalism, individualism, imperialism, politico-economic liberalism, free economic enterprise, private ownership of property and of the means of production, representative government, and the rule of law.

This is, of course, partly true, although it can be shown that the Soviets are absolutely imperialistic, that in the United Nations they have insisted on nothing more than on the principle of national sovereignty, and that so far as the private ownership of property and of the means of production are concerned, the passage of these things from the private ownership of a few individuals—subject always to the inevitable correctives of free competition and to the social and economic scrutiny of the public and the government—to the monopoly of the state, which is subject to no judgment whatsoever above itself, this passage is not a sure mark of progress.

Be that as it may, the point I want to make now is that communism has much more in common with its antithesis than it realizes. Though a revolt against what it ambiguously calls capitalism, communism is more profoundly a completion, a culmination, a passage to its logical conclusion, of that movement of European secularism and self-estrangement of which the age and civilization of capitalism is but a product, in fact perhaps an intermediate and transitory stage. Their opposition takes place on common grounds. For behind the opposition between their respective systems of organizing the modes of production and exchange, behind the difference in their patterns of social and political organization, behind the antithesis of their conceptions of social dynamics, there lies a basic disturbing kinship of outlook. It is the kinship of their common underlying economism, their common worship of the economic man: half-hearted and perhaps unconscious, yet, nevertheless, all-pervading, in the one case, and militant and elevated to the level of a creed in the other case. It is the similarity of their common autonomous humanism: their preoccupation with human affairs, their concentration on man's life here below, where material interests are uppermost and material prosperity the supreme good—a concentration which in the one case overshadows and in the other case entirely supersedes the eternal, the spiritual, the transcendent. It is finally the similarity of their common impersonalism: in the one case, within the context of an atomistic, self-seeking, closed and windowless individualism, in itself opaque to love and suffering and sacrifice and responsibility and social solidarity; and, in the other case, within the context of an absolutely soulless collectivism in which the person's independent existence is denied, his freedom, his dignity, his worth being all made derivative from the leviathan which is his state.

IV

This then is the theory and actuality of communism in general and this is the character of its dialectic within the secularism of the present western epoch.

The question therefore arises: Can there be real peace, with communism so entrenched and so determined? Can the West get along with this sort of thing? Is the oft-repeated notion of peaceful coexistence a real possibility?

My answer to all these questions is categorically in the negative. Obviously I cannot get along with one whose whole being not only contradicts mine, but is bent on destroying mine. Therefore, when anybody in the West says or has said simply, "we can get along with communism," then one of four propositions is true: (1) Either he is a Communist himself; (2) or he is an appeaser; (3) or he does not know what he is talking about, namely he does not know the nature of the thing with which he says he can get along; (4) or—and this is the most grievous thing—he does not know the supreme values of his own heritage which communism has radically rebelled against and desires to extirpate.

For I assure you it isn't only your soldiers in Korea who are embattled today: It is the highest attainments of mind, spirit, and being of the last 4,000 years.

The question therefore is not "Can we get along with communism? Can we arrange a modus vivendi between the two worlds? Can we bring about a peaceful coexistence between them?" This question, in my opinion, is perfectly stupid. For the West, if it knows itself and if it knows communism, must come to the obvious conclusion that it is absolutely impossible to get along with communism.

What then is the question?

The question is: Whether it is possible to induce, and how to induce, the necessary modification in Communist theory and practice whereby the West then can get along, not indeed with communism as such, but with the Russians. This is the supreme question of the present generation.

The answer to this question as to the ways and means of inducing in communism the necessary changes which will enable Russia and the rest of the world to live together in peace is, in my opinion, the following:

1. The non-Communist world must feverishly look after its own defenses. It is absolutely stupid of the West or of anybody in the West to assume that where communism could intervene and could get away with it, it would not intervene. Therefore the non-Communist world must be strong enough to counteract any possible Communist intervention. Communism will never be induced to change its nature so long as it only passes from success to success. This is an absolutely necessary condition; but it is purely negative.

2. The West must stand, energetically and consistently, precisely for those political and economic conditions whose absence has been a contributing factor to the spread of communism and to the growth of the other corrosives of western civilization.

This means promoting real democracy, at home and abroad, where the people can freely and actively determine their own government. A situation in which the west preaches and practices democracy at home, while at the same time allying itself with autocratic reactionary regimes abroad, where there is no freedom or participation of the people in their own government, is at once unhappy and unstable.

It means further that the West must share the material goods of the earth with the rest of the world in greater liberality. It is impossible for western civilization to defend itself against communism so long as between Moscow and Washington there are teeming billions of human beings who have never known anything except poverty, privation, and the ever-present menace of starvation, and to whom Moscow means, truly or falsely, that an end will be put to their eternal misery. It is impossible for western civilization to defend itself against the onslaught of communism so long as the standard of living in the United States is ten to a hundred times higher than what it is throughout Asia, and so long as the United States and the rest of the West do nothing effective about it. In my opinion, the present financial implications of point 4 must be multiplied literally a hundred times before anywhere near the preliminary conditions for counteracting the Communist challenge on the material plane can be fulfilled. This is no sentimental act of philanthropy; this is a genuine feeling of human solidarity in a magically contracted world. There is no getting away from the fundamental spiritual law: to retain the enjoyment of your liberties and goods, you must liberally share them with others. In that way alone can you pentrate and overcome that penumbra of neutrality which seems today to be encasing the Soviet world.

3. But the penetration must go further: it must reach the Russian mind, Senator BENTON'S program toward this end is of the utmost importance. But, frankly, here again the outlay must be multiplied at least by 10, and the propaganda used must not only aim at the truth in the narrower sense of conveying to the Russian mind a true picture of the real conditions in the Communist and the non-Communist worlds, but in the deeper sense of eliciting the common humanity and the common spirituality which subsist between Russia and the West. In this connection it is tragic that the importance of Greek Orthodoxy has not been sufficiently appreciated in the West. But Orthodoxy has molded the Russian spirit for a thousand years, and the stupid veneer of Marxist materialism will never displace it. This does not mean that the faithful will in an emergency turn against their government: no, the Russian will always die in defense of holy Russia. But it does mean that looking beyond the emergency, Greek Orthodoxy is the only existing community of spirit between Russia and the West. This is a fact of the greatest possible significance for the future. I must add that Western Christianity must approach the Eastern Orthodox Church in a spirit of contrition and Christian charity. I assure you you can learn a lot from the wonderful riches of the Orthodox Church.

4. Unless a civilization is sure of its ultimate values, its military, economic and political defenses will sooner or later be weighed and found utterly wanting. Civilizations have perished not so much because they have been materially weak, as because they lost their soul and ceased to have a fighting faith in themselves as bearers of light and being to the entire world.

The absolute necessity for military, political, and economic preparedness at the present time cannot be overemphasized. But precisely because the needs in these fields are so incontestably overpowering, there is a grave danger that the great requirements of the spirit will be unduly lost sight of.

The greatest task of the Western World at the present moment is, concurrently with its military, economic, and political preparedness, to articulate adequately what it ultimately stands for. The basic values of western civilization must be brought out and proclaimed in all clarity, conviction, and boldness.

It is not true that men fight best in self-preservation. This may be true of animals, but certainly it is not true of men. Men are primarily moved by ideas. Grant them a certain vision of the truth, and they will rise to pinnacles of heroism utterly unattainable by those who live and die only to preserve themselves. Men live by faith. Grant them a fighting faith whereby they are sure that the values they believe in are supreme, and they will move mountains.

Communism provides a fighting faith. But the Western World has a fighting faith that is infinitely deeper and truer than this primitive faith of communism. Only this western faith must be rediscovered, reactivated and reaffirmed. The greatest service that can be done to western society today is to reawaken it to the positive faith of its fathers.

The West, with the Atlantic community as the central core, is the integral heir of the Graeco-Roman-Hebrew-Christian-Mediterranean-European humane tradition. For 4,000 years profound and sustained interaction between diverse peoples and cultures resulted in this wonderful synthesis. There is no similar cumulative richness of spirit, no comparable internal conscious reflection, anywhere else in the world. Communism has cut itself away from, and rebelled against this tradition, and all in the name of material progress; and it is this act of self-separation and rebellion that is going to mean its undoing in the end. Once this residue of faith is reactivated and proclaimed, once the deposit of the ages is known and loved and believed in, then western man will realize what is at stake in the great spiritual contest of the moment, and there will be no limit to the level of joyful sacrifice and quiet self-confidence to which he will rise.

I shall therefore now suggest in barest outline what I believe to be the elements of the western faith, the basic findings of the last 4,000 years, findings which mankind can overlook or rebel against only at its supreme peril.

1. There is an objective truth to be sought and found, a truth about nature, man, society, history and the final things.

2. There is thus a natural law and order to which we must submit if we are to be happy.

3. There is an hierarchy of being, an order of values, a higher and a lower in the scale of things. Good consists of rejoicing in and obeying this order; evil, in trying to subvert it.

4. Human reason, thoroughly disciplined in the cumulative positive tradition, is perfectly adequate, by free and critical inquiry, to discover this truth, this law, and this hierarchy.

5. Man is free to be or not to be in the truth. He is free to rebel against nature. But as surely as the night follows the day, if he rebels, he will have to pay a heavy price by way of suffering and death, even unto the third and fourth generations.

6. Our freedom of thought, conscience, and decision is something absolutely sacred. It is by this freedom that we share in the perpetual act of creation. Take this freedom away from man, and he is immediately dehumanized.

7. The other person is never a means only, but always also an end. Therefore his humanity must be respected.

8. The human person does not exist for the sake of society and the state: on the contrary, society and the state exist for the sake of the human person.

9. History is not all in vain; we do not start all over again. There is a real, positive heritage accumulating itself for 4,000 years. This heritage of truth and being is the most precious thing in the world.

10. There is a God. He is a living person. He created heaven and earth and has authentically revealed Himself in history. His essence is love, and therefore He both suffers and has suffered for our sins, and always forgives.

11. The intellectual and spiritual principles in man are supreme over any other principle. Thus our primary duty is to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness. The material is derivative from the spiritual.

12. Man—you and I in the first person—is destined to eternal life. Our present life is a mockery and a hopeless unintelligibility without reference to the next.

This body of doctrine is the soul of the West. It is what has made the West to be itself. It is a permanent acquisition of the human spirit. I believe heaven and earth will perish, but this deposit of truth and certainty will never pass away. This is the fighting faith of the West, this is the standard under which alone the West can be true to itself. And if a life-or-death struggle is forced upon western civilization, this is the ensign of truth in whose name alone it can fight and conquer.

People must realize the ultimate things that are in the balance. For what is ultimately in the balance is not this or that government, not this or that economic system, not this or that person who happens to be in power today, not the home and the hearth and the children, but the dearest persuasions and certainties of the last 4,000 years. What is under ruthless attack is nothing short of reason, order, nature, truth, freedom, human dignity, history, God, love, and the higher things. It is these matters, without which there would never be light and culture in Europe and America today, that are systematically undermined, ridiculed, denied, conspired against. There is a determined attempt to see that they are eradicated from the surface of the earth. When people take in the concrete significance of their beleaguered heritage, it is impossible for them to remain any more in doubt: They will rise to the highest pitch of certainty and resolve.

The tragedy of the present moment is that many people have lost faith in this priceless intellectual and spiritual heritage of the west. They worship alien gods. The present crisis is fundamentally one of faith, faith in the abiding values which have been culled from the sweat and tears of the ages. And, therefore, the battle is as much against this widespread loss of faith within the Western World itself, as against the foreign enemies. In fact, there would be today no foreign enemies at all if faith in the spirit and the mind had not weakened. The fundamental battle is against cynicism, uprootedness, self-estrangement, and despair.

VI

I do not believe the real issue of the second half of the twentieth century to be either communism or the rising East; I believe the real issue of our times is whether America, having completed the tremendous century-old task of taming and integrating a whole continent, will now turn, with the same zeal which characterized her material adventure, to the intellectual and spiritual foundations of her own life, to the end that, rediscovering and reaffirming them, she might mediate them to the whole world. I also believe America could not in reality perform this task except by being absolutely faithful to her Christian tradition, without which she herself would have been impossible in the first place.

I think, therefore, there is a prayer which one—whether an American or a non-American—must utter today:

May the United States accept with boldness, but also with humility, the role of leadership which God has assigned to her;

May she discharge this role with honor, determination, humor, fairness, and absolute good will;

And may she draw from her deep Christian heritage the necessary strength, the necessary vision, the necessary sense of destiny, the necessary joy, for the wonderful task of the moment.

A Polish Volunteer Freedom Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a timely article written by Dr. Karol Ripa that appeared in the Polish Daily News of Chicago, on April 7, 1951:

A POLISH VOLUNTEER FREEDOM CORPS

Whereas one can with all probability foretell, that Soviet Russia will not, for many reasons, provoke a world war in the current year, one can affirm, that—unless with a great loss to the West—to avoid war—will be impossible.

Gigantic rearmaments with the exclusive purpose of a maintenance of peace must lead to a general tension and—according to many examples taught us by history—end in war. Unfortunately now there is no other issue out of the situation, if the Soviet danger is to be averted. It is a bloody revenge for the errors and failures of the past, when the West had been in a position under the shelter of the American monopoly of the atomic bomb and by way of a firm and decisive policy—to force Moscow to concessions and to save the peace of the world. It is too late now. It is time to realize this and to disperse the illusions, that by some miracle we shall be spared the decisive contest with the aggressive camp. "We are arming to defend to the last man the imperiled freedom of the world." This is what should be proclaimed by the authorities of the Western World. Meanwhile the people continue to be told that "we are arming, since this is the only way to defend peace." The hour is sure to come when the world will suddenly be placed face to face with a dreadful reality it was trying to escape from, and it will not at that moment be sufficiently and psychically prepared to sustain the colossal sacrifices, tribulations and sufferings, the new war must bring to humanity.

There are in Eastern Central Europe over 100,000,000 of people, who, against their will, have been subordinated to pro-Soviet regimes. They are the natural allies of the West. But what has been done to win them for the cause to explain to them, that the mistakes of Yalta belong to an irreparable past, but that the Western Powers will help them to regain their freedom? Nothing positive has been done in this respect. To the contrary, some of the responsible western politicians have been suggesting now and again, that peace could be saved by provoking revolts in those countries (so much affected by the fate already) in order to keep the future enemy occupied in quashing those revolts. It is to be expected then, that the eastern-central European nations will have to sacrifice themselves once again and expose themselves to bloody reprisals by the Bolsheviks, in order to save for the West a peace, which for themselves would mean stabilization of their slavery.

News came to this station from Poland of the adverse impression which was caused there by an article of the Times of January 29, 1951—adequately interpreted by the Soviet propaganda—which contained the following declaration of Mr. Jackson, president of Free Europe, an organization intended to help the people beyond the iron curtain: "If we keep the Russians busy with the people they have already conquered by holding out a genuine hope of freedom, we can perhaps prevent the march across Western Europe." The harm done in Poland by declarations of this kind excels by much all a most intensive Soviet propaganda could achieve there. Nothing that could be said later could adjust it. There arises a very harmful atmosphere of mistrust and disbelief, to change which will be extremely difficult.

Within the past few weeks there has been much news and rumors in this country and in Europe as well, about a plan to create out of the Central European refugees a volunteer freedom corps, to form part of the European army.

This station made inquiries among many Polish ex-servicemen and among the members of the Polish Combatants Association in Great Britain. This, in general lines, is what WFJL has gathered in this matter:

The majority of the Polish refugees abroad consider themselves as political émigrés who, in token of a protest against the subordination of their country to the rule of pro-Soviet agents, refused—after the war—to return to Poland. They are all impatiently waiting for the moment when it will become possible for them to take an active share in the liberation of their country from her present yoke.

On the other hand, the experience of past years, the appeasement, which since 1943 has been displayed by the Western Powers with regard to the Polish problem, the lack of any sign in the present period of international tension, for a change of their policy, all this has been causing among the Polish refugees a feeling of uncertainty and of a mistrust for the policy of the West. These feelings have been accentuated by the favorization of Germany to the detriment of Polish interests by the United States and Great Britain.

The problem of the Polish western frontiers on the rivers Oder and Neisse is, irrespective of the political character of the Warsaw Government, most vital to all the nations, and there is not and cannot be any division of opinions in this matter.

This is the reason, why a great part of Poles living abroad—in spite of their hostility with regard to the Soviets and their desire to fight against them—make political guarantees a condition of their active share in the military preparations for the creation of a European army. The Poles have been demanding an official guaranty: that there will be no other Tehran or Yalta, i. e., a forsaking of the interests of Poland, to save those of the great powers and affirmation by the American and British authorities, that Poland would be given necessary help to regain her freedom and independence. The Polish emigrees, who could set up quite an imposing corps, would prefer to fight in their own army units and are definitely against any schemes of foreign legions. There will evidently be volunteers for military service in any form, but such offers will come rather from individuals, than from the emigration as an organized whole. The very existence of Polish divisions at the side of the Western Powers would have a great psychological bearing on the youth in Poland and cause mass desertions from the Rokossowsky's army.

There is still another problem, of which Washington should be reminded. The Polish legal government-in-exile had in wartime been recognized by all the Allies and even Soviet Russia (1941–1943). In July 1945, the Western Powers withdrew their recognition of the London Government and proclaimed the Warsaw administration imposed on the country by Moscow, as the legal government of Poland. Up until now the great Western Powers continue to recognize the Warsaw regime, completely ignoring the Polish Government-in-exile, residing in London. (The latter is still officially recognized by the Vatican, Spain, Ireland, and Lebanon, and semi-officially by a number of South American states.) When it comes to an armed conflict with the Soviet bloc, Washington and London will have to withdraw their recognition of the Warsaw regime and the question will arise then: Whom will they consider as the official representative of the Polish nation? The problem of the Polish Government-in-exile will automatically come to fore then. It was one of the problems which General Anders had discussed during his recent visit to the United States.

If the project for the creation of a Volunteer Freedom Corps is not to become another source of disillusionment for the Western Powers, it is imperative to let it remain pending until the settlement by America, Great Britain, and France of all political matters connected with the latter. Otherwise, it will meet with the same fate, as did the plan for the rearmament of Germany. When all preparations are complete, it will prove, that one item has been overlooked, i. e., who are to be volunteers of the "Freedom Corps"?

This is not, however, the only matter requiring a prompt settlement. It will be necessary, at the moment of the outbreak of war in Europe, to provoke in the countries of Eastern-Central Europe some risings, which would paralyze the Red army's lines of communications in the rear. According to reliable news from behind the iron curtain, the organization at the moment of Soviet aggression against Western Europe of a wide scale guerrillas, will also be made dependent on a previous settlement by the Western Powers of the fundamental political problems. In regard to Poland the most fundamental problems concern Poland's future and her frontiers.

All plans concerning an organization now of an armed rising against the Communist regime have been categorically rejected by the Poles, who are certain, that no positive results could be achieved by it, except cruel reprisals of the regime against the youth.

And so, to sum up: The problem of the Volunteer Freedom Corps needs, in the case of Poland, some political preparation and a definition of the Western Powers' program, concerning the future of the east central European countries in case of war—and concerning the future frontiers of Poland.

Briefly speaking, the refugees are ready to do all they can to help liberate their countries, but they refuse to be considered as mere "Kanonenfutter" as the Germans used to say years ago in regard to conquered nations.

The first step of the Western Powers, which would help tremendously to the organization of a Polish Volunteer Freedom Corps—should be an immediate withdrawing of their recognition of the Warsaw Rokossovski's Regime, demanded by the Polish-American Congress and by 98 percent of Americans of Polish descent. The so-called consulates of that regime are nothing but agencies of the Soviet Russian Politburo. The sooner they disappear from this country, the better for the common cause.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTOPHER C. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I pay tribute to Mrs. Carolyn L. Bull, a lovely lady in our community, who has just celebrated her one-hundredth birthday, and include the following news items from the Press-Review regarding her:

SHE HAS SEEN AND DONE ENOUGH TO FILL MANY ORDINARY LIFETIMES SINCE 1851

(By George Carpozi, Jr.)

Carolyn L. Bull, who has been keeping company with Father Time for the past century, is a sprightly little woman with a boundless sense of humor and an unlimited capacity for concocting epicurean delights.

The humor inherent in Mrs. Bull admittedly blossoms from her take-it-easy philosophy for longevity, which she is eminently qualified to expound. Her flair for creating savory recipes stems from an 80-year practice, dating back to the days of open hearths and potbelly stoves.

Last Friday, when Mrs. Bull became a centenarian, she welcomed relatives and friends to her modest home at 3354 Country Club Road. She indicated that neither her radiant disposition nor her love for the kitchen would diminish in the next 100 years.

LIVED THROUGH CIVIL WAR

Mrs. Bull, who was born in Philadelphia in 1851, 75 years after her great grandfather, Richard Stockton, signed the Declaration of Independence, has experienced and accomplished enough to fill many ordinary lifetimes. She lived through the Civil War, witnessed the blizzard of 1888, saw the first electric light, the first horseless carriage, the first motion picture, and the first radio.

One of the first residents in the Country Club area to bring television into her home, Mrs. Bull today is an ardent televiewer, staying up each night until 11 o'clock to watch the wrestling matches.

"The wrestlers give me ideas on how to handle the men around this house," states Mrs. Bull, flexing the muscles of her 70 pounds. The men she refers to are her 80-year-old husband, Henry, a retired post office official, and her "adopted" son, Stanley T. Bell, a retired shipping lines executive, who came to live with the Bulls 35 years ago.

NEIGHBOR OF GENERAL SHERMAN

Mrs. Bull, who was a next-door neighbor of the Sherman brothers, William T. and John, when her family moved to Ohio in 1862, knew both the General and the Senator very well. She also knew General Ulysses S. Grant, and when he later became President, Mrs. Bull visited him in the White House.

Her acquaintance with the famous figures of history doesn't end with these. Mrs. Bull, a lover of music all her life, particularly opera, had known Melba, Adelini, Patti, Caruso, Tetrazzini, and other greats.

For more than 75 years Mrs. Bull has tried her own hand at accomplishments on the piano in her living room, and her influence and encouragement have prompted her husband to write a number of songs. One of these, "The Letter Carriers Waltz," is being arranged presently for the Post Office Department 75-piece band.

WON RECIPE PRIZE

Mrs. Bull's favorite subject of course, is recipes. Last year, at 99, she won first prize of $100 in a Nation-wide contest sponsored by the Campbell Soup Co. for her tomato sauce recipe. The president of the company paid a personal visit to Mrs. Bull's home to present her with the award, which had been doubled by the company when they found out her age.

At the time she received the award, Mrs. Bull said, "When I started cooking, people ate much heavier meals than they do today. But even then, flavor was very important, especially with men."

Another thing that was very important with men years ago was the unwritten law that a woman's place was in the home. But Mrs. Bull would have none of that bullheadedness.

She studied stenography, mastered the subject, and at 17 got a job as the first woman reporter in the Ohio State Legislature. She was a Republican then, and she is a Republican now. But last year Mrs. Bull accidentally voted for a Democrat for the first time in her life. The candidate was young James J. O'Brien who was elected to the State Assembly from the ninth assembly district.

POSED WITH CANDIDATE

Mrs. Bull was persuaded by Francis W. Murphy, the leader of the district, to pose for a picture with O'Brien during his campaign, and the photo appeared in a daily newspaper. The candidate appealed to Mrs. Bull, and she exercised her constitutional right at the poles in what she terms "the proper fashion."

Besides her interests in cooking, music, and politics, Mrs. Bull has an exceptional fascination for travel. Though she was born too late to have been a passenger aboard her cousin Robert Fulton's steamboat Clermont in its trial run on the Hudson in 1807, Mrs. Bull has done a lot of traveling on steamboats and has toured Europe extensively.

Her journeys in the United States have also been widespread. Among her most memorable trips was the one on which she rode the first sleeping car, a three-decker equipped with kerosene lamps and upholstered in red plush. Mrs. Bull's present mode of travel is by automobile, which she enjoys tremendously.

COUNTS DAYS TO SUMMER

Right now she is counting the days to summer when she will be riding again on the scenic Merritt Parkway to Woodbury, Conn., to the country home of her niece, Miss Elizabeth Grimes, a daughter of Mrs. Bull's youngest sister.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Bull will be kept busy answering the hundreds of telegrams and letters of congratulations heaped on her by friends and well-wishers on her birthday. Commenting about the heartening messages contained in these dispatches, Mrs. Bull says, "This encouragement is wonderful, and it boosts me along. But I'm not going to get unduly elated about it."

Mrs. Bull is restraining her emotions because no sooner will the fanfare surrounding her own birthday diminish, she will be plunged into preparations for another birthday celebration. "Thaddy," a brown-hued male Dachshund, who is described by his owner as a "man of action," will be celebrating his fourth birthday this week.

Survival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEED

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, in these days of bitter debate and disunity, marked more by their revelation of how quickly too many people jump to conclusions without thinking, and how eagerly some try to advance selfish interest to the detriment of national security, it is most refreshing to find an example of thoughtful, objective reporting.

Much public hysteria has been generated, deliberately I believe, by some speakers, politicians, columnists, and commentators. But a great public service is being rendered by others in these fields who have refused to be swayed by temper or prejudice.

One of the best examples of this most commendable type of comment and reporting has been given by Edward R. Murrow, of the Columbia Broadcasting System staff. I repeat here a part of a radio newscast he made on CBS at 7:45 o'clock on the evening of April 24, 1951. These statements are so important and well made that I feel they deserve to be made a part of the permanent record in the great debate known as the MacArthur-Truman case. The excerpts are as follows:

General MacArthur returned home a week ago tonight. I don't suppose anyone will ever bother to count or weigh the millions of words spoken since then. (Many of the words, on both sides, wouldn't weigh very much anyhow.) If you will study the list of Senators who have been sounding off on both sides, you will find that with few exceptions those who have rushed so eagerly into this fray, armed with such meagre facts, have been those Senators whose terms have 4 or 5 years still to run. Also, I think you can count on half of one finger the number of elected Representatives who have said publicly that they have changed their minds as a result of the debate. To a considerable extent the seconds have occupied the ring, with the principals—the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and General MacArthur—remaining in the background, occasionally passing to the seconds a document, or a hint of future disclosures, with which to belabor the opposition.

It may be interesting to recall or prove that General MacArthur was wrong about the Chinese coming into the war if we crossed the thirty-eighth parallel. It is altogether proper for the general's spokesman to point out as he did today, that this was a decision that had to be taken in Peiping, beyond the range of the general's field intelligence. And that the State Department and the Joint Chiefs should have been better able to assess the possibility of Chinese intervention. It adds a little fuel to the fire for administration spokesmen to reply that if Peiping and Chinese intentions were beyond the realm of the general's intelligence, then maybe Moscow and Russian intentions are even more obscure to the general and his advisors.

But all this doesn't get us much forwarder.

A week from Thursday hearings will begin before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Spokesmen of both parties appear to believe that the hearings should be public, insofar as that can be done without jeopardizing real military security. Public or secret probably doesn't matter very much, since secret testimony has a habit of leaking, and being distorted in the process. Maybe our best hope of maintaining security is that the Russians will be confused, as most of us will be, as to what actually transpires. The Joint Chiefs of Staff will present a document setting forth their differences with General MacArthur. The general's spokesman hints that he, too, has documents. And no doubt a lot of unofficial documents will be drifting about like the waste paper during General MacArthur's parade here in New York. (And, incidentally, who was responsible for the disaster at Pearl Harbor?)

I would like to suggest that this debate isn't really about whether or when the Joint Chiefs agreed with certain of the general's purely military recommendations. It doesn't really have anything to do with whether the general was fired in a summary, unfair fashion, or whether he is a genius, or merely an arrogant and insubordinate commander. At bottom the argument doesn't revolve around Acheson's qualities of judgment and leadership, or lack of them, or whether the Republicans are to be labeled warmongers or the Democrats appeasers. All of these arguments and labels may well be trampled underfoot by the march of events. For this argument is really a very simple thing that generally goes under the name of survival, and how we are best, or most likely, to secure it. We are fighting a bitter defensive action in Korea right now. The outcome is still in doubt. We are on the defensive against aggressive world communism everywhere. We have allies that may well one day become powerful. We sought those allies, not because we loved them, but because we needed them. They would not go with us in an extension of the war into China. Maybe they were wrong. But that is the fact.

We and our allies are trying desperately to rearm—to recover the ground we lost in our folly at the end of the late war, when we misjudged the nature and the imminence of the Communist threat. We and our allies are not yet prepared to meet and repel that threat by force of arms. It has been the assumption of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that a stalemate in Korea might make negotiations with the Chinese possible. It has likewise been the assumption of our Government that our increasing power, and that of our European allies, might eventually make some world-wide accommodations with the Soviet Union possible. Both assumptions may be false. But if they are, then surely it is to our advantage to fight with allies rather than without them, and on ground and with weapons of our own choosing. I know of no military man who would advocate that the mainland of Asia is the ideal ground for such a conflict. And if it comes it will not be fought for the reputation of Harry Truman or the glory of Douglas MacArthur or the justification of Dean Acheson—it will be fought for survival.

This widespread, frantic questioning of our policy and our leadership is inevitable, and probably healthy, for as Euripides said: "Nothing is of more service to mankind than a prudent mistrust." But as the debate lengthens and tempers shorten we might remember the words of John Collins, who said: "Half our mistakes in life arise from feeling where we ought to think, and, thinking, where we ought to feel."

Protest Against Roll-Backs by American National Cattlemen's Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I have received a telegram from the American National Cattlemen's Association regarding the beef roll-back order recently announced by the Office of Price Stabilization, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared regarding this order.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from the American National Cattlemen's Association which I would like to read to the Senate:

"The promises which Eric Johnston gave you a few weeks ago that no serious roll-backs were contemplated are now proven false. I hope you and other Senators interested in the cattle industry will hound Johnston and DiSalle to rescind the orders just issued which are extremely discriminatory as no other industry has been subjected to similar treatment. If DiSalle by a stroke of the pen can write off $700,000,000 worth of the inventory value of cattle in this country, the figure he himself had used, then truly we have a police state. This is not price control it is confiscation of property and the Senate should refuse to extend title IV of the Defense Production Act beyond its expiration date June 30. There will be an entirely chaotic situation in the meat industry if the DiSalle orders are not rescinded."

That telegram is signed by Mr. F. E. Mollin, executive secretary of the organization.

I would like to call particular attention to this statement in the telegram: "This is not price control—it is confiscation of property." That statement is absolutely correct. The price-control authority given to Mr. DiSalle has been deliberately used to destroy millions of dollars in values of the inventory of the livestock men of this country. Evidently this authority is being used to confiscate the wealth that has been created by one group of the population and devote that wealth to the benefit of another group.

Mr. President, on the basis of this beef roll-back order, I am about convinced that Mr. DiSalle does not understand the elementary facts about how the American economic system operates. He does not even seem to realize that the price received for something must cover costs of producing it. Thousands of farmers and livestock men in my State will suffer a heavy out-of-pocket loss on every head of cattle they had on feed today unless this order is rescinded. Many of them who are carrying their stock on borrowed money are likely to be bankrupt. That is the practical result of this order.

This order indicates that the Price Administrator does not realize that no producer can continue to operate at a loss. By issuing this order, Mr. DiSalle has made it absolutely certain that there will not be enough meat for consumers. The telegram that I read stated: "There will be an entirely chaotic situation in the meat industry if the DiSalle orders are not rescinded." That statement is not exaggerated in the slightest. I believe we can be sure that unless these orders are changed drastically and sharply, we will have meat rationing within a few months.

Just yesterday I had a phone call from a cattle feeder in Nebraska, who told me that feeling was running so high against the order that a thousand farmers from just one county were ready to conduct a protest march on Washington. He asked me what I thought of the idea, and I believe I persuaded him to put off any such action until Congress had had a chance to take a hand in the matter. But I can fully understand the sentiments of those farmers when they are told that they must take an actual out-of-pocket loss on every head of cattle that they have on feed.

Mr. President, I am sure the people of my State realize the necessity for sacrifices, but they are not willing to take it lying down when they see Government agencies used and misused to give advantages to other economic groups at their expense. They have come to realize that farmers have been made the target for a movement to push farm prices down, freeze parity, and inflict roll-backs on livestock producers—at the very time when other groups are receiving increases of 10 percent or more. They expect their representatives in Congress to see to it that they get fair treatment, and I believe they are perfectly justified in expecting fair treatment.

Mr. President, the price-control authority expires in less than 2 months, and I suggest that Congress take a good long look at the manner in which this power has been exercised before voting any extension.

Labor's United Approach Toward World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, announcement by the Honorable Maurice J. Tobin, our distinguished Secretary of Labor, that the CIO will join with the A. F. of L. this year for the first time since 1946 in designating labor representatives on the United States delegation to the annual international labor conference, will be of interest, I feel sure, not only to Members of the Senate, but to every citizen interested in the progress of labor.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement by the Department of Labor regarding the aims and activities of the International Labor Organization toward the improvement of conditions throughout the world be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIO TO PARTICIPATE IN ILO CONFERENCE

The CIO will participate with the A. F. of L. as labor representatives on the United States delegation to the annual International Labor Conference, for the first time since 1946, Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin announced today. The conference will meet this year in Geneva on June 6.

The A. F. of L. will nominate the worker delegate, the Secretary said, and the CIO will join the A. F. of L. in nominating advisers to the delegate. Each organization will have an equal number of advisers.

The ILO, the oldest major international organization, was established in 1919 by the Treaty of Versailles to raise the standards of workers throughout the world. Samuel Gompers was a leading figure in founding the organization. It has 62 member nations including every major country except the Soviet Union. The United States joined in 1934.

"This is another significant step," the Secretary said, "In American labor's united approach toward world affairs. In 1949, the A. F. of L. and CIO were prime movers in forming the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, free labor's answer to the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

"Through the ICFTU the United American Labor movement is cooperating with its democratic counterparts in 59 countries to raise standards of living and promote the legitimate interests of free trade unions everywhere, in an all out effort to defeat the forces of communism.

"This agreement to work together in the ILO is another milestone on the road toward international labor cooperation. The ILO is one of the most effective international instruments for building the economic and social foundations of world peace."

The ILO is unique among international organizations in that employers and workers participate in the activities of the organization on an equal footing with governments.

Each member nation is required to select employer and worker representatives in agreement with the national organizations of workers and employers, and in the conference they speak and vote in accordance with the views of their respective organizations.

Two delegates, representing governments and one each representing employers and workers are authorized from each country.

In emphasizing the vital role of the ILO in the world today, Secretary Tobin stated, "communism feeds on conditions of poverty and misery. In attacking the source of such conditions and helping eliminate them, the ILO is making a direct contribution toward the strengthening of democracy and freedom. It has become one of the most important international instruments for achieving the social and economic objectives of free peoples everywhere. These objectives are the necessary foundation of a durable and lasting peace. Anything we do to strengthen the ILO and our participation in it is in the interests of the United States."

Recall of Gen. Douglas MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I call the attention of my colleagues to an editorial entitled "General MacArthur," which appeared in the Army-Navy-Air Force Journal on Saturday, April 14. This Journal has been one of the most conservative in our country. It was established during the War Between the States. Personally, I have read it for over a third of a century, and I believe its calm discussion of the case of General MacArthur deserves to be read and studied by all the Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL MACARTHUR

After more than half a century of military service, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur has been relieved of his command. President Truman is not one to countenance opposition placidly and it cannot be denied that he has been provoked by his far-eastern commander. General MacArthur, on his part, has not been one to acquiesce quietly in policies he believed prejudicial to his country. There are ample evidences of this in General MacArthur's long public service. In the thirties when the administration's early economy program sought to reduce the strength of our pitifully small Army, General MacArthur, while Chief of Staff, defied both President Roosevelt and Budget Director Lewis Douglas and worked successfully for the retention of what he considered the irreducible minimum of personnel strength. President Roosevelt doubtless was irked, but the result was to the benefit of the United States. When General MacArthur subsequently was assigned to the Philippine Government as a military adviser, he welcomed the duty as an opportunity to build a strong bastion for our civilization in the Far East. Two years later, with his task just getting underway, President Roosevelt ordered him to take command of the Second Corps Area, then considered the senior Army troop command. Again, the General thwarted his superiors by applying for retirement. Because he had completed 32 years of active service since his graduation from the United States Military Academy, he had a legal right to retirement, so orders to that effect were issued and his recall nullified. He continued with his task in the Philippines in the service of the Philippine Commonwealth. Events justified his efforts to build up the defenses of those islands and to give the new nation the organization with which to fight. With the outbreak of war in the Far East and his recall to active duty in command of the Allied forces there, he never ceased to attack aggressively the enemy, whose tactics, characteristics, and capacities he knew so well, nor did he cease to urge upon Washington, to their visible irritation, the necessity of strengthening his small forces. Again, so great was his progress that his theater, though it had been given consideration secondary to Europe, combined with Admiral Nimitz's central Pacific forces and drove the Japanese to defeat only a few months after the fall of Germany and before the planned diversion of strength from Europe had reached the Far East.

In the general's continued insistence upon what he considers the best policy, he is doing what he thinks best for his country. He has a superb knowledge of people and politics and it cannot be said that he did not foresee the outcome of his course of action. He may well have pursued it to produce a result he felt preferable to acquiescence.

The President said that "full and vigorous debate on matters of national policy is a vital element in the constitutional system of our free democracy." By his action he has boldly opened the way for just such a vigorous discussion. He has laid his case before the people in his statements and his radio address (reported in full text in this issue of the Journal). General MacArthur will return to the States and plead the wisdom of his course. There can be no question as to the sincerity of either. President Truman is perfectly honest in expressing his admiration and respect for General MacArthur's outstanding services to the Nation. He would like to have MacArthur continue but he is more determined that his policies be accepted and respected. General MacArthur is equally adamant in his determination that if there must be a war its conduct should be governed by military concepts. In the final analysis the people, through their elected representatives and by the weight of their expression of public opinion, will decide the ultimate course.

It would appear that the President could have achieved his objective by measures less extreme than relieving General MacArthur of his commands. More precise and complete directives might have been issued to him months ago. A firmer attitude could have been taken earlier and efforts made to reach a clear personal understanding. Even at this late date the President might, for example, have ordered his field commander to Washington for a conference, which would have had the effect of demonstrating to the world the President's authority as Commander in Chief and have emphasized his determination that his policies be pursued.

While the loss of MacArthur's active service is serious and cannot be discounted, the Nation is fortunate in the knowledge that there is no dearth of strong and able leadership in our Armed Forces. Through peace and war, at home and overseas, Generals Ridgway and Van Fleet have demonstrated their capacities for the new responsibilities which have come to them.

There is and will be no relaxation of our pressure upon the enemy in the field nor will any dissent weaken our forces. This may surprise and puzzle the peoples behind the iron curtain, but it is the way and strength of American democracy.

Keeping Faith With Thrift

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Keeping Faith With Thrift," which appeared recently in the Topeka State Journal.

One barometer of economic weather is how much money people try to save. It is encouraging to note that in Kansas thousands of our citizens are participating in the purchasing of United States Savings Bonds.

Savings bonds purchased in Kansas totaled over eight and one-half million dollars in the month of March, and approximately twenty-three and one-fourth million in the first quarter of this year.

It is most encouraging to note that there are still some people who believe in thrift and industry. This is especially true at a time when the world seems to be punch drunk in a period of inflation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEEPING FAITH WITH THRIFT

One barometer of economic weather is how much money people try to save. One index of savings is the continuing purchase of United States savings bonds. It is interesting to see what Kansas counties are doing.

For the month of March, if we take the counties with total sales of series E, F, and G bonds topping one-quarter of a million dollars, the ranking is in this order: Sedgwick, Shawnee, Wyandotte, Cowley, and Reno. Series E bonds are the big item, accounting for approximately 80 percent of March sales (70 percent in the first quarter of 1951). Savings bonds purchases in Kansas totaled over $8,500,000 in March, and approximately $23,250,000 in the first quarter.

Although total sales for the first quarter are down from a year ago, one significant development is noted. According to State savings bonds headquarters here, there is a continued gain in payroll savings participation nationally. "This is reflected in a sharp rise in the number of $25 and $50 series E bonds purchased," says the latest report. "For example, the number of $25 bonds purchased in January increased 18 percent over January last year, and $50 denominations gained 9 percent."

The continuing emphasis seems to be on bond purchases through payroll savings arrangements, through which wage earners set aside regular amounts for savings out of paychecks.

What does that mean?

Regular and rising purchases especially of low denomination E bonds must mean the wage earner's impulse to save is strong and determined, despite rising taxes and living costs which make saving more difficult. He is still bent on saving something, even if this may mean buying more of the smaller $25 and $50 bonds and fewer of the larger denominations. His saving through purchases of United States savings bonds also must represent his continuing financial support of his country.

As one leading Topeka banker said to us recently, the wage earner deserves more credit than he generally gets for this financial support of his Government through payroll savings. We agree. And we agree with the thought that if the worker thus keeps faith both with his Government and with the ideal of thrift, his Government owes him a great deal more than it is doing to preserve the value of saved dollars.

In these trying days, with inflation's hand in his pocketbook, the wage earner is able to save only by virtue of the most careful management of his finances. He makes an effort. If that saving helps his Government while it helps him to build a degree of self-started security, his Government owes the same careful management of its finances. Even more, it owes a constant, conscientious vigilance to keep inflation from defeating the very purpose of careful management.

The saver, the worker, has not only a right to expect but a right to demand those considerations from his Government. The Federal Establishment can best support its necessary pleas to the people to invest in United States savings bonds by supporting the necessary worth of United States dollars.

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, the Congress has not declared war. We are not legally at war anywhere on the globe. President Truman has not declared war. He is the guardian and protector of world peace.

I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a dispatch by Jim G. Lucas, correspondent of the Washington Daily News, which describes the "peace" our foreign policy has achieved in Asia.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON CENTRAL KOREAN FRONT, May 1.—This is the kind of story no man enjoys writing. Maybe it shouldn't be written.

You see, I spent the day in front of our lines helping pick up our dead. They told me I shouldn't go. They said I'd be shot at and there'd be mortars, and they were right. I didn't want to go.

But I went because I wanted to know more about war's pay-off—about those who don't come back until someone goes after them.

TRY TO FIND 'EM

Bill Leblanc, Graves Registration sergeant from New Orleans, said he didn't know what to expect when we started out.

"One of the worst things about retreating," he said, "is that you can't bring back your dead. We try to find 'em."

Soldiers shy away from Graves Registration people. They call its men grave diggers. Every man in the unit has the same nickname, "digger." The soldiers make the Graves Registration the butt of all sorts of crude jokes.

"That's because they're scared; because they know it's this way all the time," Sergeant Leblanc said.

EDGED INTO DITCH

For the first 8 miles nothing happened. Pvt. Antonio Pantohin, of Honolulu, at the wheel pushed steadily ahead. The road was jammed with trucks, tanks, artillery, and kitchens. Twice we were edged into a ditch.

After a while traffic thinned. At mile No. 11 mortar shells dropped behind us.

At mile 19 we arrived at a battalion command post. Our truck moved off the road into a rice paddy. Three blanket-wrapped bodies lay beside another truck.

LETTER STILL UNOPENED

We jumped out and quickly went to work. The first was a thin-faced, good-looking boy of 20 or 21. He'd been shot through the side, bled a lot. We emptied his pockets. A lighter, a package of Camels, a Gruen Curvex bracelet, and a letter from home—still unopened.

You do what you can—and find yourself getting sick inside. Here a kid who was alive when you ate dinner last night; a kid who picked up a package of Camels intending to smoke 'em and never got to break the seal; a kid who probably wanted to wait until he could read that letter where no one could see how much it meant.

The next wasn't more than 18. He still looked like a choir boy. Maybe he used the cuss words soldiers use because it made him feel like a man, but if he did they must have come awkwardly.

A mortar did it to him. If he'd lived he'd have been a quadruple amputee. His legs and arms were gone. The body was still warm.

SAME ODDS AND ENDS

His pockets produced the same odds and ends—a package of Lucky Strikes, another of Old Golds, a lighter, a ridiculously decorated wallet with a 10, a 5, and 3 ones, a package of Star razor blades. And the inevitable letters from home.

The third was an older man, who obviously died in pain. His right arm was thrown over his head. Froze there.

Our work was just begun. The Chinese had ambushed an aid station 7 miles up the road less than an hour ago. They killed the doctor and grenaded the wounded. One ambulance had escaped but after moving a mile toward safety it had been machine gunned.

The driver was killed. A wounded man sitting beside him pushed the body from the cab and came on in.

FOUND DRIVER

There was no traffic. For more than a mile we ran a gantlet of mortar and rifle fire. But we kept going.

After 6 miles we found the driver. There was no time to go through his pockets. We put him in back of the truck and kept going.

"Keep your eyes peeled for that aid station," Sergeant Leblanc said. "It's just off the road."

We found it. Every man began loading dead. Time was precious.

DEAD DON'T SCARE

"Fifteen," the sergeant said finally. "That's our load."

We turned and headed back. A rifle bullet tore into our truck. Fortunately it hit a dead man. The dead were the only ones who weren't scared.

Five hours after we left we got back. A dozen or more soldiers—silent, grim-faced, tight-lipped—stood and watched as we unloaded. They seemed angry, almost as if they blamed us for what they saw.

"You get used to it," Sergeant Leblanc said. "We know they hate us at times like this. Can't blame them. We stick pretty much to ourselves. We don't worry about that. What worries us is that there are still more up there. Want to go again this afternoon?"

I still don't know whether this story should be written. It isn't pretty. But this much I do know; until you've seen it you don't know very much about war. Because this is the payoff.

Tribute to the Minnesota Farmers Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I have written to the president of the Minnesota Farmers Union, expressing my confidence in the farm people of my State who are members of that organization.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 2, 1951.

Mr. EDWIN CHRISTIANSON,
President, Minnesota Farmers Union,
Willmar, Minn.

DEAR MR. CHRISTIANSON: It has come to my attention that wide circulation is being given in Minnesota to statements reflecting upon membership of the Farmers Union.

I consider this to be unfair. There is simply no doubt but that the rank-and-file membership of the Minnesota Farmers Union consists of patriotic citizens. Minnesota farmers are good Americans and I want you to know that I resent any reflection upon them.

To farmers, communism has no appeal. Minnesota farmers, well aware of what has been done in Russia and the satellite countries to those engaged in agriculture, see no attractions in the Communist program.

I think the Farmers Union of Minnesota is doing an excellent job in promoting better farming practices and improved conditions for farm families. This attests to the truly American character of your purposes.

I want to repeat the public statement which I made on September 16, 1950, as follows: "Many of our finest and best citizens of Minnesota are members of the Farmers Union."

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. THYE,
United States Senate.

Questions for MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, as the Senate Armed Services Committee begins the hearings on those questions which led to the removal of General MacArthur from his position in Korea, many questions will occur to citizens which they would like to see asked.

Among others there has been a splendid letter to the Washington Post suggesting certain questions for General MacArthur. It was written by Elton Atwater, associate professor of political science at Pennsylvania State College. I think the questions are worth preserving, and I trust that during the hearing when General MacArthur appears they may be presented to him in the hope that a complete answer on these questions may be given to the American people.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS FOR MACARTHUR

General MacArthur's belief that his objectives for the Far East can be achieved by only a limited war with Communist China and by relatively little additional cost to the United States seems to overlook many pertinent factors. Before anyone accepts this theory, he would do well to consider the following questions. Members of Congress, in particular, who are concerned lest their role in foreign policy be further diminished, should seek answers to them.

1. The general said in his message to Congres, "In war there is no substitute for victory." Does he mean by victory a settlement of the Korean problem along the lines recommended by the United Nations last fall? Or does he mean the destruction of communism in China or in Asia as a whole?

2. If one assumes, for the sake of the discussion, that he means the settlement of the Korean problem, what then is his purpose in recommending the invasion of the Chinese mainland by Chinese Nationalist forces with logistical support from the United States?

3. If the second question is answered by saying that the invasion of the Chinese mainland would create a second front and thereby increase the likelihood of a Communist defeat in Korea, it at once poses the following question: If these operations should succeed in forcing the Peiping regime to accept a Korean settlement along United Nations lines, what do we then do about Chiang Kai-shek's forces which are fighting on the Chinese mainland with our support? Do we abandon them after a Korean settlement is achieved, or do we continue supporting them?

4. Would Chiang Kai-shek ever start his troops on an invasion of the mainland if he thought we would abandon him as soon as the Korean war ended? Could we afford politically to abandon him once we had helped him start his operations?

5. If, as would seem likely, the answers to question four are "No," then does not General MacArthur's program actually commit us to a virtually unlimited intervention in a renewed Chinese civil war?

6. How many allies could we count upon for such a program? What would be the political effects of such a program upon the peoples of Asia? Is not Chiang Kai-shek generally discredited in their eyes?

7. Could the Chinese Nationalist forces now on Formosa gain a complete victory over the Chinese Communist forces with only naval and air support from United States?

8. Would the Soviet Union be able to permit such a victory over communism in China without intervening? In this connection, one might recall that when General MacArthur's "victory" in Korea was almost complete last November, the Chinese Communists entered the war.

9. Is it not reasonable to assume that if the United States or the United Nations undertake "limited war" against Communist China, the Soviet Union, which has an alliance with Peiping, will extend "limited aid" to that regime?

10. If the Soviet Union should give "limited aid" to the Peiping regime, would we not find that our hands were still "tied behind our back" because we would have no authority to bomb Soviet supply bases in Siberia, just as we now are tied by lack of authority to bomb north of the Yalu River?

11. How, therefore, can General MacArthur's concept of victory be achieved without ultimately involving the Soviet Union in the conflict and precipitating a third world war?

12. General MacArthur appears to see no alternative between complete victory and what he terms "appeasement." What does he mean by appeasement? Does he use it synonymously with the term, "negotiation"? Does he rule out all possibility of some form of settlement in which both sides get something and give something?

ELTON ATWATER.

STATE COLLEGE, PA.

Gratitude to Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER C. HUNT
OF WYOMING
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very excellent editorial written by R. F. MacPherson, editor of the Wyoming Eagle, and published in the April 20 edition of that paper.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A few years ago we saw one of the guys who won the war. We were down at the Union Pacific station when a train came in. The usual crowd was around the station when he arrived. His father and mother were there to meet him.

He didn't look like a hero and he didn't make a big fuss like he was one. He was on crutches and he wasn't used to them. He had some difficulty getting around.

One leg was missing.

He acted sort of embarrassed, like he didn't want to be noticed or fussed with. After the first greetings he seemed anxious to get out of there, to get away from the crowd, to get in the car and go home.

No brass bands, no flags, no fireworks.

After all, Cheyenne was his home town. He had to begin to figure out ways and means of getting on in the world, to face the fact that it might not be so easy—with a leg missing. As he left the station a man many of you know remarked: "There goes the guy who won the war."

They may be seen everywhere—these guys who won the war. They're not all like the veteran we saw on Seventeenth Street in Denver a while back. He had a child by the hand and a young woman, undoubtedly his wife, was leading him by the arm.

He had on colored glasses. He was blind.

But he was smiling and able to be happy. Not much to be happy about, according to normal standards. But he was alive and surrounded by loved ones, and if he felt that life had been cruel to him, he didn't show it. He'd make out. Ovations meant nothing to him.

They're not all like that, thank heaven. Out of the thousands upon thousands who shipped out to foreign battlefields, not many came back crippled. Not many, comparatively speaking, lost arms and legs and eyes, or were otherwise shot up.

So many bore wounds that could not be seen, and of which they do not speak. They do not like to talk about the emergency treatment in first-aid stations, the agonizing trips to base hospitals, the careful probing by skilled surgeons, the constant care of top-flight doctors. These men who won the war don't talk about the blackness of the darkness that hung over their pain-ridden beds, the despair, the uncertainty, and of the long weeks or months that would elapse until they could return home.

Then there is the multitude whose bodies do not show a scratch, but whose minds are filled with memories that are as painful as wounds. It may have been a plunge through the waters to the beach under a hail of bullets. It may be memories of a bayonet charge, of hand-to-hand combat, of flame throwers and bursting bombs.

It may be thoughts of a crouching prowl up a dirty street, with enemy snipers in windows or on housetops. Or it may be memories of endless time spent in dugouts, in muddy ditches, in endless rain, in freezing weather, and of the nights on the front lines when a machine gun might spit death and a hand grenade would explode and blow a head off.

They are the men who knew how to take orders, even if it led to death.

It's hard to describe a thing a person has never seen or felt, a thing which those who won the war refuse to talk about. News dispatches tell of an encounter here or there, and photographers have picked out some of the more gory scenes that portray the horror—and the glory—of war. But not one-thousandth of 1 percent of the individual acts of heroism, of bravery beyond the line of duty, of fear and agony and hopelessness will ever be described or photographed or recorded.

And when it was over and the men returned, it was singly or in groups. Rarely, and then only momentarily, was the return a matter of public recognition. They came back and picked up the threads of their broken lives, nursed their wounds, and carried on in the best way they could.

Occasionally one would wear a pin or possess a bit of ribbon to indicate that he was one of those who won the war. But he didn't brag. Most of them dropped off the train and were swallowed up by the crowd. That was their triumph.

We see by the papers that they've been having monstrous celebrations in San Francisco and New York. They were celebrating victory in a war that never has ended, celebrating a peace that never has been attained. No doubt they were magnificent spectacles. The salutes, the bands, the flags and bunting, the cheers, the crowds.

Somehow we wish the armless, the legless, sightless, and otherwise injured veterans had been there to participate—to receive the plaudits of the multitude. Somehow, we wish the maimed veterans in the many Army, Navy, and veterans' hospitals could have been transported to Market Street and to Broadway to be so signally honored. Those whose return had been barely noticed.

But perhaps these men who won the war did not want it that way. They know that taps have not been sounded for the war in which they fought. They know their sons and brothers are in Korea today, enduring the same terrors of mind, the same agonies of body, the same hopelessness which they and their comrades endured. They know, that but for the grace of God, other millions will tread the same lonely, miserable, discouraging path they trod. Some of them who are in hospitals may be fearing the day when a boy from Korea will come in and say, "Move over, let me lie down."

Perhaps they choose to wait until peace is won and life is made secure for all. Some may think all this celebrating is premature, out of time, inappropriate, when we appear to be on the verge of an even more bloody massacre. How, they may figure, can there be a triumph when there has been no real triumph?

One of these days, whether you live in Chugwater, Hanna, Pine Bluffs, or some other Wyoming community, you will have an opportunity to put on a one-man celebration. Go down to the station when a veteran is to arrive from Korea. He may not be decked out with gold braid, brass hat, or ribbons. He may not be minus a leg, an arm, or an eye. But if he's from the front lines he's had it.

Meet him and greet him. He is an American fighting man—the man who has won all of America's wars. You won't have to go out of town to see him.

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from a young American Army officer in Korea. There is nothing I can add to the picture it gives of the disillusionment of our men fighting in the "peace" in Korea.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOKYO, JAPAN, April 10, 1951.

MY DEAR MOM AND DAD: You may think it peculiar that I should take precious leave time to write such a letter as I intend to write, but I've wanted to do so for some time and feel strongly enough about it to give up time even more precious than these 5 days. I write these things to you because I know they could never be published and I know that you can quote your son-in-law's personal letters to anyone you please. Of course, what I feel and what I say may never make a particle of difference, but I wouldn't be a true American if I didn't feel and say these things.

Let me precede my remarks by saying that I'm on 5-day leave. About 2 weeks before I came over here and the day before we began our big push to the parallel, several of my men came to me and asked me what they were fighting for in Korea. As a company commander, I thought it my responsibility to give them cause, so I tried. But I became hopelessly involved. I became involved because the reason wasn't clear cut to me. Then they asked me, "If I'm going to fight Chinese tomorrow, why can't we bomb their Manchurian bases tonight?" Again, I had no answer and yet these same men were expected to face Chinese bullets the next day.

We are told that there is no end in sight to the war. No new troops have been committed since the Chinese entered. Are we fighting for time to rearm? If so, why can't we be told. That is incentive. American soldiers won't buy an endless war, not even with rotation. They may see their buddy taken prisoner one day and realize there is no hope for his recapture. American soldiers don't understand that and yet they are expected to give their utmost.

When I first came over here, I wrote that I had no cause. I'm yet to find one. Of course, I'm a professional soldier. I'll fight because I'm ordered to do so, but our Army is not a professional one and it has to be told why.

About 3 days before I left to come over here we began an offensive which carried us about 3,000 yards across the parallel. In 2 days my regiment suffered 180 casualties which is a very high percentage. Men asked me, "Why are we crossing the parallel? We can't bomb China so we can go just so far and then we'll be pushed back." They're right. Sometimes, even I get so hopelessly muddled that I cannot see a clear path. Of course, I realize that it has to be done and by doing my darndest I may prevent some casualties.

Rotation will help. It will give a man something to look forward to. But it isn't the something which makes him the best possible soldier. Selfishly, I'm looking forward to rotation much more so than I am to engaging or killing Commies, because it means relative safety and reunion with my family. (This lad has been in Korea since September 1950.) Now, if I, an officer, look at it that way, how does Private Doaks see it? You can see what you've got. Maybe I'm different, but I doubt it.

How strong my will would be if I felt I were fighting for the U. S. A. How strong would be the will of the average GI if he felt the United States and not the United Nations were controlling the military operations.

We keep hoping our politicians and newspapers voice hope that the Chinese will negotiate. How can they be so stupid? How can they negotiate when Russia is behind them and why would Russia want them to negotiate? It's all so plain and so foolish. How? Please tell me how Truman can talk of maintaining the peace when there is no peace? How can they talk of preventing a war when there is already a war?

The MacArthur Phenomenon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The MacArthur Phenomenon," written by Frank Hanighen and published in Human Events. Mr. Hanighen warns us:

The MacArthur phenomenon poses the question: Can a leader so warmly acclaimed by the masses continue to confound the machine?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MACARTHUR PHENOMENON

What is the meaning of this extraordinary phenomenon—MacArthur's capture of the American people? For that is obviously what has happened: The populace, spurning the elected leader, turns enthusiastically—in this strange sort of democratic imperium of ours—to the homecoming proconsul. But why? Is the popular vision romantic, beholding the general as Ariel descending to displace what for some time has been Caliban? Perhaps. But it is probably much more complex than that.

The times are troubled. A combination of angry discontents—about taxes, controls, mismanagement at home and abroad—have been distilled by the advent of MacArthur into a resounding protest against the incumbent administration and is alchemized suddenly into cheers for the general. Possibly, at first, MacArthur had little to do with it. Four months ago his stock was low. But—almost like a law of physics—as the prestige of Truman descended, MacArthur's mounted. Something like that happened. We are not sure—for this historic phenomenon is difficult to analyze and may provide arguments for historians for years to come.

There is another way of looking at it. About two decades ago, the ruling business class was ousted and a revolution begun. For nigh on two decades, the new ruling class, the intelligentsia and their allies among the politicians, has shaped foreign as well as domestic policies. By skillful techniques of thought control, and by juggling the two balls of "security" and "foreign danger," the intelligentsia have held the masses and maintained themselves in power. So skillfully have they moved, indeed, that the masses have been lulled to accept the most incredible foreign adventures. But, finally, Korea—the ultimate of these adventures—arrived. And, through its tragic futility, the people have come to see it for what is is: the reductio ad absurdum of our foreign policy.

But how was the protecting shield of thought control pierced? Well, some 250,000 "press agents" in uniform in Korea wrote home and told their story. Meanwhile some magnificent crusades in portions of the press helped, to which were added some persuasive voices from Capitol Hill; and finally plain common sense among the peoplie struggled to the top. Thus was the propaganda web of lies broken. In short something like that helped create the extraordinary phenomenon of the hero's return.

But where is all this going? Will it "fade away"? It is not likely to fade soon. It may set off another revolution to replace that of the last two decades. Or, on the other hand, the highly organized machine of idea control of the intelligentsia might capture, or at least alter it. That machine has beaten the business class for 20 years and may do it again. Its greatest advantage is that the business class has failed to create its own intelligentsia, its own ideas and its own machinery for propagation. Why that is so—is quite another story. Meanwhile, the MacArthur phenomenon poses the question—can a leader so warmly acclaimed by the masses continue to confound the machine?

Enhancement of Ship Values

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Ship Enhancement," which appeared in the Washington Post this morning. I hope the Members of the Senate will heed the warning contained in the editorial, and restore the House amendment when the third supplemental appropriation bill comes before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHIP ENHANCEMENT

The Senate Appropriations Committee has lost a chance to prevent a recurrence of the outrageous mulcting of the Government that took place in the artificial enhancement of ship values during the Second World War. The committee has stricken out of the third supplemental appropriation bill an essential clause suggested by the Maritime Administration and approved by the House. This clause would forbid the payment of sums in excess of the price originally paid to the Government, plus depreciated capital improvements, for vessels sold by the Government and later repurchased or requisitioned. The purpose is to prevent the Government from being stuck for emergency-inflated values of ships which in many instances had been sold to private operators in the first place at absurdly low rates.

A particularly flagrant example of the kind of enhancement the clause is designed to prevent took place during the war. One vessel built by the Government during World War I at a cost of $1,966,000 was sold to a private operator in 1932 for $49,000, or approximately $5 a deadweight ton. Before the Second World War the owner collected mail pay and later an outright operating subsidy of some $139,000. In 1941 the vessel made one lend-lease voyage under Government charter for which the owner collected $326,000. Subsequently the ship was lost at sea, and the Government paid the owner as total loss insurance no less than $727,000, or approximately $75 a deadweight ton. In other words, the owner's profit from the charter and the insurance payment, exclusive of subsidies, was $1,005,000 on a single antiquated ship.

The Comptroller General has spoken out repeatedly against this kind of abuse, and the Maritime Administration deserves full credit for promoting a reform to safeguard the taxpayers' interests. What good reason can there be for depriving the Government of this check against profiteering? We hope that the full Senate will take a close look at the issues and restore this necessary protection.

The War in Korea and the MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two reprints published as a public service by the International Latex Corp. One reprint published in the Washington Post for Friday, April 27, 1951, includes an editorial entitled "Get the Facts" which was originally printed in the Christian Science Monitor, and an editorial entitled "General Dawes," which was originally printed in the Wall Street Journal. The other reprint, published in the New York Times for Tuesday, May 1, 1951, contains an editorial from the Washington Post entitled "Van Fleet's Inspiration," and an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor entitled "Today's Global Struggle."

All of these editorials share a common timeliness, and it is, in my opinion, a distinct public service on the part of International Latex Corp. to bring to the attention of the American people these expressions of informed opinion on current issues.

There being no objection, the reprints were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GET THE FACTS

(An editorial in the Christian Science Monitor)

Isn't it time to call a halt to the guerrilla war over the MacArthur dismissal? We are thinking not only of debate between inflamed and half-informed partisans of the President and the general but of publicity raids by their aides. The unofficial release of official information that at Wake Island the Korean commander was sure China wouldn't come in was, in our opinion, offside. So, too, it seems to us, was General Whitney's complaint that his chief still hasn't the faintest idea why he was dismissed.

The two principals in this unfortunate controversy have stated their positions frankly. Mr. Truman said he had come to the conclusion that the general could not give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States and the United Nations. He further defined these policies as bent on restricting the war if possible to Korea. General MacArthur had publicly objected months ago to orders which barred the bombing of Chinese bases. Before Congress he pleaded eloquently for more aggressive measures, indicating that he considered present policies appeasement.

The two cases have thus been laid out. The next step should be a show-down before a congressional committee where the whole background of the dispute can be bared. These hearings should be aimed primarily at hammering out a firm policy in the Far East. It will apparently be necessary to go into the reasons for the dismissal, but we trust there will be no smearing on either side.

The hearings should be held as soon as possible, for until they are held there is danger that partisan, biased, inflammatory statements will keep the guerrilla war going. Smearing will be less easy before a committee where smearers can be questioned and exposed. Certainly more satisfactory explanations of the basic differences between the Joint Chiefs of Staff and General MacArthur are urgently needed.

The situation calls imperatively for less heat and more light. The light may come from committee hearings or from events in Korea. Until it comes, violent partisans on either side may well reflect that new facts or events might change their position. If the Communists should switch from the defensive to the offensive in the air, there would be few advocates of continued restrictions on U. N. air forces. If trouble should break out elsewhere, particularly in Iran or Yugoslavia, there would be few advocates of extensive war in China.

GENERAL DAWES

(An editorial in the Wall Street Journal)

A great many people will remember Charles G. Dawes as the man who blew up a congressional investigation by pounding the table and shouting "Hell 'n Maria."

The fact is that General Dawes was a public servant and a statesman of high order.

Long after he retired from public life we sat in a little group where the discussion turned on international affairs, and General Dawes spoke from the experience of having been Ambassador to Great Britain and the head of the American delegation which took part in the negotiation of the Dawes plan, one of the landmarks in the settlements after the First World War. We recall one of his statements:

"Successful international negotiations must begin," he said, "with the representatives of each nation having uppermost in mind the interest of their own nations. Along with that there must be the determination to adjust those interests to the common good of all."

We wondered then and we still wonder if the position of this country and of the world would not be better if some of our later-day negotiators could have absorbed that advice.

VAN FLEET'S INSPIRATION

(An editorial from the Washington Post)

Courage, faith, humility—these are the qualities that stand out in General Van Fleet's first message to his troops. In simple language the new commander of the Eighth Army in Korea has brought encouragement to his soldiers in the face of the Chinese onslaught. He has done more, however, than praise the skill and determination of the United Nations forces and cite their superiority in all but numbers. With a directness which gains additional eloquence by the fact that it comes from the battlefield, he has summarized the larger issues in the fighting:

"You are fighting to stop armed aggression and maintain peace not only in Korea but in your respective homelands. This renewed battle is for the preservation of life, liberty, and the right to the pursuit of happiness of all free men. These are fundamental in the rights of man—the rock upon which our civilization is founded—and they are the first rights which communism denies its own people.

"The time has come when all men of the free and decent world must steel their souls to face the desperate, bitter, and uncompromising battle with armed Communist aggression. Our strength rests on the solid foundation of belief in God and the rights of man rather than on the will of dictators, imposed through cruelty and complete disregard of human rights."

Even in the grimness of war, these words are inspiring to those who hear them, the more so because, as the troops must know, they spring from a deeply religious nature. They tell a lot about the character of a man who uttered them, and they carry a conviction borne of fighting experience and spiritual toughness which must show to the soldiers in Korea that their commander has the quality of leadership.

TODAY'S GLOBAL STRUGGLE

(An editorial from the Christian Science Monitor)

The United States could use another Charles G. Dawes in his prime right now—perhaps a score of him.

Not because he was an unusually able businessman and banker and a generous and perceptive philanthropist. The country has a number of men like that.

Not altogether because he was a public servant of versatility and caliber. Although not many men in any period have filled so many posts so capably: comptroller of the currency under McKinley, chief purchasing officer for the AEF under General Pershing, coauthor with Owen D. Young of the "Dawes plan" for German reparations and European recovery, Vice President with Calvin Coolidge, and ambassador to Great Britain under Warren Harding.

The country could use him because with the strength of all these qualifications he brought to American political life a vigorous independence of thought and speech and a lively partisanship which through a whole-souled forthrightness carried himself and others above the level of the petty. He was never the weak but always the generous adversary.

He broke with the Republican organization in 1919 to support the League of Nations. Fed up with "Monday morning quarterbacks" in Congress, he charged them with trying to show how they could have won the war against the Central Powers "at a 20 percent discount." In answer to a hostile question he blasted at his inquisitors, "I'd have paid horse prices for sheep if the sheep could have hauled artillery."

"This," said he, "was not a Republican or a Democratic war; it was an American war"—a truism which should be obvious enough to everybody (but apparently isn't) as applied to today's global struggle.

Farm Price Parity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Parity on Trial," written by Alfred D. Stedman.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARITY ON TRIAL

(By Alfred D. Stedman)

Fortune magazine now adds a new target to the familiar one of communism. The new target is farm-price parity, or equality with general price-cost levels. Fortune fumes that Congress should knock out the legal principle and let Federal Government power be used to hold farm-price ceilings below parity. It rages that parity is "one of the most shameless samples of special privilege ever written into United States law."

Fortune, when it cools off, might condescend a fresh look at the new versus the old target. For parity and communism are distant strangers. As targets, they're much too far apart to be hit by even a Fortune broadside.

This is especially interesting right now when across the Pacific the land-hungry folk of China, aflame with revolution, are tools and victims in the hands of Communist dictators.

For by contrast, among American farmers who are protected by parity and doing well, the trends are in a deep and true sense conservative. But in the troubled 1920's and stormy 1930's, when farm prices and banks were crashing and farm foreclosures soaring, the trends ran enough the other way to give the jumpier ones of Fortune's readers the heebie-jeebies.

Then, along with farm credits and other aids, the much-maligned principle of farm-price parity was written into law. And things on the farm have been different than before. After World War II, farm prices sagged but didn't crash. Speculators didn't get rich quite so easily buying farm stuff for the rise after slumps. Farm tenancy and foreclosures stopped increasing and waned. Farm living improved. Sure, parity was just one of many factors in this. And sure, its legal definition needs bringing up to date. But if parity were really so awful as Fortune says, this country would have gone to the dogs long ago, instead of getting better.

And now in the presence of our farm prosperity, communism does not thrive here. It won't take root and won't grow in American farm soil. Among our farmers, Communists are as scarce as white blackbirds. They're a foundation of democracy. Why shouldn't they be? After all, the democratic principle of parity and equality is still part of the law of this land.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Last Decoration," written by Judge Kenneth E. Shaw, and published in the Newport Guardian of April 19, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LAST DECORATION

Shortly after midnight on April 11, 1951, America's most distinguished soldier, statesman, and citizen received his final decoration. He had previously received every military honor, ribbon, and medal possible for a grateful Nation to bestow. His had been a lifetime of devotion to the Nation he loved. For his measureless service and limitless love of country he was now about to be further honored by those whom he had served so well. Thus it was that at 1 p. m. he was awarded the medal of coup de grâce as America's grateful tribute for faithful services rendered to his country beyond duty and beyond price.

No Shakespearian tragedy could have rivaled this event for stark-naked realism. It is midnight, a time when human endurance and intelligence are at the lowest of levels. The potion is prepared. The debate is short. The vote is taken. One by one little black balls fall into the box on the table. The deed is done. The award is voted. It is announced to the press so as to reach American homes at dawn, traditional hour for execution of a hero. Thus the anchor rock against which the Communist hordes have beaten in vain has been torn loose from our Asiatic defenses. The man who would not turn his back on Alger Hiss had turned the knife in the back of one of the greatest living Americans.

The award was made by President Truman who had devoted his career to giving away things. Having presented our wealth to Europe, our manhood to the United Nations, and our leadership to Acheson, President Truman presented to Gen. Douglas MacArthur the coup de grâce, as a fitting climax to his long series of tragic and pathetic Presidential blunders. The little man had finally written another letter.

What was the general's crime that he should die at dawn? Was it his unparalleled service to his Nation in three world wars? Was it his immortal defense of the Philippines? Was it his matchless civil administration of postwar Japan that through sheer excellence of execution stands without parallel in more than a thousand years of recorded history? Was it the reverence and respect for America he had instilled into the hearts of all Japanese and other still free Asiatic peoples? Was it his deep concern for the welfare of the sons of his country who were fighting and dying in a nameless conflict 10,000 miles from home?

It could be because his voice, resonant with years of experience in Asia, dared to differ with the architects of Munich and Yalta. It could be because he wished to end the spectacle of American youth dying in the mud and ice of Korea in a conflict which, if the United Nations could prevail, would last as long as America had sons to die. It could be because he felt the overwhelming responsibility for the 10,000 American youth who would never return to their homeland and the hundreds of thousands more who might be left in Korea as a sacrifice to the gods of appeasement.

This attempt to still the voice of Douglas MacArthur recalls the familiar vision of Hitler burning books in an attempt to bury truth by destroying the means of disseminating it.

The boiling fury and rage in the hearts and minds of Americans is not spontaneous emotionalism. It is a measured hatred of an act perpetrated against one, who, more than any American now living, represents the fiber and core of a free and independent Nation.

The removal of General MacArthur has shaken the very cornerstones of this democracy. It has shaken morale as no other event in American history. His voice was a signal beacon of hope and courage shining through the dark recesses of confusion and despair in Washington. We may have lost a great general in the field, but we have gained a great champion at home.

The Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following letter from Señor M. Mora Doldan, leader of the exiled youth of Paraguay. This young Latin American is shocked at the dismissal of General MacArthur for expressing his opinions to his fellow citizens in a country where, he had believed, principles were respected more than high office. He believes our Latin-American friends will not send more soldiers to Korea because they do not trust our foreign policy.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUENOS AIRES, April 12, 1951.

SIR: I regret very much that I cannot express to you my ideas, which I share with many other Latin Americans, in your language, thus putting you to the inconvenience of procuring a translation. I realize that the time which you are able to give to this translation is very limited, but I think it is necessary that you receive the thoughts of a Latin American.

In the Senate you so valiantly pointed out the possibility of the existence of "Communist infiltration." That I believe and so do many others, because otherwise the continuous breakdown of North American foreign policy could not be explained. The Russians have imposed their standard on Berlin. In the United Nations they do as they please, and they withdraw and return and enter and leave. Nobody is able to stump them. So many mistakes have been made that the nations of South America—the North American reserves—refuse to send soldiers to Korea. This in itself means an important warning to you, and the adoption of a policy of isolation would be even worse as it would present the Russians with an opportunity to spread communism that much faster in these countries. North America must go to our part of the world today as a loyal friend and not as someone who is interested (in getting something out of us). The delaying tactics of the Russians ought to be energetically curbed. It ought to be clearly shown that democracy, that is to say, freedom and justice, are what is being fought for. In nowise and in no place ought the American vestpocket-size tyrants to be aided, and loans to the governments which do not respect the norms of those freedom-bringing principles must be refused.

This is the only way in which the people will go to the defense (of others) in whatever corner of the world. The bad governments will be able to send people, that is to say, soldiers; but they will never be able to send men. North America must never enter into pacts with Russia when such action might impair the principles of her democratic doctrine, and must at all times consider first whether or not, if she takes a certain decision, she will thereby affect the others. Your foreign policy ought to be zealously guided by moral principles, not giving in an inch.

Thus, those of us who defend the democratic way of life will be able to say: "Here is the example." Examples have at all times triumphed over nonapplied theory.

Mr. Truman's decision to depose General MacArthur is the most unfortunate decision of our time. Without considering the damage to the morale of the soldiers in the Korean war, it will affect world sentiment, serve as a powerful weapon for people of Communist belief since it has already become impossible to voice views against the President, in a country where facts of this sort ought to serve in order to show that principles are respected rather than offices (posts). General MacArthur still has as a citizen the right to think along with or against the President, as, although he is a military man, he is now fighting not merely soldiers but a whole system which affects not only his troops but the entire world.

I believe that whoever may be in charge of foreign policy of the war ought to permit at all times the "total application" of the western way of life; that is to say, life within a democracy without strings attached. Sooner or later, total war will come, and it is better for North America to depend on men than on unconvinced soldiers. In order to bring this about, the whole western world must lead the democratic way of life as planned. The leaders of the democratic world must be a living example, day by day, acting with sincerity and unselfishness.

The European war was fought to give the people freedom—however, where is freedom today?

Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, etc., to be sure, watch the steps of North America and Russia with keen interest. They, as we, will vote for the side which shows the trait of humanity. They will vote for the policy which is based on facts. For that reason, North America must watch her foreign and domestic policies more than ever.

As an example, I wish to cite my own country, the Republic of Paraguay. There are 700,000 Paraguayans outside of the country and 600,000 within the country. Can you believe that that is good government? I guess you will say "No." However, North America has been aiding and will continue to aid that government. Can you believe that we Paraguayans, not yet Communists, will go to the defense of North America? To be sure, very few will go convinced that they are fighting for an ideal. Furthermore, I must add that in Paraguay there are five women to each man. This brings up a number of social problems of which the Russians are glad to avail themselves.

Do you remember China? No one thought that she would be Communist today. She was not aided; support was withdrawn from her. The same thing is happening in South and Central America.

Mr. Senator, the writer of these lines is a Liberal, a member of the Liberal Party of Paraguay, and today a candidate for the presidency of the Liberal Youth in exile here in Buenos Aires, Republic of Argentina. I gave you these data so that you may have an idea that this opinion is not merely a personal one but the result of close contact with the men in the street, with the misery and grief of many Paraguayan families.

Please accept, dear Mr. Senator of the United States, my best wishes and hopes for seeing more men such as General MacArthur in places of leadership of North American affairs, for the good of your country and of the world.

Sincerely yours,

M. MORA DOLDAN.

Wedemeyer Demoted for Being Right by Those Who Were Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington Daily News:

PROPHET SANS HONOR

In July 1947, President Truman sent Lt. Gen. A. C. Wedemeyer to the Far East with orders to appraise the political, economic, psychological, and military situations—current and projected—in China and Korea.

This was designed as a fact-finding mission to provide a base for future American policy in that area.

General Wedemeyer was instructed to report "your estimate of the character, extent, and probable consequences of assistance which you may recommend, and the probable consequences in the event that assistance is not given."

The requested reports and recommendations were made to the President in September 1947. Subsequent events have revealed their accuracy and foresight. But it is one of the tragedies of history that these reports were suppressed until they were no longer of value in determining American policy.

And, instead of being rewarded for distinguished public service of the highest degree, General Wedemeyer was demoted from his position on the Army General Staff to a relatively less important field command.

The Wedemeyer reports, which presented plans to save China and Manchuria from communism, were suppressed until July 1949. The report on Korea was denied to the public until yesterday. It contained this warning:

"The Soviet-equipped and trained North Korean people's (Communist) army of approximately 125,000 is vastly superior to the United States-organized constabulary of 16,000 Koreans equipped with Japanese small arms. * * * The withdrawal of American military forces from Korea would * * * result in the occupation of South Korea either by Soviet troops, or, as seems more likely, by the Korean military units trained under Soviet auspices." Those units, General Wedemeyer said, maintained active liaison "with the Chinese Communists in Manchuria."

This was written nearly 4 years ago.

To meet this threat, General Wedemeyer recommended a native force in South Korea, "sufficent in strength to cope with the threat from the North," to prevent the "forcible establishment of a Communist government."

Since 70 percent of the Korean population was in the American occupation zone south of the thirty-eighth parallel, the manpower advantage was in our favor, if we had used it. But the sound Wedemeyer proposal was ignored, and, when the predicted invasion began, American troops had to be rushed to the scene because sufficient South Korean troops were not available.

The State Department was responsible for this decision.

Because of its private war with Chiang Kai-shek, the Department had decided to abandon China to the Reds. To be consistent in that position, it also chose to abandon Korea. When that decision was reversed, Americans had to do the fighting. This was the pay-off on the State Department's disastrous flirtation with Mao Tse-tung's "agrarian reformers."

Government Agencies Have Altered Their Estimates of Potential Traffic and Revenue on the St. Lawrence Seaway To Promote Their Arguments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the arguments of proponents of the St. Lawrence seaway are so contradictory as to make the proposal appear absurd according to the following article appearing in the April 30 issue of the New York Times:

SHIFT IN ESTIMATES ON SEAWAY IS SEEN—LOCAL GROUPS ATTACK FIGURES OFFERED AS TO PROBABLE REVENUES AND TONNAGE

Government agencies in the forefront of a decades-old campaign for the St. Lawrence seaway have "arbitrarily" altered their estimates of potential traffic and revenue on the seaway to promote their arguments, it is charged in a comprehensive brief on the subject filed yesterday.

The West Side Association of Commerce, Inc., in a 7,000-word study endorsed by 10 other civic associations and chambers of commerce in this State, declared that the arguments of proponents were "so contradictory as to make the proposal appear absurd." The brief was filed with the Public Works Committee of the House of Representatives, which has conducted hearings on the project in recent weeks.

The New York Board of Trade joined these groups in voicing its opposition to the proposed project. In a 300-word statement also filed with the House committee, the board declared that to proceed with the seaway would be pouring "incalculable sums of American dollars down the world's most enormous drain."

Maintenance of the Port of New York since last May, the statement read, has cost $500,000,000. In comparison, it continued, ultimate costs of the St. Lawrence seaway would run into the "tens of billions." In New York alone 10 percent of the population would be directly and adversely affected should the project be completed, the report asserted.

STUDY REQUIRED 2 MONTHS

James W. Danahy, vice president of the association, said the study took 2 months and involved research through 2,600 pages of testimony before Congress. It is in the form of rebuttal testimony, employing figures used by the Department of Commerce and other agencies and groups that have pressed for the seaway channel.

Analyzing alleged inconsistencies in seaway traffic estimates, the association said that the Department of Commerce's own figures on seaway business started out at 25,000,000 tons annually, as of 1941 computations, and that the Department, as the debate progressed, had "raised its sights" steadily to the point where Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer offered an "indicated" potential traffic from 57,000,000 to 84,000,000 tons a year.

The latter estimate came after a tolls-paying and self-supporting feature was added in 1947, and it "became obvious to the Department of Commerce that the seaway could not be made to appear self-supporting" on the old tonnage estimates, the brief declares.

CAPACITY ESTIMATE RECALLED

Mr. Danahy said that the 25,000,000-ton estimate had been made originally by the Corps of Engineers, as a full-capacity figure, based on the Welland Canal lock system.

On the question of revenue from tolls, the brief "speaks of the amazing spread in the estimates of proponents" on grain and ore traffic. Toll revenue estimates by grain experts have ranged from $4,000,000 to $15,000,000 annually.

"The Department of Commerce gives an estimated potential traffic of iron ore as 30,000,000 to 37,500,000 tons, but George M. Humphrey, president of the M. A. Hanna Co., and also president of Iron Ore Co. of Canada, which controls the Labrador ore, stated that the first ore shipments from Labrador would start in 1956 and would reach 10,000,000 tons in 8 years," the brief continues. "He made no estimate of any subsequent increase. From what source will the other 20,000,000 to 27,500,000 tons come? Certainly not from Venezuela, whose ore is being shipped to Philadelphia and Baltimore for eastern steel plants."

The association brief also attacks the seaway project as needed for national defense, quoting a number of military experts on the high requirements of men and material to defend the sea route and on the ease with which it could be attacked.

On the effect of the seaway on United States shipping the association reminded Congress of authoritative figures showing that only 364 or 365 United States vessels with full loads could use the project and of a Maritime Commission report that 5,194 foreign-flag vessels had a draft of sufficient shallowness to permit passage.

Another antiseaway review to be filed with the congressional committee was made public in New York yesterday by Ira U. Cobleigh, representing the New York Towboat Exchange and the Harbor Carriers of the Port of New York, comprising more than 100 small business concerns providing vital towing and barge services in the port of New York.

Mr. Cobleigh called the project a billion-dollar boondoggle and a king-sized Passamaquoddy. New York, with 400 deepwater piers, 500 miles of water front, 8 railway terminals, efficient labor forces, and billions of dollars in water-front improvements and highways, handled 70 percent of the American military cargo in World War I and 60 percent of Europe-bound war goods in World War II, he declared.

Under the St. Lawrence seaway plan, he warned, New York would be expected to "slow down and stand by" for 7 months of the year when the seaway would operate ice-free, and then "resume full blast" for the 5 months when ice closed the St. Lawrence. No port could operate under such impossible conditions, he added.

A Southerner at Heart, of Good Old Southern Stock, Tom Heflin Was Born After the War Between the States and at a Time When the Clashing of Sabers, the Rattle of Musketry, and the Roar of Cannons Had Hardly Died

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the people of our great Southland in particular and the American people in general were advised Sunday of the passing of one of the most beloved men that ever served this Nation in the Halls of Congress.

The Honorable Senator James Thomas Heflin, who served with us here in Congress for more than 20 years, has now gone to that bourne from which no traveler ever returns.

Mr. Speaker, howsoever we may differ in our creeds, be they religious or political; howsoever we may differ in our race, the country of our origin, or the color of our skins, the heritage of our birth, or whether we be rich or whether we be poor, all contemplative-minded men will agree that Tom Heflin spoke from the book of life as it was given him to see and as he saw it.

Of a certainty, I did not agree with everything that Tom Heflin said or did any more than does any Member of this Congress sitting on either end of the Capitol necessarily agree in toto with what any other man says, or believes, or does, in the Halls of Congress.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, there were times in which I felt a wide divergence of thought between myself and my almost life-long friend, the announcement of whose demise was dispatched to me as the dean of the Alabama delegation to Congress from the little town of Lafayette in Alabama.

Permit me to reiterate that while I did not agree in toto with what Tom Heflin or any of you all might say, I loved him as a friend, respected him as a great American citizen, and would fight to my death for his right to speak what he held to be the truth.

Mr. Speaker, Tom Heflin was a southerner at heart, born of good old southern stock in Randolph County, Ala., in 1869, after the War Between the States, and at a time when the clashing of sabers, the rattle of musketry, and the roar of cannons had hardly died.

A great student of history, Tom Heflin was an educated and cultured man.

He was a graduate of the Southern University at Greensboro, Ala., as well as of the Agricultural and Mechanical College, at Auburn, Ala., and was admitted to the practice of law when but 24 years of age.

One needs no lively imagination to understand the experiences of a young man of 24 living in that era while serving as mayor of the little town of Lafayette in which he died.

His was a long and an honorable career. Mayor of Lafayette in 1893 and 1894, register in chancery from 1894 to 1896, he resigned as chancellor to become a member of the Democratic State executive committee, on which he served from 1896 to 1902. He then became a member of the State constitutional convention in 1901, was elected secretary of State in Alabama in 1902, and then elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-eighth Congress in 1904, wherein he served in eight succeeding Congresses, or until 1920.

Mr. Speaker, I need not recall to you the day that Tom Heflin quit his seat here in this House, and announced himself as candidate for the United States Senate, to fill the place vacated by another great son of Alabama, the never-to-be-forgotten and beloved John H. Bankhead, the first.

In a special article written by Edward T. Folliard, special correspondent of the Washington Post, Mr. Folliard said, in part:

For years the tourists who came to Washington asked to see Senator Tom Heflin just as surely as they asked to see the White House, the Washington Monument, or the Lincoln Memorial.

A big fellow, 6 feet 2 inches tall, with amazingly blue eyes, he presented the appearance of an old-school southern colonel, wearing a starched shirt, stiff collar with flowing tie, a white vest, a cutaway coat, and striped trousers.

Never at a loss for words, he could talk for hours, and often did. As a story-teller, he was without a peer on Capitol Hill. It was this gift that did much to keep Tom in Congress for nearly 40 years. * * *

One of his most important economic crusades gave rise to Senator Tom's fight against W. P. G. Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The Senator charged that Harding's policies had caused a depression among the cotton farmers. Starting this fight when he was a Member of the House, he continued it when he went to the Senate in 1920, and while he did not succeed in having Harding removed, nevertheless, Harding was not renominated to the Board when his term expired.

From one of the oldest and most respected newspapers in Alabama, my own home-town paper, the Mobile Register, I quote below an editorial appearing in the April 24 issue:

FORMER SENATOR HEFLIN

In his long career in public life, former United States Senator J. Thomas Heflin, who died Sunday at the age of 82 years, attracted many ardent followers and created many severe critics.

Whatever history's ultimate appraisal of his career, he was one of the most picturesque figures who ever served in Congress. This characteristic and his rich gift of oratory gave him a bearing in debate which few colleagues equaled.

When "Cotton Tom," as he came to be widely known, was in the height of form as a debater on Capitol Hill in Washington or a stump speaker in politics back home, he was a spellbinder. Whether one warmly agreed or violently disagreed with what he said, none must have denied that he was a picturesque orator of ability.

Although not an active political factor in Alabama for a number of years, a figure as colorful as he was, who served in Congress as long as he did and became the political storm center that he did is not soon forgotten. Death itself will not cause such a man to be soon forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, I can see Tom Heflin now as I saw him more than 40 years ago—huge, friendly, helpful—a good friend and a foeman worthy of any man's steel.

The memory of Tom Heflin, his service to his congressional district as well as to the State of Alabama in the Senate of the United States, will live forever enshrined in the hearts and memories of all southerners as long as our South survives.

Difference Between MacArthur's Views on China and Those of His Republican Supporters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following article from the Christian Science Monitor of April 26, 1951, which points out that the views expressed by General MacArthur on China are not in conformity with those of any of the self-proclaimed Republican authorities on the Far East:

STATE OF THE NATION—MACARTHUR'S VIEWS ON CHINA

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

WASHINGTON.—All of us have been so quick to see General MacArthur's differences with the administration over foreign policy that we have overlooked two places where he startled his Republican supporters by agreeing with the administration.

One place was where he said that "the President's decision to intervene in support of the Republic of Korea * * * proved a sound one."

Far more startling was General MacArthur's estimate of the why and wherefore of what is happening in China.

It has been Republican doctrine for some time now that Communist China is a Russian puppet; that we must look to Moscow to find the hand which pulls the strings in Peiping; that we are dealing in China with another manifestation of Russian communism.

It has been State Department theory for an even longer period of time that the new regime in China is more the product of native forces than of Russian manipulators and that there is a chance worth preserving for future possible exploitation that the leaders in Communist China are more Chinese than they are Communist.

Note what General MacArthur said on this subject:

"At the turn of the century under the regime of Chang Tso-lin efforts toward greater homogeneity produced the spark of a nationalist urge. This was further and more successfully developed under the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek, but has been brought to its greatest fruition under the present regime to the point that it has now taken on the character of a united nationalism of increasingly dominant, aggressive tendencies.

"This has produced a new and dominant power in Asia which, for its own purposes, is allied with Soviet Russia but which in its own concepts and methods has become aggressively imperialistic. * * *

"There is little of the ideological concept one way or another in the Chinese make-up."

General MacArthur did not proceed from this basic theory to the same conclusions which State Department policy makers have drawn from it, but the theory is close to that of the State Department. In fact, General MacArthur's words go further than the State Department ever has gone in identifying the political complexion of today's China as being native nationalism rather than international communism.

In State Department doctrine nationalism is only an important element which might at some time become dominant. In MacArthur theory nationalism is the dominant element and Red China's leaders are associated with Soviet Russia momentarily only because "their interests are at present parallel with those of the Soviet."

I think it is accurate to say that the MacArthur view as expressed in these passages is closer to the Owen Lattimore view than is that of the State Department. The MacArthur view is certainly poles apart from the theory formulated by Dr. Walter Judd, by Alfred Kohlberg, by Senator Knowland, of California, by the Henry Luce publications, and by such others of like persuasion who have molded Republican thinking on the subject.

The question left behind by the MacArthur theory is whether it is sound strategy for the United States to expand the area of its war with China. If China is a Russian puppet, then making more war on China would in theory weaken Russia. But if Red China is a vital independent nationalism, then does it follow that it is wise for the United States to engage an increasing amount of its own military strength in war with China while Russia sits on the sidelines growing relatively stronger as the United States grows relatively weaker?

General MacArthur appears to regard nationalism in China as a reason for more war with China. The State and Defense Departments incline to think that the MacArthur theories are in themselves reasons for avoiding more war with China and attempting, rather, to drive wedges between Chinese nationalism and Russian imperialism.

But the political fact remains that General MacArthur has taken two positions which run counter to the recent trend of Republican thinking and give the administration more comfort than it had expected from the general.

The Far Eastern Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REVA BECK BOSONE
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from The Provo Sunday Herald and an article by Frank C. Robertson, both of April 22, 1951:

KNOWN FACTS FAIL TO SHOW CHIANG COULD BE MUCH HELP

Another great debate, this time over far-eastern policy, is getting under way. Calm reason and respect for fact ought to play a larger role in this public discussion than was true in the troops-for-Europe argument.

As an example, take the case of Chiang Kai-shek, leader of the Chinese Nationalist forces based on Formosa. The notion exists among many Americans that he commands a large, fairly well-equipped army which is in a fighting mood and needs only a signal from the West to jump into Korea or invade mainland China to help us bring the Korean war to a speedy end.

It is virtually suggested that American lives are being wasted through failure to tap this reservoir of trained military manpower close to the fighting scene.

What are the known facts?

First, though some estimates of Chiang's army run as high as 800,000 men, most military observers put the figure closer to 400,000. This is not a big army, but it is larger than the American force now in the field in Korea.

The Nationalist Army is not well equipped. Chiang's chief American adviser, Admiral Charles Cooke, retired, former Seventh Fleet commander, several months ago guessed it would take $250,000,000 in equipment to outfit this force for combat. With prices still spiraling, the cost unquestionably would be higher today. It might hit $300,000,000.

The morale of Chiang's troops is pretty much an unknown quantity. Though supplied with a lot of American equipment, his forces fighting on the mainland right after World War II did not acquit themselves well against the Chinese Reds. The present army has been held together on Formosa with difficulty over a 2-year span. It is not battle-tested.

It is wholly possible that with adequate equipment this army might give a good account of itself. But there is no way of knowing that in advance. Those who assure us the Nationalists would fight successfully are guessing, since no facts exist on the matter.

Let's suppose we should give the word to Chiang to invade China proper. He has no air force worthy of the name and no fleet of consequence. Only the United States could provide the necessary sea-air cover to protect a mainland landing. And since air operations would necessarily involve bombing shore installations, troop concentrations, communications, and other facilities, it is hard to see how such assistance could do anything but immerse this country in a wider war with China.

Russia, of course, has a mutual defense pact with China. No one not inside the Kremlin knows whether she would honor the obligation to assist Mao Tse-tung if we gave Chiang the sea-air cover for a mainland assault.

Senator TAFT says such an attack would not bring in Russia and lead to general war. One wonders how he can know what the Soviet reaction would be, unless he is privy to Stalin's secrets. Obviously, since the defense pact exists, a very grave risk would be taken of precipitating a big war.

This is not an attempt to decide whether we ought to take that risk. That is for the American people to decide, acting through their elected representatives. But at least they should make their judgment in full knowledge of what is involved, and in full appreciation of what sort of instrument Chiang's army might be in a wider fight against communism.

Nothing known up to this moment suggests that Chiang would be ready to fight quickly, or guarantees that his forces would fight well, or assures us that his entry would shorten the far eastern war rather than lengthen and broaden it. It is the facts, and the facts alone, that lead to this conclusion.

THE CHOPPING BLOCK

(By Frank C. Robertson)

General MacArthur has long been accused of having an "emperor" complex. If true, the fawning adulation of the multitudes whipped up by the little stirrup bearers of press and radio must confirm him in his belief that he is bigger than the President of the United States, the Constitution, and the United Nations together.

The cleverly worded broadcasts and columns by the MacArthur worshipers contrive to make the charge, without actually saying so, that MacArthur was discharged because he wouldn't play ball with the Communists, and the innuendo is that the President and the State Department are in sympathy with communism. Millions of unthinking people have accepted that, with the result that this Nation is torn by more internal bitterness than at any time since the Civil War.

If the stirrup bearers want to divide this Nation to make way for a dictator, the "man on a white horse," and end forevermore our democratic form of government they have done their job well. They have said without qualm that President Truman, the State Department, and the General Staff should have resigned their authority under the Constitution, and allowed the policies of this Government to be shaped by General MacArthur alone.

They have ignored the fact that MacArthur's discharge was recommended by such men as Generals Marshall, Bradley, Collins, and Admiral Sherman. They have ignored the fact that MacArthur's views run counter to those of another great popular hero, General Eisenhower. They have scoffed at the idea that we would have anything to lose if the other nations in the United Nations turn against us because they cannot swallow MacArthur's determination to force another world war.

Is it that they really think MacArthur is infallible and indispensable, or are they using him to build hate against the administration so that their lords and masters can come to political power? The little stirrup bearers, the columnists, and radio commentators who are whipping the public into frenzy would not even be noticed if it were not for the cynical figures of TAFT, MARTIN, and WHERRY, and a few others behind them.

Nothing like it has been seen in this country since the days of Andrew Johnson. Yet time has proved that Andrew Johnson was right and his traducers wrong. Time and history may say the same thing for Harry Truman.

What about this man MacArthur? No one denies that he has been a great soldier. No one denies that he has done a good job in Japan. But that does not make a demigod. So, too, have Marshall, Bradley, and Eisenhower been great soldiers. MacArthur had no more to do with winning the war against Japan than did Admiral Nimitz, yet he got all the glory by the simple means of maintaining a staff of press agents to glorify MacArthur, and a rigid censorship to suppress anything unfavorable to him. You read of many brilliant officers and their achievements in the European theater of war, but how many can you remember who fought under MacArthur? Had Eisenhower adopted MacArthur's tactics you wouldn't have known of the generals under him either. The simple truth is the man has glorified and dramatized himself all through his career until he has come to believe that he is indeed greater than his Government. We are asked to forget or deny that he ever made a mistake, and to believe that we have only to believe in MacArthur to be saved.

Americans have always fought shy of a military government. Now the threat is upon us. We have a great military machine, whose officers are accustomed to obedience without question. If we get universal military training taking all our young men at their most impressionable age they can be easily indoctrinated just as was the youth of Germany. Our FBI could, without too much trouble, be made into a gestapo. Did you, for instance, happen to read about the way the reporters and photographers were pushed around by the military in Honolulu the day MacArthur arrived? That was not MacArthur's fault, but it is a small wind showing what could happen once we establish the doctrine that a general is superior to a president.

It boils down to the question of who is wiser: George Washington, or Fulton Lewis, Jr.?

Two years from now some Republican will likely be elected President—unless MacArthur is installed as emperor before then; and if the same tactics being followed by certain influential Republicans now are adopted then we may all find ourselves being asked this question: "Did you ever vote for Harry S. Truman, or did you ever have any affiliation with the Democratic Party?" If the answer is "Yes," we shall probably be shot or imprisoned for treason.

Hon. Stuart Symington Has Earned the Respect of Congress and the Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, the President has recently nominated and the Senate has unanimously confirmed the nomination of Mr. Stuart Symington as Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I can think of no citizen who would take with him to such a new position more public confidence than Mr. Symington, whose record of public service has been almost without parallel in recent history. Mr. Symington's service to the Government and the public has included, among other positions, the secretaryship of the Department of the Air Force and the chairmanship of the National Security Resources Development Board, and in each capacity his native ability and high devotion to duty has been most evident and apparent. His newest appointment will result in a great restoration of public confidence in the RFC as an important Government agency which, of late, has suffered from the exposure of certain malpractices. It is expected that Mr. Symington will restore to the RFC the full public confidence of this great agency of our Government.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have included with my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent column by Mr. Bascom Timmons, which appeared in the April 21, 1951, issue of the Nashville Tennesseean. This article is a succinct biographical sketch of Mr. Symington's accomplishments, and is also a tribute to him as a capable Government official.

The article is as follows:

SYMINGTON EARNS RESPECT IN CAPITAL—ST. LOUIS INDUSTRIALIST FORGED AHEAD AFTER HE WAS PROBED IN 1943

(By Bascom N. Timmons)

WASHINGTON—Some men step off the witness stands of congressional committees embarrassed, criticized, and frequently condemned, but W. Stuart Symington, new head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation not only took the quizzing in stride—he walked away smiling, warmed by the praise of the investigating group, which happened to be a subcommittee of the old House Military Affairs Committee.

That was back in 1943, when the House committee was following the lead of the special Truman war investigating committee in the Senate in turning up war profiteers. Investigators for the House committee thought they had found something in the operations of the Emerson Electric Co. of St. Louis, working on huge contracts for Navy plane turrets, which looked like profiteering. So Symington, president of the company, was called to Washington for investigation.

By the time the committee finished with him, he had made such an impression that committee members congratulated him and apologized for any aspersion which might have been cast on Emerson's operations by the investigator's erroneous report.

FOR A TOUGH SPOT

That seems to have given "Stu" Symington his entry into official circles. When Missourians came into special favor under President Truman, he tabbed Symington for one of the really tough spots—chairmanship of the Surplus Property Board, where it was charged that political influence was playing a big part in the disposal of war left-overs. When the board became the Surplus Property Administration, Symington's friends hailed him as "the first man in history to run a hundred billion dollar second-hand store."

His experience there in bringing some order out of the previous chaos offers a possible parallel to his RFC job, where he is asked to straighten out the Government loan agency after a sorry exhibition of political finagling.

He is principally remembered as Surplus Property Administrator for his opposition to acquisition by big business of surplus war plants. He tied into other steel companies on the operation of west coast plants by Henry J. Kaiser, a newcomer to the field, and ruled that Aluminum Corp. of America should not have the $700,000,000 worth of Government war built aluminum plants, because that would give Alcoa a monopoly. The force of this gesture was diminished when some of the small competitors said they could not compete with Alcoa without Government subsidy, and the big corporation got about what it wanted.

HEADS RESOURCES BOARD

Symington also gave veterans' emergency housing a postwar start by authorizing the transfer of surplus land, materials, and equipment which could be used in housing projects to State and local governments undertaking such construction. When the War Assets Administration pushed SPA aside, Symington moved up to become Assistant Secretary and later Secretary of the Air Force. He is now Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, an agency in which he has not shown to best advantage because most of its functions were transferred elsewhere.

Born to wealth, handsome, athletic, and extremely personable, Symington seems to have been unusual for his independence, which resulted in his being fired from jobs twice by members of his own family because he criticized their business methods, and his ability to combine good business management with excellent labor relations.

He took over Emerson Electric when it was in financial straits, and entangled in labor troubles. When he had straightened out the financial situation, he took up the labor side, where he was dealing with the Communist-ridden CIO United Electrical and Radio Machine Workers of America—since reorganized by CIO, with expulsion of the Communist officers. The St. Louis organizer for the union was a Communist named William Sentner. They managed to get along well enough that the Emerson plant was described as "the only war plant in St. Louis that has had no labor trouble." Emerson went from a small business to a fairly big one, employing as many as 7,000 wartime workers.

In the conservative industrial atmosphere of St. Louis, his profit-sharing plan, which he called "a balanced industrial democracy that works," proved startling at first, but it gave him a high production record. During the war he was tapped for governmental missions abroad as an observer for the Office of Production Management, which moved him another step toward Government officialdom.

JOHNNY-COME-LATELY

Old time Democrats call him a Johnny-come-lately, recalling that he supported Thomas E. Dewey for the GOP nomination in 1940, and later voted for Wendell Willkie. His first Democratic vote was for Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1944. In 1924 he married into the arch-Republican Wadsworth family, of New York. His wife, Eve, daughter of long-time Senator and Representative James W. Wadsworth, Jr., took up night-club singing for a time back in the twenties—they called her a "society chanteuse."

"Stu" Symington's public career was temporarily held up several years ago by a severe attack of hypertension, necessitating extensive surgery. But now he shoots golf regularly in the low seventies. His autobiography lists two widely separated alma maters—Yale, where he was a big man on the campus, and International Correspondence Schools, from which he took business courses.

If the St. Lawrence Seaway Should Become a Reality It Will Strike at the Very Heart of Our Industrial Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, continuing my opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, I appeared before the House Committee on Public Works on April 30 and made the following remarks:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, TWENTY-SECOND DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS IN OPPOSITION TO THE PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank this committee for giving me the opportunity to appear before you to express my opposition to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

I am sure that every member of this committee knows of my opposition to the project, not alone this year, but dating back to the late thirties when I became a Member of Congress. I have left no stone unturned to arouse opposition to the St. Lawrence project because I feel it is not in the best interest of the country from any standpoint.

As a Representative in Congress from the central Pennsylvania area, I am conscious that not only is the great State of Pennsylvania adversely affected by the St. Lawrence project, but the neighboring Middle Atlantic and seaboard States are affected likewise. In a few words, if the proposed project should become a reality it will strike at the very heart of our industrial economy and in addition destroy the jobs of thousands upon thousands of good American citizens.

It is needless for me to consume the time of this committee by rehashing the testimony that has been presented in support of or against the St. Lawrence project. For years it has been before Congress and experts have testified on every conceivable phase of the proposal. The results are that you have volumes of past testimony as well as the arguments for and against the proposed waterway during the present hearings.

I have followed the hearings very closely, and in my opinion, the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway have not justified its construction. In a few words, I base my convictions on the fact that—

1. With our country staggering from the effects of a huge national debt and taxes at a point where they are proving punitive, this is no time to attempt to saddle the American taxpayers with an expenditure that may run from millions to billions of dollars.

2. Recognizing that we are in the midst of an emergency that may throw us into a third world war and with our national resources being strained to build an adequate national defense, this is no time to divert manpower and materials for a project that cannot possibly be completed within a period of from 5 to 7 years. Our energies should be applied in the preservation of our national economy.

3. The proponents of the St. Lawrence seaway are taking a selfish viewpoint when they seek to establish a waterway and power project that will benefit Canada in particular, and only 15 percent of our own population at the expense of 85 percent of the American taxpayers. These advocates of this international ditch and Government-subsidized power project have completely turned their backs on literally millions of Americans who will be affected adversely by this twin project.

4. The assertion that the St. Lawrence seaway and power project is vital to our national defense is without foundation. When I make this statement I have in mind the question of iron ore, hydro power, shipbuilding facilities, etc., etc.

To the contrary, instead of this project being necessary to national defense, the twin proposal would create a project that could not be defended in the event of an all-out war. Therefore it will not strengthen our national defense, but in fact will add to the job of defending ourselves.

Gentlemen, those are my convictions, and to supplement my views I should like your kind permission to insert at this point copies of my several radio speeches and other statements that I have made in outlining my opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. In conclusion I wish to express again my appreciation for the privilege of appearing before you and of stressing the sincerity of my views. I hope that when you vote on the proposed legislation that your decision will be of a negative nature.

The MacArthur Controversy, and Tribute to the Late Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two excellent editorials from the May 5 issue of America, national Catholic weekly review. I congratulate the editor for his brilliant analysis in the editorial entitled "An Unbalanced Strategy," which discusses the MacArthur case. I congratulate him further for his penetrating insight, in his editorial entitled "Senator Vandenberg's Greatness," into Senator Vandenberg's crucial role in the development of our foreign policy from January of 1945 onward.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN UNBALANCED STRATEGY

When General MacArthur delivered his eloquent address before the joint meeting of both Houses of Congress on April 19, he opened with this plea:

"I do not stand here as advocate for any partisan cause * * * I trust, therefore, that you will do me the justice of receiving that which I have to say as solely expressing the considered viewpoint of a fellow American."

This was certainly the least the general could ask of a country he had always loyally, and through long periods even gloriously, served during 52 years in the United States Army.

From the point of view of the editors of America, it seems to us that our readers should also do us the justice of receiving what we have to say about the general's report in the same nonpartisan spirit. Let us say immediately that here, as in most matters of public policy, we are not trying to express the views of anybody but ourselves. The only contribution we can make is to try to analyze the question, on which all our editors are agreed, in the light of the world-wide political, economic, social, military, moral, and religious factors to which we devote, week by week, whatever abilities and knowledge we may possess.

1. General MacArthur argued that if we knocked out Red China, we would effectively thwart the threat of world communism. He did not show how this strategy would provide a defense for this country against Soviet Russia. We have ourselves published a great deal on communism in the Far East, and do not, we think, underestimate the importance of that vast area. But we cannot see, from what the general said, how Soviet Russia itself can be defeated in the Far East.

The fact remains that there are other areas whose importance must at least be discussed before a reasonable judgment can be rendered on the delicate balance of our foreign policy. The first of these is Western Europe. The nations of Western Europe, as Paul Hoffman, former administrator of the Marshall plan, declared in Chicago on April 20, outproduce Russia in coal, steel, and electrical power. At least since 1947, and even since 1940, our foreign policy, studiously designed after a careful canvass of all the areas of the world, has been hinged on Europe. We won a smashing victory in the last war by putting Europe first, over the objections, it will be recalled, of General MacArthur. We lost China after the war, partly through our own mismanagement, partly through the unmanageableness of that ocean of humanity.

Then there is the Middle East, the source of 75 percent of the oil Europe needs and of 20 to 30 percent of the oil this hemisphere uses. Anyone who reads the newspapers knows that Soviet Russia may try to pluck that prize any day now.

2. General MacArthur made no attempt whatsoever to prove that we could at present wage a full-scale war in both the Far East and in the European-Middle East theater. Labeling as "defeatism" the opinions of those who think we cannot is hardly an argument. If we cannot, we must make a choice, and make it in full view of all the factors involved in both areas.

3. As for Korea itself, very great doubt exists, which he did nothing to dispel, that the steps the General suggests would bring the early "victory" there which he seemed to promise. His whole case depends on his statement: "and the Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves" on the Korean front. That is the nub of the problem—not to expose ourselves anywhere to Russian intervention that will catch or throw us off balance.

If Russia has any sense it would "mesh its actions with our moves," though not "necessarily" in the Far East. If it did, the bottom would drop out of the MacArthur strategy, and of our whole strategy of national security.

"In war there is no substitute for victory." How true. But the Korean war, or even a full-scale Red-Chinese war, is not the real war we must make sure to win. We might better pull out of Korea, were that necessary, than jeopardize our defense against our real enemy—the Soviet Union—who cannot be defeated in Asia. Of course, if he can, we are wrong.

As in the last war, if we can first take care of our major foe wherever he applies his full strength, we can thereafter take care of our lesser foe anytime we choose. The only fatal mistake we could make would be to try to reverse this strategy.

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S GREATNESS

Tributes to Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, Republican, of Michigan, who passed away in his sleep on April 18, were spread over 16 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They attest to a bipartisan conviction that a truly great statesman had passed from the United States Senate.

Senator Vandenberg's claim to greatness rests upon a long succession of truly notable contributions packed into five critical years, from 1945 to 1950. If ever we win through to an enduring peace, we shall owe our good fortune in no small measure to the unremitting and laborious statesmanship he lavished on its foundations.

That labor began with his celebrated Senate address of January 10, 1945. Convinced that "world war III would open new laboratories of death too horrible to contemplate," he courageously renounced what he had called his insulationism. He called for maximum American cooperation to make the basic idea of Dumbarton Oaks [the proposed world-security organization] succeed. President Roosevelt promptly appointed him to the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference on the U. N. Charter. On October 4, 1948, the Senator ascribed to Republican initiative what had been in reality his own personal accomplishments in 1945:

"The word 'justice' never once appeared in the main body of the original draft. The idea of justice as the only basis of lasting peace was written into the Charter—and repeatedly—on Republican initiative."

But this was not all:

"So was article 14, without which the Charter would freeze a static world without hope of overtaking the mistakes of yesterday. So was article 51, which makes possible effective 'regional arrangements' which are of such vital current importance."

The Senator early developed, and later sold to Secretary of State Byrnes, his "get tough with Russia" attitude. He told one of our editors that at San Francisco, where he engaged in an 8-day duel with Molotov over article 14: "I pounded the table as hard as Molotov did, and he seemed to respect me for it."

As soon as it became clearly evident that the U. N. could not attain its collective-security purposes, the Senator devised his famous Vandenberg resolution of June 11, 1948. When approved by the Senate by a decisive vote of 64–4, it paved the way for the Atlantic pact, which was signed just a year later.

Another contribution he made, again in line with his principle of regional arrangements as supplementary to the U. N., was his support of the Rio Pact for Hemispheric Defense in 1947. Sumner Welles has credited him with saving the inter-American system.

The bipartisan foreign program which has succeeded best—the Marshall plan—owes a great deal to Senator Vandenberg. In the spring of 1948 the strongest opposition came from those who would not accept the Administration's proposal that it be administered by the Secretary of State, a political official whose economic wisdom Congress doubted. Vandenberg had the Brookings Institution devise the plan which Paul Hoffman, an exceptionally able businessman of free enterprise convictions, has administered with almost sensational success.

Arthur H. Vandenberg's patriotism, indeed, was heroic. He deferred too long, out of zeal for his country's welfare, submitting to surgery. Grieved as we are at the loss of this spirit who soared high above partisan considerations, we thank God for his greatness and pray for the repose of his great soul.

Point 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MEADER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Saginaw (Mich.) News of April 25, 1951:

HANDLING OF POINT 4 CAN BE DONE SENSIBLY

Representative GEORGE MEADER, Michigan Republican from Ann Arbor, has proposed a bipartisan commission to study and investigate the problem of aiding underdeveloped areas under President Truman's point 4 program and to formulate plans and recommendations from time to time. It would be a continuing commission, composed of 10 members named by the President, six from private life and four from the executive branch of the Government, two Senators named by the Vice President, and two Representatives named by the Speaker of the House. In each category, not more than half could be from the same political party.

Representative MEADER would apply point 4 money in the traditional American way—to help the peoples of the underdeveloped areas to help themselves, rather than to try to do it for them. He makes a strong argument for such treatment of point 4 funds:

"Let us reaffirm our faith in the economic and political philosophy upon which this Republic was founded. Let us believe that the liberation of the forces of the human soul which conquered our own wilderness and harnessed the forces of nature for the benefit of ourselves and our posterity can likewise be employed for the benefit of peoples who only now are emerging from the shackles of feudalism and slavery. Let us act in that faith. With humility and anxious to absorb the many advantages of the culture of the peoples whose material lot is less pleasant than ours, let us offer to contribute the pioneering, courageous, enterprising spirit which is our inheritance. But let it be the voluntary and spontaneous contribution of the American people in a self-sustaining, mutually beneficial economic movement.

Let us not admit decadence and impotence in the free enterprise system through engaging in state-owned, tax-supported proprietary activities reminiscent of the totalitarian socialism we abhor."

Representative MEADER's plan calls for the creation of conditions in the underdeveloped areas that will attract private investment, not merely the hand-out of American public money, at the expense of American taxpayers. It is opposed to the practice of making loans to foreign governments, which tend to put those governments into private business, in competition with private businessmen, and to drive away private investments.

Willis H. Hall, secretary of the Detroit Board of Commerce, pointed up the danger in loans to foreign governments when, on his return from a trip to South America, he urged the United States to sell more machinery to South American countries. He quoted President Peron of Argentina as saying that the United States is giving too much money to foreign governments. Peron was quoted as saying, "When this is done, the money is used mainly for political purposes." Dictator Juan Peron certainly should know what he is talking about when he talks of this matter.

Administration reaction to Representative MEADER's proposal will be interesting to watch. If the administration is sincerely anxious to help underdeveloped areas, it is difficult to figure a better way.

But if the administration is more anxious just to spend American money, keeping control of that money for use where it feels it will do the most political good, and promoting socialistic development in those areas, rather than the American enterprise system, it will hardly show any interest in a bipartisan commission.

If that is the administration's idea of point four, it will prefer to turn its administration over to Dean Acheson, as President Truman recently announced his intention of doing.

Defense Minerals Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER S. BARING

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, as you know, during the past months the importance of our own strategic minerals has been greatly emphasized by world conditions. Recently I was appointed chairman of a special Subcommittee To Investigate Strategic Minerals, and largely attended hearings were conducted at Ely, Nev., and Phoenix, Ariz. I am submitting my opening statement made at the Ely, Nev., hearings to the Members of Congress for their perusal:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE WALTER S. BARING, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, WASHINGTON, D. C., CHAIRMAN

It is a great pleasure to be in Ely, the center of so many small mine activities, and I hope to make many friends here.

As you all know, I am a member of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, formerly known as the Public Lands Committee. Among other things within our jurisdiction is mining legislation and to some extent, through special subcommittees, the policing of the Government agencies dealing with mining and the defense minerals program.

A flood of mail in both the House and the Senate indicates dissatisfaction with the way the defense agencies and especially the Defense Production Administration is handling the emergency program. Small and marginal miners particularly are complaining. Certain programs which operated with reasonable satisfaction during the last war have been ignored and the Government has launched out on a completely new track which does not seem to be getting results. We want to know from the miners themselves; why.

Chairman JOHN R. MURDOCK of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, knowing my long-standing interest in mining and especially in the small and marginal miner, has appointed me chairman of a special subcommittee to investigate the emergency minerals program and to devise legislation to supplement that of the Defense Production Act which now does not seem to be getting results.

The subcommittee wants you to tell your story for the record so that it may be taken back to Washington and the brass hats responsible confronted with what you miners think of what I call the do-nothing program.

I want to point out that our committee has discussed this matter with the Interior Department since 1948 and has made what we consider to be constructive suggestions based upon the experience of the last war. Our suggestions not only have gone unheeded but have been ignored. The Defense Production Act was signed early last September. We thought that the agencies would be all ready for D-day. Congress shelled out $600,000,000 as a little capital to start them in business, of which mining should have a share.

A new agency, the Defense Minerals Administration, was set up within the Interior Department. The resources and personnel of the Bureau of Mines and the USGS was put at its disposal. The staff estimate for DMA through to June of this year is 134 people plus, mind you, the available staffs of the Bureau of Mines and USGS. It is estimated that the overhead of DMA to March 31 will have been over half a million dollars. In the fiscal year 1951 it will spend money for overhead at the rate of more than a million dollars a year of which something over $900,000 will be for salaries.

It is nearly 7 months since the program was authorized by the Congress and, although I could go into the results in detail, I have not the time here—we came to hear you, not me; I will give you a few figures: Already there have been piled up in Washington about 850 applications for various kinds of aid, of which perhaps 600 are for financial aid. The balance are for procurement contracts and certificates of amortization.

To date—and the Government representatives can correct me if I am wrong—no application has been certified by DMA for a loan and not 1 penny has been disbursed.

DMA has certified to the Defense Production Administration 11 purchase contracts and to date, according to a letter from Administrator Boyd to Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, only one contract has been signed by the General Services Administration of those certified and that one is for tungsten. Clearly, something is wrong. Where the fault lies within the agencies is up to us to discover by means of hearings in Washington. What we want to know now is how you are faring, how you like the program, and what you think should be done about it.

Senator MURRAY, who has had a vast experience with Government mineral and metal programs, thinks there is a reasonably clean-cut solution. That entails new legislation. I have joined with Senator MURRAY in the so-called Murray-Baring bill, copies of which you have.

I am glad to have with me Bill Broadgate, for many years technical consultant to the Senate Subcommittee on Mining and Minerals Industry and a director of your own small-mines organization. Bill was with Senator Scrugham when Jim headed a similar subcommittee, and he participated in past hearings all over the country on this subject.

Dr. Boyd tells us, "Although there has been agency discussion with respect to a premium bonus or incentive-payment system, such a system is not authorized under Public Law 774 (Defense Production Act) and consequently the DMA has not been in a position to recommend specific changes in this direction."

We feel, therefore, that now is the time to fill that deficiency, hence the Murray-Baring bill.

The so-called fifty-fifty exploration program now has been O. K.'d by Secretary Chapman, but the Bureau of the Budget has not as yet furnished the funds. I do not like this program. I wonder if you do? I like the program which we had under the 1946 act and this, with modifications to bring it up to date, has been incorporated in my bill, H. R. 2862. The old program showed real results and this one should do better.

I have one piece of good news: A special application form for mining has been approved and is at the printers, so you will not have to bother with the present 12-page monstrosity.

I do not believe in the present DMA policies in certifying procurement contracts. I think if we want the ores and minerals we should be willing to pay the price to get them out and buy them in any quantity, however small, at a figure within which each mine can live, but without giving windfalls to low-cost producers. The small and marginal miner is the backbone of the West and it is time we started him digging.

There is no reason why, 30 days after the Murray-Baring bill is signed into law, Nevada mining should not be buzzing with life and activity.

Tell the subcommittee your story in your own words, frankly, and let us have your suggestions as to how the small and marginal miner can best contribute to the emergency effort—if the Government will let you. Later, if you wish, I shall explain the working of the Murray-Baring bill if there are any parts you do not understand.

We are fortunate enough to have with us today from the Government, Mr. J. L. Hoffiund, chief counsel of Defense Minerals Administration to represent Dr. Boyd, the Administrator.

Also Capt. H. C. Maull, Jr., who spends all the stockpile money for the Government. Captain Maull is Acting Director of the Purchase Division of EPS, the Emergency Procurement Services of the General Services Administration, which does most of the Government buying. All mineral and metal contracts have to pass his scrutiny. Incidentally, he was a lifelong friend of our beloved Jim Scrugham. Captain Maull is a red-tape cutter from way back and I have heard it said that if he had 20 brothers like him in the Government, things would really hum.

With Captain Maull is Mr. Robert Bradford, of this GSA region; Mr. Otto Kline, of the Denver GSA region; and Mr. Thurtell, who is liaison man between GSA and DMA.

If there are any other Government officials present, please identify yourself for the record.

These gentlemen are here to answer your questions and I ask that they stay a few minutes after the hearing so that any of you who wish to discuss your problems with them may do so. I may call some of them to the stand later to discuss their programs.

I would now like to make special commendation to my good friends of the White

Pine Chamber of Commerce and Mines. They have always stood by me in all mining situations. A year ago they held another meeting for us here, which was a very fine meeting. We got some very good testimony, and I certainly want to thank you gentlemen of the White Pine Chamber of Commerce and Mines, and in particular Cecil E. Geraghty, for the very good work which they have always done.

I have already said plenty at this time, and I don't have a thing more to say except that I really believe that you have been doing a swell job. There is one thing that I do know. I know that whenever we call on you to testify, you are always ready to answer. I want you to know that that is something that we really appreciate out here in Ely.

Smash the Trojan Horse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the New Leader. The article deals with Red fifth column operating in democratic countries, particularly France. The author, E. V. Yourievsky, is a veteran Russian Socialist who was employed by the Soviet Government as an economist and was one of the authors of the first Soviet 5-year plan. He has been a refugee in Western Europe for many years.

The article follows:

SMASH THE TROJAN HORSE

(By E. V. Yourievsky)

The United States, Canada, New Zealand, and Australia have taken a number of measures against the Communist fifth column. In England, the general secretary of the transport-workers union, Arthur Deakin, spoke of the necessity of banning the Communist Party, which is not a party, like other parties, but an organized conspiracy against the country and the English people. And Prime Minister Attlee commented on the Sheffield congress of the so-called Partisans of Peace: "There are limits to our patience. The time will come when we must slam the door in the face of those who wish to burn our house down."

Sentiment in favor of restricting the Kremlin party's freedom of action has finally manifested itself in France, too. At the last congress of the Radical Party, even Edouard Herriot burst out: "There is plenty of room in Russia. Let the Communists go there before we declare war on them." The idea of restricting the Communists is also evident in the proposals to change the French electoral system, now based on proportional representation. The changes might well reduce Moscow's delegation of 167 deputies in the French Assembly. But even if the Communists only had 90, or 50, delegates, the basic question of their party's freedom of action would remain.

A weak-willed democratic credo prevailing in this country has made the Communist Party sacrosanct, at least till recently. Take Le Monde, for example, the best democratic paper in France, which categorically rejects any restrictions upon the freedom of the Communist Party. Even though it is well aware of the party's character and aims, Le Monde wrote:

"The essence of democracy lies in the fact that it grants liberty even to those who, like the Communists, make use of liberty in order to destroy it. This conviction is neither naiveté nor weakness, but an expression of the most profound faith in man. It is the faith that, if good and evil, truth and falsehood, contend with the same weapons (i. e., with equal freedom) good will triumph in the end."

The philosophy expressed in this formula leads straight to the religion of Leo Tolstoy, the idea of nonresistance to evil. Asked once what he would do if thugs broke into his house to murder his children, Tolstoy replied: "All I could do would be to try to convince them that it would serve no purpose and was wrong." The Russian religious philosopher Nicholas Berdayev has commented that it is quite easy to show that if one does not oppose evil with force, evil always triumphs, but Tolstoy rested his hope on a historic miracle and, in the name of faith in the miracle of God's direct intervention, proposed to risk the destruction of society, the state, civilization, the destruction of the world which was based on falsehood and violence.

Obviously, Le Monde does not believe in such salvation by the intervention of providence. Even the devout François Mauriac does not believe in it. But if one does not equate the risk of the destruction of society with the risk of losing a game of poker, then the democratic credo of Le Monde's editors—and others like them in the west—is wretched counsel for these days. A man who sings the abstract tune that the Communists, even though they are dedicated to murdering freedom, must be granted complete freedom, is, subjectively, in his own estimation, a gallant knight of democracy. Objectively, he may be its gravedigger.

THE DAY-TO-DAY ISSUES

What are the real questions which arise today in democratic countries subjected to Communist pressure, like France? Here are several:

1. Can a democratic government admit to its ranks officials who, as Communist Party members, must promote by every possible means the disintegration of democratic order?

2. Can democratic nations tolerate judges who are so frightened by the thought of possible Communist accession to power that they either acquit Communist lawbreakers or else pass ridiculously small sentences?

3. Must a democracy concerned with its defense tolerate propagation of the doctrine of military insubordination? At the trial of the saboteurs who tried to wreck the aircraft carrier Dixmude, the theory was advanced that soldiers and sailors are subject only to the dictates of their own convictions, not to any requirements of military discipline. The Communist Party expounds this doctrine quite effectively in Toulon—an arsenal and naval base.

4. Communist detachments have converted nationalized enterprises into virtual party bastions. Injecting unrelated political demands into economic demands calculated to produce inflation, the Communists use them to maintain pressure on the Government at every pretext. Strikes in the gas and electric stations, for example, to say nothing of the water-supply system, create a tremendous impression. Must a democratic government unconditionally recognize the unlimited right to strike in the most vital public service industries?

5. France has placed a detachment of volunteers at the disposal of the U. N. in Korea. The Communist press urged the crews of the steamers Tafna, Athos, and Pasteur not to transport them. Can a democratic government tolerate an atmosphere of terror so great that such volunteers beg that their names be kept secret lest their families be subjected to attacks and threats by the Communists?

6. French troops are fighting in Indochina against Stalin's protégé, Ho Chi Minh. A French Communist Party representative goes to see the Vietminh dictator, travels all over his territory, and then returns to write articles in the French Communist press extolling the achievements of Ho's troops, who, happily, are now capable of mauling a considerable number of French.

Since French Communist leaders have made it plain that they will aid the Soviet aggressor in every way in the event of war, the French Government has been setting up a civilian defense organization to protect public buildings, railroads and highways, combat sabotage, and aid in tracking down parachutists. No one will dare join this organization—we will kill these "militiamen," the Communist press hints broadly. It elaborates this point with a cartoon showing Defense Minister Jules Moch (who proposed the militia) trembling with fear before the corpses of Laval and other "militiamen" dangling from scaffolds.

Is this sort of freedom of the press tolerable?

7. The Government knows full well the location of the Communist Party "center" which receives orders from Moscow, spreads lies on a grand scale, and prescribes techniques for subversive activities. Protected by the parliamentary immunity of the deputies who make it up and enjoying complete freedom, this center expands and reinforces its power with every passing day. Must the Government confine itself to punishing underlings (like the port workers who refuse to unload war matériel) while timidly bypassing the center itself?

WHAT OF SOCIAL REVOLUTION?

These are the questions which arise daily in France. Yet when it comes to actively fighting the Communists, a misconception of the nature of the struggle often prevents many western politicians from generating effective action. This misconception was well illustrated by two recent articles in the weekly Populaire-Dimanche. The author, a secretary of the French Socialist Party, calls the Communist Party an organization of lies, espionage, treason, sabotage, and tyranny—but is opposed to banning it. He says, first, that the existing laws are adequate; second, that suppression would martyr the Communist Party and finally, that the chief weapon against Stalinism is not repression but political, social, and economic reforms which, so to speak, immunize the people against the Soviet virus. The realization of the aggregate of major socio-economic reforms is called by this writer the social revolution. "The struggle against the Stalinist fifth column," he insists, "requires this social revolution."

Undoubtedly, reforms carried out boldly and in time—not in Syngman Rhee style or in the anemic liberal fashion observed in Italy—can undermine the chances of some dictators, although it must be observed that it will not undermine those who arrive in Soviet tanks. But when one speaks of "revolution," one should remember that the entire world is caught up in a whirl of technical, cultural, social, economic, and political changes. To the leadership of this world-wide revolution, two systems, two world outlooks lay claim.

It is a great mistake to think that the struggle for such leadership is between a moderate, social reformist, liberal-socialist philosophy and another which is moving in the same direction, but is genuinely revolutionary, broader and bolder, and does not hesitate to use coarse, plebeian methods. It is a mistake to think that the difference between them can to any degree be compared with that which once separated Aristide Briand and Eduard Bernstein from Karl Liebknecht and Jules Guesde.
